The New York Times (5/25, Stout, 1.19M), in an article titled "Veterans Chief Voices Anger On Data Theft," reports VA Secretary James Nicholson "expressed outrage Wednesday over being kept in the dark about the theft of computer data on 26.5 million veterans as he himself came under heavy criticism from Capitol Hill." He "issued a statement vowing 'a very extensive review of individuals up and down the chain of command' and urging the inspector general's office at the Department of Veterans Affairs to expedite an investigation of the affair." Nicholson said, "Upon notification, my first priority was to take all actions necessary to protect veterans from harm and to assist in law enforcement efforts." An Administration official "said that Mr. Nicholson had not been informed for 13 days" and that Nicholson notified the FBI "once he learned of the theft, then ordered his own agency to set up Web sites and a toll-free number to handle an anticipated flood of queries."

The AP (5/25, Yen) reports Sen. Patrick Leahy, referring to "past budget problems at the VA…said Nicholson should consider resigning." But seeking to reassure Veterans, White House press Secretary Tony Snow said, "We have no indication that these have been used to defraud the 26.5 million people whose personal information would have been contained." USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) briefly notes similar details.

There was no network news coverage of the data security breach, but CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Blitzer) reported that sparks are "expected to fly tomorrow when a Senate committee put Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson in the hot seat. Nicholson says he's ordered an investigation into why he and the public didn't learn about the theft until more than two weeks after it happened."

Bush Expresses Confidence In Nicholson. A second version of the AP's (5/25, Yen) coverage in an article titled "Bush Backs VA Chief After Data Breach" led with the White House's response, reporting, "VA Secretary Jim Nicholson got an endorsement Wednesday from President Bush -- and a summons to Capitol Hill -- after the theft of veterans' personal information that has become one of the nation's largest security breaches." Expressing support for Nicholson "White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush had 'full faith and confidence' in Nicholson. Snow originally had declined to issue a statement of support in the president's name but then said he wanted to clarify his remarks." Meanwhile, "Sen. Patrick Leahy said Bush should call Nicholson 'into the woodshed' and consider changing the leadership of the VA, particularly after the agency waited until May 22 to inform the public after the May 3 theft." And Sen. Larry Craig "said he plans to ask Nicholson tough questions on timing, security procedures and who was involved when his panel holds its extraordinary joint hearing Thursday with the Senate Homeland Security Committee." Craig said, "Twenty-six million people deserve answers."

Buyer Says VA Delay In Alerting Public "Made Sense." The Army Times (5/25, Maze) reports House Veterans Affairs Chairman Steve Buyer "did not fault the VA for waiting until May 22 to announce the May 3 laptop theft, saying it made sense to determine if the stolen data would be recovered before announcing what was taken." But Rep. John Salazar "said the delay 'squandered critical damage control time.'"

VA One Of Many Government Agencies At Risk For Data Security Breaches. The New York Times/AP (5/25) reports the VA is not the only agency at risk for data security breaches. According to the GAO, the VA "was one of eight departments given failing grades for computer security practices in 2005. The Pentagon and the departments of Homeland Security, State, Energy and Health and Human Services also got Fs from the House Committee on Government Reform in its annual report card released in March." GAO director of information security issues Greg Wilshusen on Wednesday said, "There's a vast amount of highly sensitive information that the government collects and maintains. … A number of agencies are vulnerable to similar data breaches."

The New York Times (5/25, Stout, 1.19M) in its coverage also says, "Christopher Wolf, a Washington lawyer with the firm Proskauer Rose who specializes in security issues, said that the veterans department was just one of many federal agencies with lax computer security, and that sabotage might not be the biggest danger. 'These things happen because of accidents,' he said." The VA "began issuing new identification cards late in 2004, with a veteran's Social Security number and date of birth encrypted on a magnetic tape on the back. 'Identity theft is one of the fast-growing crimes in the nation,' read an accompanying announcement."

DOJ_NMG_0029445

29 Lawmakers Could Be Vulnerable After Data Theft. The Hill (5/25, Schor) reports 29 current members of Congress, including House Veterans Affairs Committee chairman Steve Buyer, Rep. Tom Davis and Sen. John McCain, could possibly be at risk after the theft of VA personal information. Buyer spokeswoman Laura Zuckerman "said verifying the integrity of his own data was not Buyer's first concern." Other lawmakers were similarly more concerned about their constituents including "Marine veteran Rep. John Kline" who "has written to veterans in his district informing them of the breach and offering information on credit-reporting agencies and other relevant contacts, according to spokesman Troy Young." The Hill also notes that VA Secretary Nicholson "will face a new ranking Democrat at today's Veterans' Affairs Committee hearing, as Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Tuesday that Rep. Bob Filner (Calif.) would replace Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.)."

House Bill Would Ban Online Gambling. The Washington Post (5/25, D1, Ahrens) reports, "Online poker players will have to fold their hands if a Virginia congressman gets his way. … Today, the House Judiciary Committee will mark up a bill introduced by Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R) that would ban much online gambling, including bets on sporting events and games of chance -- namely poker, which has enjoyed a boom in recent years." The Post continues, "The legislation could get an unexpected boost from the Jack Abramoff scandal. The disgraced lobbyist was key to blocking one of Goodlatte's three previous attempts to ban Internet gambling, and backlash over corruption charges could help the current effort. … The bill would update the Federal Wire Wager Act, which prohibits gambling over telephone lines but may not apply to Internet gambling because not all Web traffic travels over phone lines. It also would force banks to block transactions related to online gambling and would empower law enforcement agencies to force Internet service providers to remove or disable links to gambling sites. … The bill effectively would prevent state lotteries from taking their games online, because technology does not exist to keep gambling within a state. Fantasy sports leagues would be exempt. Goodlatte said his bill is neutral on parimutuel horse wagering, which has an online component that is the cause of an ongoing struggle between Congress and the Justice Department."

Case Made Against Online Gambling Ban. Frank Catania, a former assistant attorney general, director of the New Jersey Division of Gaming Enforcement and deputy Speaker of the New Jersey General Assembly, writes in The Hill (5/25), "This week, the House Judiciary Committee is expected to mark up two bills that would make certain forms of Internet gambling and the financial transactions involved in Internet gambling illegal. … Whether the gambling entertainment is online or offline, consumers deserve diligent regulators who make sure operators are honest, games are fair, winning players are paid promptly, problem gamblers are offered assistance or ultimately barred and minors are prohibited from playing. Prohibition of Internet gambling will not provide such protections; licensure and regulation will."

Former New Orleans Mayor's Uncle Pleads Guilty To Stealing Transit Funds. The AP (5/25, Martel) reports, "The uncle of former Mayor Marc Morial pleaded guilty Wednesday to stealing $550,000 from a transit agency, the third conviction in a federal probe of corruption at city hall and in the public schools. Glenn Haydel pleaded guilty to fraud against a federal program and would serve two years in prison if a judge approves the deal, said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten." The AP notes Haydel "held a lucrative consulting contract with the Regional Transit Authority when Morial was in office in the 1990s," and he "admitted diverting $550,000 from an authority trust account to his own company, Metro New Orleans Transit Inc., and then taking $350,000 for his personal use, Letten said."

Former West Palm Beach Official Pleads Guilty To Corruption Charges. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/25, Blum, 249K) reports, "Former West Palm Beach City Commissioner and State Rep. Ray Liberti pleaded guilty on Wednesday to three counts in federal court stemming from a corruption case involving a massage parlor." He "was accused of accepting more than $66,000 in cash and a a $2,000 Tag Heurer watch in what turned out to be an FBI sting operation. 'I know what I did,' Liberti told the judge when he entered his pleas." The AP (5/25, Anderson) notes Liberti admitted "using his powers as a city official to harass business owners in exchange for bribes from investors who wanted to buy the businesses below market value. … Unknown to Liberti at the time, one of the 'investors' turned out to be an undercover FBI agent, and most of Liberti's meetings and phone calls in the case were tape recorded, said John Kastrenakes, the assistant U.S. attorney prosecuting the case."

Holdout Juror Says FBI "Set Up" Former New Mexico Treasurer. The AP (5/25) reports, "A juror described by his colleagues as the lone holdout against convicting Robert Vigil in his public corruption trial said he doesn't believe the former New Mexico state treasurer is entirely innocent, but prosecutors clearly failed to prove their case. In a phone interview with Associated Press from his part-time home in Sun City, Ariz., Delmus Holdson also says he believes Vigil was 'set up' by the FBI. And if federal prosecutors try the case again, they'll likely face another hung jury, Holdson said Tuesday." Holdson added, "They put him in a position where the other side knew what they were doing, and were wearing recording devices," and he denied other jurors' allegations that he refused to weigh the evidence during deliberations.

DOJ_NMG_0029446

Indicted Tennessee Senator Delivers Subpoenas To Lawmakers. The Tennessean (5/25, Schrade) reports that at the Tennessee Capitol yesterday, "indicted former Sen. Roscoe Dixon created a stir as he issued subpoenas in his defense to lawmakers, including Lt. Gov. John Wilder and state Sen. Jeff Miller. Dixon was one of the five public officials snagged in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz bribery sting -- which occurred almost one year ago to the day. … He is charged with taking payoffs to advance legislation favorable to a phony computer recycling company created by federal prosecutors." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (5/25, Locker) adds, "Dixon would only say that he was lining up potential witnesses for his Memphis trial. … He resigned that post last May following his indictment, along with three other legislators and others, in the FBI's 'Tennessee Waltz' corruption investigation. … Dixon has pleaded innocent of charges of accepting $9,500 in bribes from undercover agents." The Nashville Post (5/25, Whitehouse) notes, "As lobbyists and reporters looked on, Dixon was warmly greeted by former colleagues of both political parties and made small talk with them. The most interesting moment was watching Dixon and State Sen. Ward Crutchfield…who is also facing trial in the 'Waltz' case, embrace and share private thoughts before going their separate ways."

Defense Lawyer Again Brings Up Daley At Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (5/25, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley became a focus again Wednesday at the federal corruption trial of his former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, as prosecutors complained about frequent references to Daley by the defense. Sorich's lawyer, Thomas Anthony Durkin, asked prosecution witnesses such as former Daley Cabinet member John Kosiba whether the mayor, his closest aides or the city's Law Department knew about patronage hiring in the administration. … In a private sidebar conversation, Durkin was asked to explain his repeated references to Daley. Durkin said the mayor told federal agents 'that he didn't believe that there was anything improper at the time, and he was not aware that there was anything improper going on,' according to a transcript of the discussion." WLS-TV Chicago (5/24, Schulte) reported on its Web site that federal prosecutor Patrick Collins "complained to the judge about defense attorney Tom Durkin's constant line of questioning during cross-examination about Mayor Daley's role in hiring. Collins said it was confusing to the jury and caused 'serious risk of diverting the attention away from the four men on trial.' Judge David Coar agreed and did not see the significance in questions about Daley."

Ryan Juror Returns Trial Notes. The AP (5/25) reports, "One of the jurors who convicted former Gov. George Ryan of racketeering and fraud has returned notes she took during the seven-month corruption trial. U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer had ordered the return of the notes to the courthouse after the juror, Karen James, told a reporter she planned to sell them. James returned the notes Wednesday and the matter was closed, officials said."

Barn Demolished In Ongoing FBI Search For Hoffa Remains. The AP (5/25, Krisher) reports, "It took about three hours Wednesday for a 75,000-pound excavating machine to gobble up a barn as part of the FBI's search for the remains of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa. The barn's destruction was the most dramatic moment in the week since dozens of FBI agents descended on the horse farm 30 miles from Detroit. … Dawn Clenney, a spokeswoman for the FBI in Detroit, said nothing significant has been found so far." The AP adds, "On Thursday, crews will begin to remove the barn's 200-square-foot concrete floor and then the FBI will dig to search for evidence." In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, The Detroit Free-Press (5/25, Neavling) adds that Clenny said "things are 'business as usual.'" By the end of the day yesterday, "a pile of wooden debris sat where the 4,700-square-foot barn once stood. A handful of FBI agents in navy blue polo shirts stood watch nearby 0- one leaning on a yellow shovel." CNN.com (5/24, Cummings) notes, "The government eventually will have to replace the barn, or any other structures it removes, and pay for any damage to the Hidden Dreams Farm," and "the FBI paid Able $6,000 to tear down the barn, the company said."

Lawyer Says Tipster Withheld Hoffa Information From Fear Of Retribution By Mob. The Detroit News (5/25, Egan) reports, "Donovan Wells was terrified in 1976 about telling the FBI what he knew about the disappearance of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa, one of his former lawyers said Wednesday." Attorney Joseph J. Fabrizio recalled, "He said if he wasn't careful, he'd end up in the same place as Hoffa." But "Fabrizio said that after 30 years and with many of those rumored to be involved with Hoffa's murder in their graves, Wells was likely to tell the FBI much more about what he knew than he was willing to tell in 1976, when he was trying to strike a plea bargain on a charge related to theft of steel. Fabrizio's recollection of Wells' fear could help explain why the story from the former Hoffa associate and trucking company owner could mobilize FBI action today that it could not mobilize in 1976."

DOJ_NMG_0029447

Township Businesses Making Most Of Publicity. The AP (5/25, Charlton) reports from Milford Township, "In the week since dozens of FBI agents, police and others invaded this small community…to search for the remains of former Teamsters chief Jimmy Hoffa, local businesses are taking advantage of the national spotlight aimed at them. With humorous signs, specially made T-shirts and themed meals, business owners are poking fun at the search while trying to attract more customers."

Killer Of Abortion Doctor Wins Right To Represent Himself. The AP (5/25, Thompson) reports, "Anti-abortion extremist James Kopp, who admits he was the sniper who killed an abortion doctor in 1998, will defend himself against federal charges of violating abortion clinic access laws." The AP continues, "A judge granted Kopp permission Tuesday to represent himself. … Kopp's first move was to abandon his former attorney's efforts to prevent federal prosecutors from using his statements detailing how and why he shot Dr. Barnett Slepian." The AP adds, "Kopp says the statements he made during his 2003 second-degree murder trial contain 'truths about my faith in the Lord Jesus Christ,' according to court filings. … Kopp, 51, is serving 25 years to life in prison after being convicted on the state murder charge. Federal prosecutors want an additional conviction to ensure he is never released. … The trial judge ruled that Kopp could be charged under the law because abortion-related violence and a shortage of abortion doctors have forced many women to cross state lines for procedures. … Kopp has acknowledged shooting Slepian from the woods outside the doctor's suburban Amherst home but said he was trying only to wound him to prevent him from performing abortions."

California Man Sentenced For Mail Theft. The California Recorder (5/25, Smith) reports, "U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker's voice sounded heavy with disappointment. … Just one month after a man fulfilled Walker's unique sentence for mail theft by carrying a scarlet letter-type sign for eight hours outside a San Francisco post office, he committed yet another mail-related crime. … And so, when it came to his latest sentencing Tuesday, Walker did not get creative." The Recorder continues, "After defendant Shawn Gementera admitted violating his supervised release in four different ways -- three involving drugs and another, mail-related theft -- Walker sentenced him to a year in prison. … 'I do think, Mr. Gementera, what forbearance and patience the court may have had for you in the past has obviously not put you on the right track,' Walker said sadly. … And 'when you start stealing mail, you directly hurt other people,' the judge added. 'And that cannot be tolerated. So I think the time has come when [you need to] go back to custody.'" The Recorder notes, "Federal advisory guidelines suggested 12 to 18 months in prison for Gementera, said prosecutor Blake Stamm, who suggested the former. … 'Clearly, the lessons the court wished the defendant to learn ... that the theft of mail is not a victimless crime ... clearly that lesson has not taken,' the assistant U.S. attorney argued."

Regulators Move To End Fraudulent Mortgage Practices. The Washington Times (5/25, Hill, 90K) reports, "The Federal Reserve, Federal Trade Commission and other regulators said yesterday that they will work to stamp out the fraudulent advertising and bad deals being offered by brokers marketing seemingly low-rate mortgages with backloaded payment schedules that put many consumers in debt over their heads. … Such mortgages include some loans with interest-only payments so that consumers accumulate no equity in their dwellings and some adjustable-rate mortgages with options to make minimal payments that do not pay down principal. The loans have been particularly popular in Washington and other high-priced areas where borrowers need the lenient terms to afford houses."

Texas Appeals Court Overturns Conviction Of Man Once Sentenced To Death. The AP (5/25, Vertuno) reports, "A state appeals court on Wednesday overturned the conviction of a man who once was sentenced to death in the 1991 slayings of four teenage girls, sending the case back to a lower court because of a codefendant's statement that was used by prosecutors." The AP continues, "Robert Springsteen IV, who was 17 at the time of the killings, was convicted in 2001. His death sentence was commuted to life in prison after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it was unconstitutional to execute killers who were under the age of 18 when the crime was committed." The AP adds, "On Wednesday, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals voted 5-4 to reverse Springsteen's conviction and sent the case back to a lower court. … Eliza Hope Thomas, 17; Amy Ayers, 13; and sisters Jennifer and Sarah Harbison, ages 17 and 15, were killed during a 1991 yogurt shop robbery. The girls were bound, gagged and shot in the head, and the store was set on fire, authorities said."

US Charges Scientist, California Biotech Firm With Fraud. The AP (5/25, Elias) reports, "A scientist and his biotechnology company were charged on 13 counts of mail fraud, false statements and related charges for allegedly shipping bogus research material to many corporate and academic researchers, including at the U.S. National Institute of Health and the Walter Reed Medical Center, federal prosecutors said." The AP continues, "The indictment unsealed Tuesday in San Francisco federal court accused Chi Yang and employees at the Dublin, California-based company he owned, SynPep Corp., of falsifying scientific paperwork attesting to the purity of protein fragments called peptides that researchers ordered from the company between 1999 and 2004." The AP adds, "The indictment alleged that SynPep's employees doctored the data by cutting-and-pasting vital results plotted on charts and knowingly sent impure peptides at Yang's behest. Yang is the only person charged and he faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and the government is seeking to seize property bought with proceeds from the allegedly fraudulent sales. … The peptides that were shipped were impure or crude replicas of what was ordered, jeopardizing research in cancer, AIDS and other diseases, the indictment alleged. On its Web site, SynPep bills itself as the 'The Peptide Quality Leader.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029448

Convicted Sniper Muhammad Questions Malvo In Maryland Trial. The Washington Post (5/25, A1, Rich, Londoño) reports, "John Allen Muhammad interrogated his former protégé yesterday on the specifics of the sniper slayings and on the roots of their relationship, a cross-examination that unfolded as a struggle for psychological dominance between two men who terrorized the Washington region while bound as if they were father and son." The Post continues, "Lee Boyd Malvo testified that he once absorbed Muhammad's venomous teachings, including his hatred of white people and of the United States. But in nearly five hours of questioning over two days, as the dynamic of their relationship unfurled in a packed courtroom in Montgomery County, Malvo gave every indication that he has broken free from the man who trained him in paramilitary tactics. … 'Son,' Muhammad, who is acting as his own attorney, began at one point. … 'I would prefer you address me by my name,' Malvo snapped back. … 'Okay, thank you, I stand corrected,' Muhammad said, only to do it again seconds later." The Post notes, "Muhammad, 45, stood behind the defense table as he conducted the cross-examination, sometimes holding in his hand the logic book that has been with him since the trial began three weeks ago. Malvo, 21, sat in the witness box about 25 feet away, speaking softly but clearly, taking occasional sips of water from a paper cup. … The questions ranged widely and took unusual turns as Muhammad appeared sometimes combative, sometimes nearly tender. At one point, the case and its horrific details -- 10 dead and three wounded in 22 days -- seemed to recede as the two recalled that Muhammad once asked Malvo to look after his children in Antigua while he was away. Splashing in the water at a beach, Muhammad's son, then 11, and Muhammad's then-girlfriend nearly drowned."

Muhammad's Ex-Wife Describes Life Of Abuse, Fear. The Washington Post (5/25, B1, Londoño) reports, "Never mind that her ex-husband is one of the most closely watched death row inmates in the country. … To this day, Mildred Muhammad never leaves home without the restraining order that bars sniper John Allen Muhammad from getting close to her and their three children. … 'The only thing I know is he was coming to kill me,' Mildred Muhammad said in an interview last weekend. 'If he were to escape, I have that to show to say that he's not supposed to be near me.'" The Post adds, "Mildred Muhammad, 46, said she decided to speak publicly about her ex-husband because she feels prosecutors who have tried him in Virginia and Maryland have not thoroughly addressed what she believes his motive in the October 2002 shootings was: to kill her so he could recover his children."

West Virginia Used Car Dealer Pleads Guilty To Falsifying Loan Documents. The Wheeling Intelligencer (5/25) reports the "owner of several local auto dealerships has pleaded guilty to obtaining more than $700,000 from false loan documents, according to information provided by Acting U.S. Attorney Rita R. Valdrini." Jon Marhefka "of St. Clairsville pleaded guilty recently before U.S. District Judge Frederick P. Stamp Jr. to one count of an information document, which allowed the matter to bypass consideration by a federal grand jury." Marhefka, the "owner and president of Arrow Sales Inc., a corporation operating used car lots in Wheeling and Belmont County, acknowledged in the court documents that he was aware that false loan applications were submitted to financial institutions on behalf of customers purchasing vehicles at the businesses."

Maryland Man Convicted In Gang Rape. The Washington Post (5/25, B4, Castaneda) reports, "A Riverdale Park man suspected of belonging to a violent street gang was convicted yesterday by a Prince George's County jury of participating in the brazen gang rape of a young woman last fall." The Post continues, "Hector Mosquera, 28, was found guilty of first-degree rape and three counts of first-degree sex offense, said a spokesman for State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey. … Mosquera faces a possible sentence of four life terms in prison, prosecutors said. Circuit Court Judge Richard H. Sothoron Jr. scheduled sentencing for July 6." The Post adds, "Prosecutors said they obtained evidence that Mosquera is a member of Vatos Locos, a street gang made up primarily of Central American immigrants. … Sothoron granted a defense motion to exclude evidence of Mosquera's involvement in Vatos Locos from the trial, said Ramon Korionoff, an Ivey spokesman. … The attack occurred about 4 p.m. Oct. 20 in Riverdale Park. The victim, now 28, and her sister-in-law were walking home from a bus stop. Prosecutors said Mosquera and another man confronted the two women and demanded money. The two attackers grabbed her and dragged her to a bamboo grove. A third man joined them, and the three sexually assaulted the victim, prosecutors said. The sister-in-law escaped."

DOJ_NMG_0029449

New York City Expanding Mounted Police Force. The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 11, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Here in New York, they are training horses not to race but to patrol the streets as part of an expansion of the New York Police Department." CBS (Schlesinger) added, "Looking at him, it would be easy to dismiss" mounted Officer Chris Daniello "as a quaint holdover from a simpler time. But New York's thoroughly modern police commissioner has rediscovered horses, less because they're lovable, more because they're affordable." Commander Raymond Kelly, New York Police Department: "They're not that expensive to maintain -- $10 a day for hay and some treatment." Schlesinger: "And their emissions are easier on the atmosphere than their gasoline-powered competitors. The NYPD already has 80 horses that hit the streets thousands of times a year to control crowd and crime and traffic. They are hard to ignore." They "work so well that the department's buying 75 more."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Rejects GM Request To Delay Delphi Hearings. The Washington Post (5/25, D03, ElBoghdady) reports, "A bankruptcy court judge yesterday denied General Motor Corp.'s request to delay hearings on whether Delphi Corp., its largest auto parts supplier, can nullify its own union contracts as it struggles to emerge from bankruptcy protection." The Post continues, "In a letter that GM declined to make public, the automaker urged Judge Robert D. Drain to adjourn the hearings in New York for up to 60 days so it can use the time to negotiate an out-of-court settlement and avert a threatened strike by Delphi's 33,000 unionized plant workers in this country. The hearings started earlier this month and resumed as scheduled yesterday morning. … With the hearings underway, GM is facing more pressure to kick in money so Delphi can offer wages and benefits acceptable to the unions before the judge rules and possibly revokes the contracts. The judge has urged the parties to keep talking as the hearings proceed." The Post notes, "A strike by Delphi workers could paralyze GM's production lines and even push the automaker into Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection if the strike lasts long enough. GM, which spun off Delphi in 1999, purchases about $14 billion in parts from Delphi each year. An analyst predicts that GM could "bleed" $7 billion to $8 billion during a 60-day walkout."

Led By McCain, Senate Prepares To Scrutinize Defense Contractors. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Karp, Pasztor, 2.11M) reports, "Boeing Co. and other big Pentagon contractors are bracing for fresh congressional criticism of weapons-procurement blunders and profits as Sen. John McCain ratchets up his scrutiny of the defense establishment." Sen. McCain reportedly wants to use his memberships on the Armed Services Committee and Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee to investigate "alleged sweetheart dealings between the Pentagon and industry." The Journal writes, "Currently, many contractors are awarded maximum bonuses, even on projects that are significantly behind schedule or over budget."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Targets Human Trafficking In Midwest. The AP (5/25, Sedensky) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department launched a loosely organized effort Wednesday to prosecute human trafficking in a region that has prosecuted virtually no such cases." The AP continues, "Officials announced the Human Trafficking Rescue Project in conjunction with training sessions for regional police, prosecutors and social service workers - the rank-and-file professionals seen as integral to spotting incidents of forced labor and sexual exploitation, and to keeping them from spreading. … 'Human trafficking is nothing less than modern-day slavery,' said Bradley Schlozman, the U.S. attorney for western Missouri." The AP adds, "Trafficking affects an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 victims annually - including an estimated 14,500 to 17,500 who are brought to the U.S. - and has become a top issue for the Justice Department. Schlozman, named interim U.S. attorney in March, previously worked in the department's Civil Rights Division, handling cases including trafficking. … More than 30 other regions have launched similar task forces, which aim to educate authorities on how to identify trafficking cases and how to respond to victims. No funding has yet been awarded to this region's program. … Schlozman said his office was investigating several trafficking cases in the area, including alleged incidents of forced labor and prostitution of both children and adults. … Wan Kim, the assistant U.S. attorney general for civil rights, said within a 10-mile radius of the training seminar - at a hotel near Kansas City International Airport - one could find examples of trafficking."

WTHR-TV Indianapolis (5/24, Chapman) reports on its Web site, "Now, alongside big cities like New York, Los Angeles and Chicago, Indianapolis is on the government's map when it comes to human trafficking. In a report to the Justice Department, local investigators have identified as many as 40 potential victims, some in brothels run by a growing population of immigrants. 'We're finding out that a lot of the immigration issue is tied so closely to human trafficking,' says Keith Lourdeau, agent in charge of the FBI's Indianapolis office." WTHR adds, "The Julian Center in Indianapolis is now opening its doors to human trafficking victims as part of a half-million dollar grant from the Justice Department.. ... 'We need to take off the head of the organization for it to stop,' Lourdeau says. 'We need people inside to help us out so that we can crack the ring.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029450

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Transporting Illegal Aliens. The Naples Daily News (5/24, Zeitlin) reported, "A Fort Myers man pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court today to a count of transporting illegal aliens. Eliseo Escalante Santizo…an illegal immigrant from Mexico, was arrested by the FBI in connection with a human trafficking case involving a 14-year-old-girl and 24-year-old woman from Chiapas, Mexico."

Mexican Man In Oregon Charged With Human Trafficking. KGW-TV Portland, OR (5/24, Giedwoyn) reports on its Web site, "A Mexican man living in Salem was indicted by a federal grand jury in Portland Wednesday on human trafficking charges, authorities said." Ramon Lopez-Montanez "is accused of kidnapping a woman from Mexico and threatening to harm her or her family unless she manufactured marijuana, according to the FBI and Oregon State Police. … In addition to being blackmailed and taken to Otis, Ore. for the marijuana operation, the victim was beaten, stabbed and sexually assaulted as well as caused to witness acts of violence committed against children and other women, according to the indictment."

ANTITRUST:

Former Michigan School Official Charged With E-Rate Fraud. IDG News Service (5/25, Gross) reports, "A former assistant superintendent at a Michigan school has been arrested, along with his wife, on charges of fraud involving US$7.3 million obtained from a US government program intended to help schools and libraries connect to the Internet, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) said Wednesday." IDG continues, "A federal grand jury in Detroit on Tuesday indicted Douglas A. Benit and Mary Ann Elam Benit on fraud-related charges for allegedly using his position at Ecorse Public Schools to steer contracts from the U.S. E-Rate program to a company under his control. The contracts were awarded to Coral Technology under inflated bids, the DOJ said." IDG adds, "The indictment charges both the Benits and Coral with one count of conspiring to commit federal program fraud and mail and wire fraud between March 1998 and October 2003, as well as one count of mail fraud in relation to a Coral application for an E-Rate funded project in the Ecorse schools. … Douglas Benit is also charged with two counts of federal program fraud relating to school purchases of vocational labs and payments required under the federal E-Rate program, the DOJ said. He is also charged with one count of mail fraud in relation to a September to November 2005 scheme to defraud a mortgage and a lending company while obtaining a $893,750 mortgage. … Douglas Benit and Coral are charged with two counts of wire fraud in relation to wire transmissions made in 2001 and 2002 in connection to the E-Rate fraud, the DOJ said. Benit and his wife are charged with bank fraud in a December 2002 to April 2003 scheme to defraud a Minnesota bank, the DOJ said."

Falconbridge Blasts Rivals In Inco Takeover Bid. The Financial Times (5/25, Simon) reports, "Falconbridge has accused several rival metal groups, including Swiss-based Xstrata, of putting up obstacles to European regulatory clearance of a friendly takeover bid from Inco, its fellow Toronto-based nickel miner." The Times continues, "Delays in anti-trust approvals by the European Commission and the US Justice Department opened the way for a C$20bn (US$17.8bn) hostile bid last week by Xstrata for Falconbridge." The Times adds, "Singling out Xstrata, the Swiss trading group Glencore and the French nickel miner Eramet, Derek Pannell, Falconbridge's chief executive, said this week: 'I'm sure if there had been no pushback, [the deal with Inco] would have gone a lot more smoothly.' … Glencore owns 36 per cent of Xstrata. Mr Pannell said Eramet was unhappy at failing to gain control of a Falconbridge exploration property in New Caledonia. … Mr Pannell expressed the hope that Canadian authorities would apply the same rigour in vetting Xstrata's bid as the European Commission had done with the Inco deal."

Anderson To Purchase Silver Line Building Products. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (5/25, Welbes) reports, "After 102 years as a leading maker of wood windows, Andersen Corp. is embracing vinyl. … Bayport-based Andersen said Wednesday that it's buying Silver Line Building Products Corp., one of the largest U.S. manufacturers of vinyl windows. The deal is Andersen's largest acquisition, and will give it access to vinyl window sales at the Home Depot." The Pioneer-Press continues, "Both companies are privately owned, and terms of the deal weren't disclosed. But the Silver Line acquisition will raise Andersen's annual revenue by almost a third. Hoover's Inc., a business research firm, estimated Andersen's 2004 sales at $2.5 billion, while it lists Silver Line's 2005 sales at $700 million. … Some 60 percent of the windows made in the U.S. are vinyl, which is the fastest-growing segment of the business. Silver Line's single largest customer is Home Depot, which carries its American Craftsman vinyl window line. … Andersen's move into vinyl also occurs as the market for new-home construction continues to show signs of slowing. Last week, the U.S. Commerce Department said that housing starts fell for a third straight month in April, dropping by 7.4 percent from the previous month. The April number was the lowest since November 2004." The Pioneer-Press adds, "The Silver Line acquisition still needs to pass a government antitrust review, but the two companies hope to close the deal by the end of June."

DOJ_NMG_0029451

EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Bayer's Purchase Of Schering AG. Dow Jones (5/25) reports, "The European Commission Wednesday cleared German health care company Bayer AG to purchase competitor Schering AG, creating one of the largest pharmaceutical companies in the world. The deal values Schering at EUR16.3 billion, or EUR86 a share. In a statement, the commission said the two companies are 'mainly complementary.'" Dow Jones continues, "The main overlaps are in a few over the counter and prescription anti-fungal markets. … Even in these fields, the commission said the two companies had market shares above 35% only in isolated areas: gynecological anti-fungals in Portugal, topical dermatological anti-fungals in Austria and combinations of corticosteroids with anti-fungals in Ireland. … Even there, the commission said the enlarged Bayer will 'face several strong competitors and there are no specific entry barriers in the markets.' … Bayer Management Board Chairman Werner Wenning urged Schering shareholders to approve the deal. … He said they note the antitrust approval and that his company's EUR86 per Schering share is about 61% above the unweighted 12-month average price and about 39% above the closing price of Schering shares before the takeover."

EU Is Likely To Drop Its Fight With France On Takeover Law. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, A8, Cohen) reports the European Commission "is likely to abandon efforts to strike down a French law restricting foreign takeovers, even as it has railed against rising economic nationalism in Europe." The Journal notes, "The commission's success in fighting protectionism in France could set a precedent as the EU seeks to counter rising economic nationalism in other member countries." The Commission "sees France as one of Europe's arch-protectionists," and its "regulators increasingly are finding themselves outmaneuvered by Paris."

Cablevision Recording Proposal Sparks Copyright Suit. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Grant) reports, "Seven of the leading movie and television producers filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in New York against Cablevision Systems Corp. challenging the cable operator's plan to allow viewers to store and pause TV programs on the cable system rather than on set-top boxes, firing the opening shot in a copyright battle." The Journal continues, "Cablevision, the country's sixth-largest cable operator by subscribers, has announced plans to build into its network a technology that would allow its subscribers to record every TV show, like many do with TiVo-like digital-video recorders built into set-top boxes. Cablevision believes it would be far less expensive to build the recording capability into the network than to provide hundreds of thousands of households with individual recorders." The Journal adds, "The movie and television producers, whose battles against recording technology date back to the first VCRs, charge in their lawsuit that Cablevision's plan would 'exploit' their programming 'in a manner that violates the law.' The lawsuit, which has been expected since Cablevision announced its plans, asks the court for a judgment declaring that Cablevision's plan would violate copyright law. … The plaintiffs include News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox Film Corp., Viacom Inc.'s Paramount Pictures Corp., Walt Disney Co.'s Disney Enterprises Inc., CBS Corp.'s CBS Broadcasting, General Electric Co.'s NBC Studios Inc., Disney's ABC Television Network, and Universal Studios, owned by Vivendi Universal and GE."

China Mobile Nears Deal For Millicom. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Singer, Dean) reports, "China Mobile Communications Corp. is near a $5.3 billion pact to acquire Millicom International Cellular SA of Luxembourg, operator of mobile-telephone services in many of the world's poorest nations, in a move that would expand China's influence into international telecommunications, especially in emerging markets." The Journal continues, "The expected deal -- the biggest overseas acquisition by a Chinese company -- could also have a ripple effect on Chinese suppliers of telecom equipment and mobile handsets such as Huawei Technologies Co. and ZTE Corp. China Mobile is expected to upgrade the network of Millicom, which operates in 16 countries." The Journal adds, "The deal, which could be signed within days, is the latest sign of Chinese companies' ambitions in snapping up international assets. After watching Western companies invest billions in their home market, Chinese companies in recent years have been looking at purchases abroad, most notably with Lenovo Group Ltd.'s purchase of the personal-computer division of International Business Machines Corp. For China's government, the expansion of Chinese companies overseas is part of a broader push to expand the country's global influence."

DOJ_NMG_0029452

McCain, Martin Make Case For A La Carte Cable Choices. Sen. John McCain and FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, write in the Los Angeles Times (5/25, 958K) that millions of TV viewers outside the US have the choice to "buy their television channels individually or in smaller bundles -- and get better deals as a result." In the US, "there is too little competition, too much regulation and not enough consumer choice in the cable TV business. … The solution to high cable bills isn't price controls or additional government regulation. It is more competition and more choice. For that reason, Congress should pass the proposed Consumers Having Options in Cable Entertainment Act -- the CHOICE Act -- which is being introduced today. It would allow cable companies to compete nationally for your business (rather than only at the local level) in exchange for agreeing to offer channels a la carte, either individually or in smaller bundles."

BASF Gets EU Approval For Degussa AG Purchase. The AP (5/25) reports, "EU regulators on Wednesday approved German chemical maker BASF AG's bid to buy Degussa AG's construction chemicals business." The AP continues, "BASF will pay about 2.2 billion euros ($2.6 billion) in a deal aimed at expanding its reach in a fast-growing sector. … The European Commission said its investigation showed the deal would not cause any antitrust problems even though both make performance polymers used to make concrete products. … 'Overlaps between both parties' activities lead to a combined market share that raised no competition concerns on the market for performance polymers since the combined firm would continue to face several strong, effective competitors,' it said."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Promotes Plans For Expanded Use Of Nuclear Energy. President Bush promoted his plans to expand the use of nuclear power during a visit to Pennsylvania yesterday. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/25, Shields, 423K) reports, "Bush visited Limerick's nuclear power plant this afternoon to push his broad new offensive on nuclear energy. Bush's ambitious Global Nuclear Energy Partnership is an attempt to promote construction of a whole new generation of nuclear plants in an industry which hasn't licensed one in 30 years." His proposal "faces a tough battle in Congress in the coming weeks. The House appropriations subcommittee cut it's funding in half last week, but it has powerful support in the upcoming senate budget debate. The future of the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership will likely be worked out in conference committee, observers say." The AP (5/25, Loven) notes the Limerick Generating Station is "a nuclear plant operated by Exelon Corp. about 40 miles from Philadelphia." Bush "donned a white hard hat for a brief tour, then spoke to employees in a sweltering tent set up in the shadow of the plant's two enormous cooling towers." Bush "argued that nuclear power is abundant, affordable, safe and clean."

The story got no network coverage, though it is getting attention from major newspapers this morning. Much of the coverage frames Bush's remarks in the context of high energy prices and the political pressure on Bush and the GOP. CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Malveaux), for example, reported Bush is "saying we've got to wean Americans off their addiction to foreign sources of oil. Also, of course, the President facing a great deal of pressure, if you will, from the American people, who are looking at those gas prices, very high gas prices, saying: 'What are you going to do?' Clearly, his energy plan is not a short-term solution, but a long-term solution to push forward on nuclear energy."

The New York Times (5/25, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports Bush "promoted the 2005 energy bill he signed into law, which provides tax incentives, loan guarantees and federal risk insurance for companies building nuclear plants. Before the law, he said, only 2 companies were considering building plants, but now 16 are." Said Bush, "For the sake of economic security and national security. … The United States of America must aggressively move forward with the construction of nuclear power plants." Bush also "spoke of his administration's efforts to research alternative energy sources, like solar panels, ethanol and wind turbines."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Pulizzi, 2.11M) reports Bush "said the government has a strategy of loan guarantees, production tax credits, and federal risk insurance to encourage development. He said 16 companies have expressed an interest in building as many as 25 new nuclear facilities." While the US "hasn't built a nuclear plant since the 1970s," Bush "noted that other nations are further along. France generates more than three-quarters of its electricity from nuclear power, and China has plans to construct 40 plants over the next decade." The US "has 100 nuclear plants in 31 states. Those facilities generate a fifth of the nation's electricity."

Knight Ridder (5/25, Shields) reports, "It is a pivotal time for Bush's nuclear agenda. Funding for a new nuclear initiative is being fought over in Congress. Last year, he won a host of other incentives for the nuclear industry, including tax breaks and insurance against regulatory and legal delays." Knight Ridder adds, "Another part of his plan calls for expediting the opening the Yucca Mountain storage facility in Nevada, which would allow plants such as Exelon's Limerick Generating Station to begin shipping out spent fuel that is now stored on site. Providing a place to store spent fuel is critical if new power plants are to be built."

DOJ_NMG_0029453

The Washington Post (5/25, A4, Baker, Mufson, 744K) reports, "Opinion polls suggest public attitudes toward nuclear power are shifting. Support for expanding the use of nuclear energy has grown from 43 percent to 55 percent in the past three years, according to surveys by the Gallup Organization." The Pew Research Center "found rising support in the past few months as gasoline prices have soared, from 39 percent last September to 44 percent in February. Still, 49 percent remain against expanding nuclear energy. … Some environmentalists, including Patrick Moore, co-founder of Greenpeace, have changed their minds as well, seeing nuclear energy as clean compared with fossil fuels that pollute the environment. Other environmentalists complain that Bush is overselling any benefits from nuclear power and underestimating the risks."

The Spring-Ford (PA) Reporter (5/25, Arnosky) reports that Bush said plans for new "nuclear power plants are hindered by lawsuits and 'bureaucratic obstacles.' He said his 2005 energy bill would give loan incentives, tax credits and federal risk insurance to the first six new nuclear power plants to be built. Bush also said a $1.1 billion partnership with the industry was in the works to facilitate new plants. 'I understand we need more nuclear power plants and here's a strategy to get it going,' Bush said. 'Here's a way to say to the industry, 'We're serious about this.'"

Meanwhile, under the headline "Protesters Rally Against Bush Energy Stance," the Pottstown Mercury (5/25, Moyer) reports, "Hours before President Bush shook the hands of workers at" the Limerick plant, about "25 community members and activists gathered outside Pottstown Borough Hall to protest Bush's energy policy. Lewis Cuthbert, president of the Alliance for a Clean Environment, criticized "Bush's call for building more nuclear power plants," ripping "nuclear power as too polluting, dangerous and expensive, and said it is not an answer to global warming. 'Mr. President, are you trying to deceive us, or don't you know the facts?' Cuthbert said."

Bush Also Attends Fundraiser For "Vulnerable" Republicans. The AP (5/25) reports, "Bush made a fundraising stop Wednesday for two vulnerable House Republicans seeking re-election in the Philadelphia suburbs. Calling Reps. Jim Gerlach and Mike Fitzpatrick 'two of the young stars of the United States Congress,' the president urged about 250 supporters to continue fundraising for the pair and recruiting others for their campaigns." The event "raised about $450,000 after expenses, said Gerlach spokesman John Gentzel. The money will be split evenly between Gerlach, Fitzpatrick and the Pennsylvania Republican State Committee."

Limerick Workers Welcome President's Nuclear Proposals. Under the headline, "President Bush Gets A Warm Reception From Exelon Employees," the Pottstown (PA) Mercury (5/25, Karas) reports, "It's not every day the president stops by to tell you that you're doing a good job." The Mercury adds, "About 300 of the plant's 700 employees attended a 30-minute speech by the president," who talked up the safety of nuclear power production and said, "It is safe because of advances in science and engineering and plant design," and added, "It is safe because the workers and managers of our nuclear power plants are incredibly skilled people who know what they're doing."

Another Pottstown Mercury (5/25, Brandt) piece noted that as the president stood "in front of a backdrop heralding his 'Advanced Energy Initiative,' Bush emphasized research and technology as the best way to maximize the energy resources available to the nation and thus break America's addiction to foreign oil." Prior to "making his 35-minute speech, Bush toured the station, visiting the plant's two massive generators and its control room. He praised the employees' 'strong dedication to safety,' and earned more of their applause when he said 'this plant serves two million homes in the area, and it does so in a way that does not require us to pollute the air."

House Seen As Likely To Scale Back Bush Plan To Resume Nuclear Fuel Reprocessing. The AP (5/25, Hebert) reports, "The House appeared ready to scale back President Bush's ambitious plan to resume nuclear fuel reprocessing as part of an international program to boost nuclear power." A "broad spending bill, expected to be approved by the House later Wednesday would cut Bush's request for the first installment of the nuclear initiative in half, to about $130 million. An attempt to slash it by an additional $40 million was rejected." The AP adds, "The $30 billion spending measure funds the Energy Department, related agencies and numerous federal water projects."

Spent Fuel Issue Seen As Critical To Future Of Nuclear Energy. In an editorial, the Pottstown Mercury (5/24) says the president's visit "comes at a time when the local plant is dealing with the long-simmering question of how to dispose of spent fuel rods in the future. Exelon recently unveiled plans to store used nuclear fuel on a concrete pad" and the "proposed project utilizing what is known as 'dry cask storage' has become necessary," though "Bush may discuss some other ideas on how to handle spent fuel in the coming years." The Mercury adds that the "issue of safely handling spent fuel is a critical environmental question that will become even more important as the future of nuclear energy is debated."

More Commentary. In a commentary appearing in the Valley Item (5/25) of Royersford, PA, Mike Morsch who is the Executive Director of Montgomery Newspapers, writes, "As presidential speeches go, this one was typical. He talked about his energy plan to a favorable, if somewhat calm, crowd of approximately 200 inside a big tent at the Limerick plant site. He talked for about 30 minutes, and he sounded a bit more Texas twangy than he does on television, especially during the part of his speech where he talked about reducing our dependence on foreign oil." But, Morsch adds, "it was a great honor for the nuclear station and its employees -- as well as all Limerick residents -- to have Mr. Bush in the house."

DOJ_NMG_0029454

Protesters Try To Halt Test Blast In Nevada. USA Today (5/25, Passey, 2.31M) reports, "Residents downwind of the Nevada Test Site are fighting to block a non-nuclear blast scheduled there in June, mainly because of the legacy of Cold War atomic testing. The Pentagon's Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA) plans to explode 700 tons of ammonium nitrate and fuel oil at the site, which is 65 miles northwest of Las Vegas, to test the effects of ground shock on hardened targets, such as underground bunkers." Opponents cite three objections: "There could be health hazards for those downwind because radioactive soil left over from Cold War-era atomic testing might be dispersed; the test could lead to renewed nuclear testing; and the Western Shoshone tribe claims the test would violate ancestral lands."

Utilities Scramble To Make Sure They Have Enough Coal. The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Clayton, 61K) reports that as summer approaches, electric utilities are scrambling to make sure they have enough coal on hand. According to the Monitor, "With at least a few utilities unable to get enough coal shipped by rail, some are resorting to extreme measures - even importing it." The US has enough domestic reserves to last centuries. But "getting America's abundant coal to where it is most needed is a growing challenge for power companies - and the railroads that supply them."

California Town Uses Eminent Domain To Block Planned Wal-Mart Store. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 7, 2:25, Rooney, 8.78M) reported on the use of the eminent domain power by the town of Hercules, California to take land that Wal-Mart had planned to use for a big-box story. Hercules is "a developing city of 23,000, east of San Francisco, where the city's planners have labored to give this town a certain look and feel. And right here, on 17 acres, next to new homes with a view of San Pablo Bay, Wal-Mart plans to build a new store." But the city council "voted unanimously to take Wal-Mart's land by power of eminent domain. The right to take private property for public use. The world's largest retailer is not what the city wants as the centerpiece of its planned waterfront." Towns "from Virginia to California have fought Wal-Mart before, claiming it would kill local business. But many more have welcomed Wal-Mart's jobs and tax revenue, actually using eminent domain to help the retail chain develop. But no one has ever used eminent domain to stop Wal-Mart. And in an ironic reversal of roles, the company's spokesman cried foul."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

IG Finds FBI Missed Many Opportunities To Uncover PRC Spy. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/25, Sherman) reports that in a report released yesterday about FBI informant Katrina Leung and her relationship with Special Agent James J. Smith, DOJ inspector general Glenn Fine concluded that "the FBI missed many opportunities to uncover that Leung was working for China and getting her information from Smith, as well as to learn of the long affair between the pair." Fine found that "in one instance in 2000, a tipster told the FBI that Leung was 'in bed with' the bureau's Los Angeles office," and "the FBI also failed to follow up on information that pointed directly to Smith even as the bureau was in the midst of a major espionage investigation that resulted in the arrest of Robert Hanssen." The AP adds, "The FBI said Wednesday it has learned from the many mistakes in the spy case. 'The FBI has already moved to address the systemic issues identified by' Fine that allowed Smith and Leung to escape detection for so long, the bureau said in a statement." The AP notes that "special task force was created in 2002 after FBI Director Robert Mueller, on the job for only a few months, expressed concern about the pace and scope of the investigation" in to the Leung-Smith relationship," and "Mueller asked for the inspector general's review."

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Spano, 958K) reports, "A separate review of spies against China concluded in December that FBI relationships with several of them should be 'closed' because of 'control and reliability issues,' according to Wednesday's report. The secret report also said that an FBI task force was created to investigate persistent allegations against Leung after counterintelligence operations had been compromised and several of its operatives 'had been detained and interrogated in China.'" The Times adds, "The report repeatedly uses words such as 'incompetent,' 'incomprehensible,' and 'incredible' to describe the FBI's self-investigative failings." The FBI said "that it has moved 'to minimize the risk' associated with spying operations," noting "it has implemented seven of the 11 reforms recommended by the inspector general." Under the headline "F.B.I. Missed Many 'Red Flags' On Key Informer, Review Finds," The New York Times (5/25, Lichtblau, 1.19M) notes, "As early as 1987, senior officials at the F.B.I. received word" Leung "might have had unauthorized contacts with Chinese officials," but "the F.B.I. continued using her as one of its most highly paid informants, paying her a total of $1.7 million." The bureau said yesterday that "it had taken numerous steps since 2002 to bolster management of its informants," but the "report said the F.B.I. still needed to go further."

DOJ_NMG_0029455

The Washington Post (5/25, A13, Geis, 744K) reports, "FBI officials on Wednesday acknowledged 'weaknesses in the FBI's asset program.' The agency has implemented, in whole or part, seven of 11 recommendations in the report, they said. … 'The FBI expanded its polygraph program in 2001, making all on-board employees, contractors and detailees subject to a polygraph examination,' FBI Assistant Director Charles S. Phalen Jr. wrote in response to Fine's report. 'The FBI has built, and continues to improve, a comprehensive, centralized and forward-looking security program.'" The Washington Times (5/25, Seper, 90K) also reports on the IG's criticism, and the FBI's response, under the headline "FBI Agent, Tipster Hid Relationship."

Oregon Mayor Accuses FBI Of Trying To Spy On City Government. The Oregonian (5/25, Griffin, 346K) reports Portland Mayor Tom Potter "is accusing the FBI of trying to spy on City Hall. In an open letter to Portlanders on Wednesday, Potter reported that a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent approached a city employee earlier this month seeking information about City Council members and city government. 'In the absence of any reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing, I believe the FBI's recent actions smack of "Big Brother,"' Potter wrote. … Federal officials confirmed that an agent spoke to a midlevel employee from the city attorney's office, hoping that person would serve as a source inside City Hall," but Portland Assistant SAC Daniel Nielsen "had a different take on the encounter's significance. 'We're supposed to talk to people, to develop sources, to develop relationships. … We can't do our jobs without the public,' he said." However, National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers president-elect Martin Pinales said, "I have never heard of anything like that. It's a frightening concept." And Georgetown law professor David Cole "said the FBI appeared to be operating outside its own guidelines." US Rep. Earl Blumenauer "said he will ask the FBI for an explanation. 'The report that the FBI would consider trolling for information in Portland City Hall is stunning,' Blumenauer said."

The AP (5/25, McCall) adds that at a news conference yesterday, Potter called "it a recruiting attempt that raises questions about how far the government is willing to go to spy on its citizens." But Nielsen "said an agent and a city employee 'came across each other in day-to-day activities, Starbucks and they work out in the same gym.' He said the agent made no secret about who he was, and when the city employee was 'clearly uncomfortable about the situation,' he told her she was free to report the contact. 'It wasn't the jackbooted thug coming in and putting on the klieg lights,' Nielsen said." The AP notes, "Legal experts said it would be highly unusual for the FBI to try to recruit someone outside of a specific investigation." The Portland Business Journal (5/24) also reports on Potter's allegations.

Search Continues For Source Of Fentanyl-Laced Drugs Linked To Overdoses. According to the AP (5/24), federal drug agents and the CDC "are stepping up the investigation of dozens of fatal overdoses linked to heroin laced with a strong prescription painkiller. The synthetic painkiller fentanyl has tainted the illegal heroin supply in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, authorities said. In Detroit, the drug combination has been linked to at least 23 deaths in less than a week. … 'Samples are being tested to see if we can determine if it's pharmaceutical grade or from a clandestine laboratory,' DEA agent Christopher Hoyt said." Fentanyl-laced illegal drugs have received wide media coverage, with more than 80 news outlets referring to such stories today. The latest AP story has been published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of ABC News, CBS News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, San Diego Union-Tribune, and Kansas City Star.

The Chicago Tribune (5/24, Heinzmann, Coen) writes, "As Chicago police continue investigating heroin dealers lacing their drugs with the deadly painkiller Fentanyl, federal officials are trying to determine whether the outbreak of the drug is part of an emerging national problem. … In addition to Chicago and Detroit, New Jersey and Philadelphia also have had a series of fatal overdoses in recent weeks. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has begun testing samples in controlled purchases from targeted areas…to determine if they can be linked to a common source, officials said."

The Washington Times/ UPI (5/25) cites the Chicago Tribune story in its report.

Lewes, Delaware's WGMD Radio (5/24) reports on its Web site, "The U-S Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of heroin sold in Chicago to determine if bad batches nationwide can be linked to a single source. Authorities say 15 people were hospitalized two weeks ago after using heroin bought on Chicago's West side."

Local TV Coverage. WFLD-TV, Chicago (5/24, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "Federal drug agents are stepping up their efforts to find the source of tainted heroin. … They believe the heroin has been mixed with a very important drug. The Drug Enforcement Agency is trying to figure out if it has been stolen or made in an illegal lab. They believe it does not come from one source but at least several."

WGN-TV, Chicago (5/24, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Federal drug officials have begun testing samples of heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl. Here in Chicago and several other cities, addicts have been dying after taking the contaminated drug. The fentanyl is either [stolen from] pharmaceutical warehouses or made in makeshift laboratories and can be 100 times as potent as heroin. The Fed is trying to track the drug to a common source in hopes of stopping it before it gets into street drugs."

DOJ_NMG_0029456

KWGN-TV, Denver (5/24, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Dozens of fatal overdoses of a prescription painkiller have been reported in seven northeastern states. Federal drug agents say the deaths are link to e synthetic painkiller fentanyl that's laced with heroin the combination has killed at least 23 in Detroit and ten more in Chicago. Fentanyl is 80-times stronger than morphine."

KCAL-TV, Los Angeles (5/24, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "Nearly three dozen people have died recently from overdoses on heroin laced [with] a painkiller. Dozens have been hospitalized. It has turned up in several Midwest and eastern states."

KENS-TV, San Antonio, Texas (5/24, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "The painkiller fentanyl has tainted the illegal heroin supply in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. In Detroit alone, the drug combination has been linked to at least 23 deaths in less than a week. In Chicago two weeks ago, 15 people were hospitalized after using heroin bought on the city's West side. In southern New Jersey and the Philadelphia area, at least nine heroin users died last month."

Israeli Listed Among World's Top Drug Traffickers Enters Plea In Florida. An Israeli considered to be one of the world's biggest distributors of Ecstasy yesterday pleaded not guilty to federal drug charges. The AP (5/24) reports from Fort Lauderdale that Zeev Rosenstein "entered the plea nearly three months after he was extradited from Israel to face charges that he conspired to distribute more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the United States between summer 1999 and November 2001. … Rosenstein, who was on the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's list of 44 top worldwide drug traffickers, was arrested in Israel more than a year ago." CBS News, the Washington Post, Miami Herald, Houston Chronicle, Contra Costa Times, and Jerusalem Post are among the news outlets that published the AP story.

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/25) reports, "Federal prosecutors say Rosenstein headed a drug trafficking ring spanning four continents and orchestrated the delivery of 700,000 Ecstasy pills seized in a New York apartment in 2001. Israel extradited Rosenstein, 51, to the United States in March. He is being held in the maximum-security unit of the Federal Detention Center in Miami."

Drug Runners Carrying More Drugs Across Border, Cartels Relying More On Marijuana Income. According to the AP (5/24), drug runners are "getting caught running more drugs than ever -- often over the same desert routes used by undocumented migrants -- with the U.S. Border Patrol reporting a sharp increase in the amount of marijuana seized. The Border Patrol's Tucson, Ariz., sector confiscated almost as much marijuana in the first 7 1/2 months of this fiscal year as they did all of last year, and seizures are up all along the border. … The drug runs are so difficult that Steve Robertson, a U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency special agent who has worked along the Texas border, says the average migrant couldn't make them." The AP adds, "Mexico's Attorney General, Daniel Cabeza de Vaca, said cartels are also becoming more reliant on income from marijuana."

Five Sentenced In Texas Marijuana Smuggling, Money Laundering Case. The Waco (TX) Tribune Herald (5/25) reports, "Five people who were part of a group that trucked thousands of pounds of marijuana along Interstate 35 and into Waco and Dallas were sentenced to various jail terms in Waco federal court Wednesday. The five were among at least 11 people involved in a smuggling and money-laundering operation in which thousands of pounds of marijuana were brought into Waco and Dallas, according to the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division. … According to IRS officials, beginning in 1998, [a group] packed tractor-trailer rigs in Mexico with as much as 12,000 pounds of marijuana." The prison terms ranged from 8 years to 17 years.

NY: Man Faces Charges For Selling Steroids Through Internet. In Colonie, the Albany (NY) Times Union (5/24, Higgins) reports authorities said the "seizure of $50,000 in illegal steroids announced by town police and federal investigators [yesterday] is the largest ever in the Capital Region. Christopher J. Magnano…is facing charges he received illegal steroids through the mail and courier services from other countries and re-sold them on the Internet."

Federal Agents Robbed, Carjacked In Maryland. The Washington Post (5/25, B02, Klein) reports, "Two federal law enforcement officers and another man were carjacked yesterday morning at a Prince George's County gas station as they prepared to go on vacation in South Carolina, according to police and a source with knowledge of the investigation." The Post continues, "The law enforcement officers -- one from the Secret Service and one from the Drug Enforcement Administration -- were gassing up a red Hummer with two motorcycles attached to the back at 4:30 a.m. when they were approached by a pair of gunmen, said police and the source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the case is open." The Post adds, "The three victims were on their way to Myrtle Beach, the source said. … The gunmen took money from the law enforcement officers, then demanded the keys from the Secret Service officer, who was the driver of the Hummer. He handed them over. Nothing was taken from the third man, police said.""

DOJ_NMG_0029457

California Murder Suspect Escapes In Van Stolen From US Marshals. The Oakland Tribune (5/25, McDonough) reports, "A fugitive with a history of slipping away from police avoided arrest again Tuesday when he stole a van from the U.S. marshals who had come to arrest him. … It was the second time within several hours the man had evaded police." The Tribune continues, "Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Tom Figmik said his agency received word late Monday night that murder suspect Kim Saelio, 22, was in the Dublin area. … A reputed pimp from Oakland who uses the names 'Mr. T.' and 'Tim-Tim,' Saelio is wanted by police in connection with the slaying and robbery of a man shot in Vallejo in November while meeting with a prostitute." The Tribune adds, "Vallejo police called in the U.S. Marshals Service — experts in chasing fugitives — in February to track Saelio, Figmik said. … When the marshals surrounded him at a Dublin bowling alley around midnight Monday, Saelio escaped by stealing a van rented by the marshals. … Figmik would not say how Saelio managed to steal the van, only that the theft was being investigated. He said there were no weapons in the vehicle when it was stolen."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Expected To Pass Immigration Reform Bill Today. The US Senate is expected to pass its version of an immigration reform bill today. Most media reports look ahead at the fight ahead between the Senate and the House. As the AP (5/25, Gamboa) reports, Senate "passage would set the stage for a difficult negotiation with the House, which passed legislation last year that exposes all illegal immigrants to criminal felony charges."

USA Today (5/25, Kiely, 2.31M) notes "a test vote Wednesday morning showed strong bipartisan support for the comprehensive immigration bill, which includes plans to expand visas for 'guest workers,' fines against employers who hire illegal immigrants and tough border security measures." The Senate "voted 73-25 to cut off debate and move ahead to final passage, probably by today." The Washington Times (5/25, Hurt, 90K) notes three Democrats, "Sens. Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- joined 28 Republicans to try blocking the bill on spending concerns, but they fell 10 votes short of the 41 needed to succeed."

The Washington Post (5/25, A3, Babington, 744K) headlines its story "Fragile Senate Coalition Set To Pass Bill On Immigration," and says "the very mixture of get-tough and be-kind measures that have made Senate approval possible could prove the biggest obstacle to reaching an accord with the House, where conservatives are determined to secure the borders before tackling other matters." Senate "leaders said their coalition is fragile, and it may be hard pressed to survive changes that House members signal they will demand this summer." The New York Times (5/25, Swarns, 1.19M) runs a similar story under the headline "Immigration Bill Backed In Senate, Setting Up Clash," reporting "with passage of the Senate legislation on track, senators and Bush administration officials quickly turned their attention to wooing the House. For the second straight week, the administration dispatched Karl Rove, the president's political adviser, to a meeting of House Republicans to press Mr. Bush's case for an approach broader than theirs."

The story was covered by CBS and NBC last night, while ABC did not cover it. The CBS Evening News (5/24, lead story, 1:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "The Senate tomorrow is expected to approve what has come to be called the 'roots approach.' The longer an illegal immigrant has been here, the easier it is to stay. But House leaders today said they won't go along." Tomorrow's Senate vote "sets up a showdown between the House and the Senate with two bills that have almost nothing in common, and if they can't come to an agreement, even after all of this, nothing gets done." NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 7, 0:55, Reid, 9.87M) also says "the hard part" will be "reaching an agreement with the House."

The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 2, 3:05, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The Senate bill contains a little-known provision that would put immigrants who serve at least two years of active duty in the US armed forces on a fast track to citizenship. This one was written by Senator Barbara Mikulski of Maryland in response to the tragic case of one immigrant soldier who was killed in Iraq" before his citizenship was approved.

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Lueck, 2.11M) reports "members of a bipartisan coalition backing the bill overcame another attempt by conservatives to derail it yesterday, on the grounds that it exceeded spending limits. Senators voted 67-31 to block the challenge."

Taking a pessimistic view of the bill's chances of reaching the President's desk, the Los Angeles Times (5/25, Gaouette, 958K) headlines its report "Little Progress Made on Immigration Deal." Says the Times, "As the Senate headed for a final vote on immigration policy today, the rift between the administration and House Republicans on the issue seemingly deepened Wednesday as GOP lawmakers rebuffed attempts by White House aide Karl Rove to win their support for the broad overhaul endorsed by President Bush."

The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Chaddock, 61K) reports "US senators are pushing the pedal to the metal on the first overhaul of immigration policy in two decades. The trouble is, no one is quite sure what's in it. The quickened pace in recent days has helped the Senate get to 'yes' on the 614-page bill -- a final vote is expected this week. And it's given senators a rare chance to actually legislate. But it's also produced several surprises that have caught members off guard. … In the end, the Senate raised the number of visas for high-tech workers from 65,000 to 115,000 a year. But with an automatic 20 percent escalator clause in the bill that could mean an additional 3 million foreigners will compete with American workers for high-tech jobs in the US during the next 10 years. … It's one of the many possibly unintended consequences in a bill that could have a vast impact on America's economy and society."

DOJ_NMG_0029458

House Republicans Challenge Rove On Bush Immigration Proposals. The Hill (5/25 O'Connor) reports, "Several House Republicans gave White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove an earful yesterday about their strong opposition to any immigration-reform bill that includes an avenue for citizenship." Rove, "making his second appearance in two weeks at the weekly gathering of House Republicans…fielded a series of questions — and comments — from the assembled members one week after his 15-minute presentation on the issue left many members unsatisfied." Members and staff said "most of the members spoke in harsh terms and openly challenged Rove on President Bush's rationale for pushing a comprehensive reform bill."

House GOP Said To Face Political Costs With, Without Passage Of Immigration Bill. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Hook, 958K) reports Rep. Mark Souder was "hammered by constituents for his moderate stand on illegal immigration" and "this month got 7,100 fewer votes in the GOP primary than in 2004, when he ran against the same challenger. His experience helps explain why so many House Republicans adamantly oppose any compromise that would allow illegal immigrants to earn legal status. They have concluded it could be political suicide to give ground to the Senate immigration bill, expected to pass today, which would do just that." Souder said, "The Senate bill would be worse than nothing." The Times adds other Republicans "fear a different political risk — that the party would suffer if it came up empty-handed after the long, emotional debate on immigration that has spilled from Capitol Hill into the streets of major cities."

McCain Believes House, Senate Should "Work Something Out." Sen. John McCain was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/24) about the status of the immigration bill in the Senate. McCain said, "We're on the home stretch. We'll probably pass it tomorrow morning. We have invoked cloture, which means you've only got a limited amount of hours before we vote final passage. Several more contentious amendments, but I think we're pretty well going to merge as the basic proposal went in." Asked if the House would go along with the measure, McCain said, "You know, I'm very encouraged by some of the comments that some of the House members have been making lately. They understand that we shouldn't leave this issue unaddressed. I mean, it's a terrible problem. It has to do with national security and many other aspects of American life. And I've seen some good comments out of the House. And there's no reason why we shouldn't sit down and be able to work something out."

Rohrabacher Blasts Senate "Shamnesty" Bill. GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher writes in the Washington Times (5/25, 90K), "Right now, the Senate is desperately trying to convince the American people that their immigration bill is something else -- anything else -- than what it is: a massive amnesty for all 15 million to 20 million illegal aliens without any meaningful enforcement provisions. This same open-borders crowd that has betrayed the American middle class for years is hoping to fool us again." This "shamnesty" bill "spells out the level of contempt the Senate has for middle-class Americans."

"Liberal House Republicans" Said To Be Increasingly Opposed To "Path To Citizenship." The Washington Times (5/25, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Liberal House Republicans are taking an increasingly tough stance on immigration reform and are more determined than ever to delete the portions of the Senate bill that grant citizenship rights to more than 10 million illegal aliens." Rep. Christopher Shays, described as "one of the most liberal Republicans in Congress," said, "I don't want to see a bill come to the floor of the House that gives them a path to citizenship." This is "a change from three weeks ago, before Mr. Shays attended 18 community meetings in his district, where the questions invariably turned to immigration. At the first meeting, he told a group of constituents that he supported providing a path to citizenship to illegals. Not anymore."

NYTimes Says Hastert Making Partisanship "A Sweeping Dogma." The New York Times (5/25, 1.19M) editorializes, "After all the legislative hash that the Republican Congress has made of immigration policy, the worst is yet to come. Any workable compromise that a bipartisan mix of senators may manage this week must, perforce, run into negotiations with House obstructionists. And none are more hard-core than Speaker Dennis Hastert." He "stands waiting with his triumphalist decree that no bill, even one fairly balancing border protection and enlightened naturalization law, can be put to a vote unless a majority of his Republican caucus -- not some larger majority of, yes, the people's House -- agree to it. … In the past, leaders of Democratic majorities did not hesitate to elbow Republicans out of play on issues and keep them on a leash. But bipartisanship always had a chance to prevail, while the Hastert doctrine makes partisanship a sweeping dogma."

LATimes Says Senate Should Pass Now "Disfigured" Immigration Bill. The Los Angeles Times

DOJ_NMG_0029459

(5/25, 958K) says in an editorial that the Senate's "more comprehensive approach -- tougher border security coupled with ways to address the nation's labor needs via a guest worker program and the legalization of millions of workers already in the country -- is sensible, although the bill being voted on is a rather disfigured version of the original legislation sponsored by Sens. John McCain and Edward M. Kennedy." But "senators should vote to support this bill. And then they should brace themselves for a contentious conference with the House, where not even Karl Rove can get much of a hearing when he asks for support for immigration reform."

Border Fence Seen As Bad Idea. In a USA Today op-ed (5/25), Robin Hoover of Humane Borders says, "Border fences might contribute to a perception of stability in border communities as far as local law enforcement is concerned, but they do not deter border crossers in the whole. They move migrants around a bit, but the U.S. Border Patrol union opposes the walls precisely because they are ineffective."

USA Today Backs Border Wall In High-Traffic Areas. USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) says in an editorial, "There are many reasons fences won't solve the nation's illegal immigration problems. And yet they have an undeniable logic as part of the solution. Sections of the U.S.-Mexico border are so inundated with illegal crossings that to not build a fence is tantamount to giving up. In the areas along the border south of Tucson, the Border Patrol is apprehending almost half a million people a year. While fence opponents often speak of the negative symbolism of walling off the border, the absence of any meaningful barriers in high-traffic areas is highly symbolic itself. It conveys the unmistakable message that the United States isn't serious about stemming the tide of illegal immigration."

Will Calls For Ending Bilingual Ballots. In his Washington Post column (5/25, A29), George Will says, "Declaring English the national language is a mere gesture. But by ending bilingual ballots, American law would perform its expressive function of buttressing, by codifying and vivifying, certain national assumptions and aspirations. Among those is this: The idea of citizenship becomes absurd when sundered from the ability to understand the nation's civic conversation."

Four Of Five Potential Republican '08 Candidates To Vote For Senate Bill. The AP (5/25, Sidoti) reports, "Call it an early, conservative rehearsal for the 2008 campaign for the Republican presidential nomination, four senators supporting a chance at citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants, one opposed." Sen. Sam Brownback said, "Some call it amnesty. I call it probation and parole." The AP adds Brownback is "willing to push back against conservatives — many of whom presumably will vote in primaries and caucuses in 20 months' time." Sen. John McCain, "echoing Brownback's view as well as the one espoused by President Bush," said, "In poll after poll after poll, Americans support earned citizenship and a comprehensive solution." Sen. George Allen, "seeking re-election in Virginia as well as maneuvering toward a White House bid, begs to differ." Allen said, "There are a lot of practical, principled problems with this and I am not voting for this. It rewards illegal behavior." The AP adds, "Four of five potential GOP presidential candidates — Brownback, McCain, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee — are betting the wiser vote is in favor of the bill."

African Americans, Hispanics Clashing. The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Wood, 61K) reports, "In cities where almost half of the young black men are unemployed, a debate is raging over whether Latinos - undocumented and not - are elbowing aside blacks for jobs in stores, restaurants, hotels, manufacturing plants, and elsewhere." Hispanics and blacks "tend to gravitate to the same inner-city areas and low-skill labor markets - and the result is a clash over jobs that require less skill and less education, experts say." Vernon Briggs, "a Cornell University professor who researches immigration policy and the American labor force," said, "In this era of mass immigration, no group has benefited less or been harmed more than the African-American population." The Monitor adds, "Yet a precise relationship between the presence of immigrants and the loss of black jobs has not been clearly proven in research. Rather, the influx of legal and illegal immigrants has been so massive that it has affected the internal migration of native-born Americans to the point where 'economists have given up trying to prove a one-to-one-displacement,' says Dr. Briggs."

Immigrant Students Lobby Congress For Temporary Legal Status. The Washington Times (5/25, Summers, 90K) reports Marie Gonzalez, "a model student at her Jefferson City, Mo., high school," was "one of about 70 immigrant and illegal-alien students from across the country who lobbied on Capitol Hill yesterday, sharing photos and personal stories in an effort to rally co-sponsors for the DREAM Act, a House bill that would allow temporary legal status to illegal-alien students who have been living in the United States for at least five years. The act would allow the students to complete a university degree program or serve time in the military and eventually apply for permanent residency." The students, "who included illegal aliens whose visas have expired and U.S.-born citizens who have illegal-alien parents or siblings, also urged lawmakers not vote for any bill that would lead to the separation of families."

First National Guard Troops To Be Deployed To US-Mexico Border. The AP (5/25, Baldor) reports the "first wave of about 800 National Guard soldiers will head to the U.S-Mexico border next week, including planners and leadership personnel who will stay longer than the planned 21-day missions, the National Guard chief told lawmakers Wednesday." Lt. Gen. Steven Blum "said 200 soldiers are preparing to go to each of the four border states — California, Texas, Arizona and New Mexico — around June 1. He said the initial troops will be part of a longer-term force of project managers who will stay on the job over time to provide continuity in the new border program."

DOJ_NMG_0029460

Knight Ridder (5/25, Brown) reports Bush Administration officials "have provided a number of details about the border security plan in the past week, but testimony by Blum and other officials before the House Armed Services Committee was some of the most in-depth explanations of how it's supposed to work." Blum said "that the troops deployed at any given time would represent less than 2 percent of available Guard forces. About 71,000 National Guardsmen are in Iraq out of a total force nationwide of 445,000 part-time soldiers and airmen." He added that "no forces will come from states that are likely to experience hurricanes this year."

Snow Says Bush Is Acting Quickly On Border Security. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (5/24) why the US border remains so porous four years after the 9//1 attacks. Snow said, "The question is not why we have it, it's how we fix it, and that's what the President is talking about. When the President went before the nation -- what was it -- nine days ago, the first thing he talked about is figuring out the smartest and best way to patrol the borders. That means that some places will need fences, some places will need sensors. One thing we're sure we need is a lot more Border Patrol agents, and so he's getting to work on that right away. … So for everybody out there who says we need to do border security first; the president agrees, he wants to get started within the next couple of weeks."

Border Patrol Increased Faster, Apprehended More Aliens Under Clinton. The Washington Times (5/25, Dinan, 90K) reports the US Border Patrol "increased at a faster rate and apprehended more illegal aliens per year under President Clinton than under President Bush, according to statistics from a new, unpublished congressional research briefing report." President Bush "trails his predecessor on a series of measures of border security, says the briefing from the Congressional Research Service to the House Judiciary Committee, which was based on Department of Homeland Security data." Clinton "increased the number of Border Patrol agents and pilots by 126 percent over his eight-year term, or an average of 642 per year, while Mr. Bush has averaged 411 new agents per year through 2005, for a total increase of 22.3 percent over his tenure." Although Bush "last week said his administration has caught and returned 6 million illegal aliens, that's actually a drop from any five-year period during Mr. Clinton's administration, the briefing says."

Schwarzenegger Ready For "Temporary" National Guard Deployment. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Nicholas, Vogel, 958K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "said Wednesday he was prepared to deploy National Guard troops to the Mexican border — but only temporarily — as part of a national effort to curb illegal immigration." Speaking on "the eve of a visit by Mexican President Vicente Fox, Schwarzenegger said in the clearest statement yet of his intentions that he would discuss border security with Fox and press the Bush administration for answers before making a final decision but that his inclination was to send the Guard for border patrols." The Times adds Democrats "quickly denounced Schwarzenegger's position and said the timing was poor."

Citizenship Verification Plan Said To Rely On Faulty Federal Database. The Washington Post (5/25, A1, Witte, 744K) reports in a front page story that a "federal database program with a checkered track record could dramatically expand to affect every U.S. employer and worker under provisions of the immigration legislation being considered by Congress." The program is "intended to keep illegal immigrants from working in the United States and to discourage more from entering, but in nearly a decade of small-scale tests, it has had trouble distinguishing between those who are here legally and those who are not. Fixing it and rolling it out nationwide could cost more than $1 billion."

Minuteman Founder Feels Vindicated. USA Today (5/25, Wagner, 2.31M) reports Chris Simcox, "co-founder of the Minuteman border watch movement, is feeling vindicated." President Bush "last week ordered 6,000 National Guard troops to the Mexican border, a move the 45-year-old former kindergarten teacher says is long overdue." Simcox said, "We feel that's a victory, but it's not nearly enough." He says "at least 30,000 troops are needed," and "that's why he'll press his war over illegal immigration." Simcox has "propelled himself to the forefront of America's angst-filled debate over illegal immigration."

Fox Calls For "Orderly" Flow Of Migrants. The AP (5/25, Vergakis) reports Mexican President Vicente Fox "said Wednesday that immigration is the most pressing challenge to the relationship between his country and the United States, but is also their greatest opportunity." On the second day of his four day US trip, Fox said "building a wall on the border is not the answer to illegal immigration into the United States." Speaking at a special session of the Utah legislature, Fox said, "Since the beginning of my administration, the government of Mexico has promoted the establishment of a new system that regulates the movement of people across our border in a manner which is legal, safe and orderly." The AP adds that after "his appearance in Utah, Fox flew to Washington state to meet with farmers in the Yakima Valley and Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski before moving on to Seattle. After that, he is expected to address California lawmakers and meet with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa."

DOJ_NMG_0029461

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Verhovek, 958K) reports with "immigration issues front and center before the U.S. Congress, Mexico's president made an emotion-laden visit to this agricultural valley" of Yakima "in central Washington state Wednesday, telling hundreds of farmworkers at an apple orchard that "we miss you very much in Mexico." Greeted by "a 13-piece mariachi band and a boisterous, cheering crowd in an area where nearly half the population is Latino, most with ties to Mexico," Fox "used the second day of his four-day U.S. trip to highlight support for what he called an 'orderly' guest worker program." Fox "received a generally warm welcome from legislators and business leaders in Utah and Washington state, where Gov. Christine Gregoire met him at the Yakima airport."

Mexican Border Agents Have Little Power To Stop Migrants. The New York Times (5/25, McKinley, 1.19M) reports Mexican border patrol agents "cannot arrest the migrants, or hold them for long, because they are breaking no Mexican law, unless he can prove they are paid guides." The agents "acknowledge they do little to stop the migrants on the Mexican side. Indeed, they hand out literature containing tips on how to survive in the desert and what to do if apprehended in the United States. They see their mission as saving lives, keeping people from dying in the desert."

Illegal Immigrants Using Drainage Pipes To Enter San Diego. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Marosi, 958K) reports the "vast labyrinth of drainage pipes under Otay Mesa, a booming commercial area of San Diego 15 miles southeast of downtown" is a "23-mile network" leading "to about 500 manholes scattered across about three square miles. From those openings into the bowels of the city, mud-covered migrants crawl out into streets, busy intersections and parking lots, creating a dizzying guessing game for U.S. Border Patrol agents." Agent Joe Perez said, "They're popping up all over the place." The Times adds, "The migrant traffic below truck-clogged streets and new office parks underscores the persistence and desperation of people faced with crossing one of the most heavily fortified sections of the border."

Some Immigration Experts See Border Wall As Positive Development. The New York Times (5/25, Thompson, 1.19M) reports the debate in the United States over building a wall on the US-Mexico border "has started some Mexicans thinking it is not such a bad idea. Nationalist outrage and accusations of hypocrisy over the prospect have filled airwaves and front pages in Mexico, as expected, fueled by presidential campaigns in which appeals to national pride are in no short supply. But, surprisingly, another view is gaining traction: that good fences can make good neighbors." The "clamorous debate over a border wall has confronted President Vicente Fox of Mexico at every stop during a visit to the United States that began Tuesday. While he did not publicly endorse the idea, he made clear that his government was prepared to live with increased border security as long as it comes with measures that opened legal channels for the migration of Mexican workers." Several immigration experts "have even begun floating the idea that real walls, not the porous ones that stand today, could be more an opportunity than an attack. A wall could dissuade illegal immigrants from their perilous journeys across the Sonora Desert and force societies on both sides to confront their dependence on an industry characterized by exploitation, they say."

Cuban Man Wrongly Convicted Of Rape Faces Immigration Fight. The AP (5/25, Davis) reports, "A Cuban man wrongly convicted of a 1982 rape must still answer to a federal immigration judge for not obtaining proper U.S. residency status and convictions for burglary, possession of a firearm and loitering, authorities said." The AP continues, "Orlando Bosquete, who came to the United States in the 1980 Mariel boat lift, could be deported because he never became a legal U.S. resident, Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Barbara Gonzalez said Wednesday." The AP adds, "He also broke immigration rules when he was convicted in 1995 of burglary, possession of burglary tools and possession of a firearm, according to a U.S. Justice Department notice to appear. The report also cites a 1988 conviction for loitering. … In all three cases, Bosquete, 52, was an escaped convict on the run from a 55-year sentence for a rape authorities now say he didn't commit. … Bosquete was set to be released from prison Tuesday after DNA evidence proved he did not rape the Key West woman in 1982. He was sentenced to 55 years in prison after the victim identified him in a darkened parking lot from the back of a police cruiser more than 20 feet away."

TAX:

GAO Study Finds Charities Owe Back Taxes. A GAO report to be released today has found that more than 1,200 charities that participate in the Combined Federal Campaign owe federal taxes. The Washington Post (5/25, A14, Salmon, 744K) reports, "The study found that although most of the delinquent charities owed less than $10,000, 15 owed significant amounts. One mental health clinic diverted $1.5 million it owes in payroll taxes to pay salaries, the report said. A health care provider that has received more than $2 million in federal grants owes more than $400,0000 in taxes and penalties on late payroll taxes, it said. A museum has underpaid its payroll taxes by $100,000. The study did not identify the charities."

DOJ_NMG_0029462

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Zoellick's Departure From "Subordinate Position" Imminent. In continuing coverage of reporting that began Tuesday night, the New York Times (5/25, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports that Deputy Secretary Zoellick "intends to resign…after barely 15 months in the job, aides and associates said Wednesday." The Times adds that "from his first days at the State Department, Mr. Zoellick has chafed at his subordinate position, frequently remarking that he was finding the adjustment difficult after running his own office during four years as" US Trade Representative. And "friends said, Mr. Zoellick had at times felt marginalized at the State Department, where his subordinates, including R. Nicholas Burns, an under secretary of state, manage most of the major issues, including matters related to Iran, Iraq, the rest of the Middle East and North Korea." The Times calls Burns "the logical front-runner to take Mr. Zoellick's job," but adds that Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt is "also under consideration."

The Washington Times (5/25, Kralev, 90K) says "a State Department official acknowledged that rumors had spread but said no announcement about Mr. Zoellick had been made to people in the building." The official "speculated that the deputy secretary might have received an offer he could not refuse, as was the case with Margaret Tutwiler, who was undersecretary of state for public diplomacy for a few months in 2004 before becoming vice president of the New York Stock Exchange." Zoellick's aide "noted that his boss surprised many in Washington last year when he agreed to become Miss Rice's deputy after holding a Cabinet-level position during President Bush's first term."

Editor Of Conservative Magazine To Be Bush Domestic Policy Advisor. The AP (5/25, Pickler) reports, "In the latest White House personnel changes, the editor of a conservative magazine will replace Claude Allen, the domestic policy adviser who left in February amid a shoplifting investigation." The White House "announced the appointment Wednesday of Karl Zinsmeister, who has been editor-in-chief of The American Enterprise magazine for 12 years." According to The American Enterprise Web site, Zinsmeister "has traveled to Iraq as an embedded journalist, writing three books about his experience there and writing and producing a forthcoming PBS film called 'Warriors' that profiles US troops." He "once worked for Democratic Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York, the Web site said."

The New York Times (5/25, Bumiller, 1.19M) says Zinsmeister "is not in the mold of many other White House aides who have longtime ties to Mr. Bush or Republican administrations. 'He's probably exactly what the White House needs, which is fresh blood and an endless supply of ideas,' said Kevin A. Hassett, a colleague of Mr. Zinsmeister's and the director of economic policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative policy group." But "it is unclear whether Mr. Zinsmeister will give his new White House job any clout because Karl Rove, the president's powerful political aide, has effectively operated as Mr. Bush's chief domestic policy adviser for the past five and a half years."

The Washington Post (5/25, A4, Fletcher, 744K) reports Bush said in a statement, "Karl has broad policy experience and a keen insight into many of the issues that face America's families and entrepreneurs, including race, poverty, welfare, and education. He is an innovative thinker and an accomplished executive. He will lead my domestic policy team with energy and a fresh perspective."

In an editorial, the Washington Times (5/25, 90K) says, "As founder and longtime editor in chief of the American Enterprise, Mr. Zinsmeister is an inspired choice, much like former radio host and Fox News anchor Tony Snow being named press secretary. We have no doubt that he will bring the same thoughtful conservative analyses to domestic affairs as he exhibited in running one of the country's finest publications for more than 10 years."

Schumer Seeks Floor Debate On Schwab Confirmation. CQ (5/25, Van Dongen) reports, "President Bush's nominee for US trade representative may run into trouble on the Senate floor." Though Republicans hoped to get Susan Schwab confirmed by voice vote before Friday's recess, CQ says "some Senate Democrats are talking about a debate and a floor vote on her nomination." On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Schumer said he wants a debate, which CQ says "would give Democrats another opportunity to attack what they describe as the administration's 'failed' trade policy."

Snow Says Separation From Fox News Is "Clean Break." The Washington Times (5/24, Caterinicchia, 90K) reported yesterday that one of the "first questions Tony Snow was asked at his inaugural White House press briefing concerned his ties to previous employer Fox News." Snow said, "It was a clean break." Snow said he "had about two years left on his Fox contract when he resigned. He described the process he went through to leave the News Corp. company." His last day "on the Fox books was May 7, and he officially became a White House employee May 8. Mr. Snow said government rules precluded him from receiving any future payouts or employment considerations from Fox."

DOJ_NMG_0029463

Paulison Nomination Hits Snag Over Tax Deductions. The AP (5/25, Jordan) reports Sen. Susan Collins maintained yesterday that "any irregularity is cause for concern with a presidential nominee," but said "questionable deductions on three years of tax returns" by acting FEMA director R. David Paulison were not likely to "hinder his approval as permanent chief." However, Sen. Joe Lieberman "said 'it's hard to say' whether the concerns would slow the confirmation." FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said Paulison's returns had been "prepared by a private accountant who apparently gave Paulison bad advice."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Block, 2.11M) reports "Paulison drew praise and generally favorable reviews until the questions over the deductions came up. It wasn't clear the purpose or value of the deductions." They "were discovered late Tuesday night, and came as a surprise to both the Department of Homeland Security and Mr. Paulison, DHS officials said." The Journal adds, "A derailed confirmation would be a major blow to the White House and the DHS which is stepping up efforts to shore up federal response capability before the 2006 hurricane season starts June 1."

Reichert Says Removing FEMA From DHS Not A "Comprehensive Solution." Rep. Dave Reichert, in his Congress Blog In The Hill (5/25), writes that while "everyone in Washington, DC, agrees" that FEMA "is broken," there is a lack of agreement on "how to fix it." Reichert adds that some have called for FEMA's removal from DHS, which may "look good politically…, but…is not a comprehensive solution." Reichert continues, "FEMA must be strengthened and given a more accurate mission and the resources and authority to carry it out, and its efforts must be integrated with those of local authorities who respond to disasters. Along with my colleagues from the House Committee on Homeland Security, I introduced bipartisan legislation that would do just that, creating a 21st century approach to emergency management."

Army Corps Near Goals For Levee Repair; Assessors Say It May Not Be Enough. The New York Times (5/25, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "In a breathless finale that has been called one of this generation's greatest adventures in civil engineering, the Army Corps of Engineers has all but completed its repairs to this city's ruined levee system." And though "the corps has largely achieved its goal, independent engineers say it is the goal that is the real problem." Raymond Seed, a professor of engineering at the University of California, Berkeley, "and other experts who have studied the crazy quilt of levees, flood walls, pumps and gates that have been in the process of being built for more than 40 years now say that they were never adequate to protect hundreds of thousands of people in an urban setting and that the levees themselves are now known to be fundamentally flawed."

Secret Feud Over Clinton-Era Case Blamed For Goss Effort To "Purge" CIA Operatives. In an exclusive on Newsweek's (5/24) web site, Mark Hosenball writes that Newsweek has discovered new details about "a purge of top [CIA] operatives shortly after [Director Porter] Goss's arrival in 2004. A bitter secret feud over a Clinton-era counterintelligence case was apparently a major motivation behind the loss of those seasoned intelligence veterans, sources say. … The secret feud revolves around how CIA management, led by former director George Tenet, handled a 1999 counterintelligence problem that arose as a result of the Clinton administration's bombing of Belgrade to oust Serbian dictator Slobodan Milosevic. Though the counterintelligence investigation ended years ago, egos and reputations were so deeply bruised that participants on both sides of the dispute (who spoke to NEWSWEEK anonymously because the matter is still considered sensitive) still fume when discussing the case. The CIA declined to comment on the matter."

Supreme Court Clerks Predominately White Males. The Legal Times (5/25, Mauro) reports, "The intense competition for Supreme Court clerkships has been compared more than once to a market that responds to economic forces. … If the analogy works, then it has been a very bullish year for clerkship futures." The Times continues, "Think of it: A former high court clerk, John Roberts Jr., has succeeded another former clerk, William Rehnquist, as chief justice. Two excellent books have just been published on the history and power of clerks, also adding luster to the job. … The resignation May 10 of Judge J. Michael Luttig from the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals abruptly shut off a major pipeline of high court clerks, intensifying competition among other judges. Luttig has sent 43 of his 45 law clerks to the Supreme Court in the past 15 years." The Times adds, "Cap that with reports of law firm hiring bonuses of $200,000 for former clerks, and the job's luster seems brighter than ever. … But as high court clerkships drift ever upward into the stratosphere of earthly rewards to which young lawyers can aspire, one stark reality persists: Recipients of this prize are overwhelmingly white, and mostly male. … Eight years after attention was first called to the dearth of minorities among high court clerks, it appears that only three of the 37 clerks serving at the Court this term are nonwhite. No Hispanics or Native Americans seem to be among the ranks of law clerks, and not a single African-American male. … Viewed another way, it appears that all of the clerks are white in the chambers of seven of the nine justices. Only Justices Clarence Thomas and Stephen Breyer have hired minorities this term."

DOJ_NMG_0029464

Administrative Judges Oppose Linking Pay To Performance. The Washington Post (5/25, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "When it comes to federal pay, should there be consistency or equity inside government? Should pay hinge at least in part on job performance? Are there jobs where performance cannot be measured or rewarded in the usual way?" These questions "played out in miniature recently before a House subcommittee looking at pay and retirement benefits of administrative law judges. … ALJs think they got left behind two years ago after the Bush administration and Congress overhauled the pay system for the Senior Executive Service, and they would like to be paid at a rate that is comparable to the SES rate. ALJs also oppose linking their pay to performance factors, contending that their jobs must be seen as independent of political pressure and the whims of their agencies."

Congress To Miss Memorial Day Deadline For Supplemental Spending Bill. The AP (5/25, Taylor) reports congressional Republicans "will miss a Memorial Day deadline set by the White House to complete work on a huge bill to supply new funds for troops overseas and hurricane victims at home." Even though "closed-door talks between top House and Senate negotiators had produced a series of tentative agreements, obstacles such as President Bush's $1.9 billion request for a new border security initiative are proving too difficult to resolve before Congress leaves Friday for a weeklong Memorial Day recess." House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis said, "We are going to take the necessary time to develop the right product that is narrowly focused on the war on terrorism and hurricane recovery." Lewis "said an agreement would be reached soon after Congress returns in early June." The AP adds that just last week, "the White House sent lawmakers a letter saying that it is 'critical' that the measure — which ballooned from Bush's $92.2 billion request to almost $109 billion during its consideration by the Senate — be enacted before the end of May."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Rogers, 2.11M) reports conferees' failure to reach agreement on the supplemental spending bill is "adding to recent tensions with the White House." The "slow progress has irritated the Bush administration, which submitted its initial requests more than three months ago. The Pentagon, and especially the Army, has been counting on the money to replenish operations accounts strained by the accelerated pace of spending in Iraq. Mr. Lewis said the services 'informed us they can tolerate a delay into June.'"

House GOP Unity Seen As Dissolving. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Rogers, 2.11M) reports last week "ought to have been a good one for Republicans in Congress: The House passed a budget, President Bush signed more tax cuts and immigration legislation advanced in the Senate with the blessing of the White House." But "within days of the budget passing, Republicans fell into an ugly spending fight, impugning one another's honesty and patriotism on the House floor. Public resentment of oil-company profits, meanwhile, opened the door to a rout by environmentalists on the first 2007 appropriations bill. Even an elaborately staged tax-cut publicity event unraveled at the foot of the Capitol steps." The "budget infighting, the muddled news conference and the floor debate over federal lands can't be ignored: Democrats lost power in 1994 when they kept fighting among themselves, oblivious to their House burning around them."

Unfunded Government Retirement Benefits Reach $57.8 Trillion. USA Today (5/25, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports a USA Today analysis shows "taxpayers owe more than a half-million dollars per household for financial promises made by government, mostly to cover the cost of retirement benefits for baby boomers." Federal, state and local governments "have added nearly $10 trillion to taxpayer liabilities in the past two years, bringing the total of government's unfunded obligations to an unprecedented $57.8 trillion. That is the equivalent of a $510,678 credit card debt for every American household. Payments on this delinquent tax bill must start soon if financial promises to the elderly are to be kept."

Senate Leaders Snub Lieberman, Collins In Naming Lobbying Overhaul Conferees. Roll Call (5/25, Newmyer) reports that with "a number of ethics-related probes of lawmakers intensifying, Senate leaders moved this week to put new momentum behind an overhaul of lobbying rules by naming negotiators to work out differences in the long-stalled bills." The five negotiators "are Republican Sens. Trent Lott (Miss.), Ted Stevens (Alaska) and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and Democratic Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Daniel Inouye (Hawaii)." The move "cut out two lawmakers key to shaping the Senate measure — Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and ranking member Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) — drawing a fresh round of criticism from ethics watchdogs." Also "absent from the conference committee will be Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a noted voice on reform issues who introduced the base bill on which the lobbying reform measure was built."

FDA Chiefs Overruled Staff On Morning After Pill. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports that court transcripts to be released today show that the last two appointees to head the FDA "were closely involved in decisions to overrule the agency's medical reviewers and block the 'morning-after' birth control pill from being sold without a prescription." Last year, Lester M. Crawford "personally took the decision away from his top subordinates, according to depositions of two senior Food and Drug Administration officials. And at an earlier stage in the process, his immediate predecessor as FDA commissioner, Mark B. McClellan, raised objections that formed the basis for overruling medical reviewers." The Times adds, "The transcripts provide the most detailed look yet at an internal review that some critics say has been tainted by politics."

DOJ_NMG_0029465

OTHER NEWS:

Sales Of New Homes Up 4.9%, But Number Of Homes On Market Hits Record. NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 6, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said last week the once scorching housing market is now cooling off in an orderly way. New numbers out today on new home sales seem to back up that assessment, while sales of new single family homes increased by a higher than expected 4.9% last month. There is also a more sobering statistic here. The backlog of unsold homes hit a record 565,000. It would take almost six months to sell off all that inventory in homes, and that already has some homeowners worried about housing on the bubble."

Under the headline "New Signs Of A Slowing Economy In 2 Federal Reports," the New York Times (5/25, Peters, 1.19M) reports, "New-home sales rose last month, but failed to keep up the robust growth pace of March. The home sales numbers, along with a second government report yesterday that showed a steep decline in orders for durable goods, were seen as pointing to a softening economy." But "the numbers did little to reassure investors hoping that the economic data would encourage the Federal Reserve not to raise interest rates when it meets next month." The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Whitehouse, 2.11M) and USA Today (5/25, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) run similar reports.

The Washington Post (5/25, D3, Crutsinger, 744K) runs a more positive assessment of the home sales data, reporting, "Sales of new homes rose unexpectedly in April to the fastest pace this year as the housing sector showed resilience in the face of rising mortgage rates."

Stock Markets Break Losing Streak, Close With Small Gains. NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, the Dow was up almost 19 points [to close at 11,117.32], Nasdaq up 10 1/2 [to close at 2,169.17]." USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500 also rose 1.99 points to 1258.57. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, McKay, 2.11M), among other sources, also reports the stock numbers.

More Commentary On Economy. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (5/25, 1.19M), "You don't hear much from the American worker anymore. Like battered soldiers at the end of a lost war, ordinary workers seem resigned to their diminished status. The grim terms imposed on them include wage stagnation, the widespread confiscation of benefits (including pensions they once believed were guaranteed), and a permanent state of employment insecurity." He adds, "For an unnecessarily large number of Americans, the workplace has become a hub of anxiety and fear, an essential but capricious environment in which you might be shown the door at any moment."

NLRB Decisions Could Restrict Union Membership For Some. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Maher, 2.11M) reports a series of legal decision currently pending before the National Labor Relations Board could restrict union representation for some workers, and "deal a major setback to the struggling labor movement's efforts in growing areas of the economy such as health care." The cases "will help define when nurses and other workers qualify as supervisors, who are excluded from collective-bargaining rights under labor law. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has argued that unions currently organize many workers who fit the definition of supervisor under the law. The board's five members were appointed by President Bush, and organized labor has criticized its recent decisions as pro-business."

Firms Gave To Groups That Provided Free Trips For Judges. The Washington Post (5/25, A27, Weiss, 744K) reports that the Community Rights Counsel, a nonprofit Washington law firm, has released records showing that two organizations that have provided free trips to hundreds of federal judges received large contributions from tobacco, oil and other corporate interests. The Montana-based Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment (FREE) and George Mason University's Law & Economics Center "previously said corporate money does not pay for the judges' seminars or declined to disclose their donors." But the documents "show that corporations including Exxon Mobil, Philip Morris and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco have contributed tens of thousands of dollars toward these programs."

Parties' Efforts To Recruit Congressional Candidates Examined. USA Today (5/25, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports Democrat Lois Murphy's decision to run for a Pennsylvania House seat "was a small early victory in the Democrats' drive to break the GOP's 12-year hold on the House of Representatives: She already had shown she could raise money and draw votes." Long before "anyone casts a vote, recruiting can determine the fate of a party. The goal is a strong candidate in every winnable race, but recruiters often fall short." The "competition is intense. Recruiters often target the same people — Republicans and Democrats tried at various points for ex-Redskins quarterback Heath Shuler, now running as a Democrat for a House seat in North Carolina. And there's no single formula for persuading someone to run."

DOJ_NMG_0029466

Rothenberg Sees Mounting Evidence GOP Control Of House At Risk. In his Roll Call column (5/25), Stuart Rothenberg says, "While there is plenty of evidence that voters are dissatisfied with the president, Congress and the direction of the nation, I am finally seeing a significant amount of evidence at the local level — in polling data and in recent primary election results — that the national mood is having an impact on incumbents." Incumbent GOPers "are taking more of the heat, and they are likely to suffer far more in November." In Pennsylvania, "state legislators who supported a pay raise for the three branches of state government, including themselves, fell like flies in the state's May 16 primary. But the federal race that raised eyebrows involved the 10th Congressional district, where veteran Republican Rep. Don Sherwood (who admittedly has unique problems of a personal nature) squeezed out a 56 percent to 44 percent primary win over a prohibitive underdog." In addition, a "number of early polls now suggest greater vulnerability among Republican incumbents this cycle than I had previously assumed." Democratic polls "in Republican-held districts such as California's 11th (Richard Pombo), Indiana's 8th and 9th (John Hostettler and Mike Sodrel), Pennsylvania's 10th (Sherwood), Kentucky's 4th (Geoff Davis), and North Carolina's 8th and 11th (Robin Hayes and Charles Taylor) show Democrats running better against GOP incumbents than they should if this were a "normal" election cycle. In some of these districts, the Democrat is essentially unknown but running well ahead of his or her name identification." The "best evidence that the national GOP meltdown is affecting individual Republicans may well be North Carolina's 11th district, where Taylor is facing Democratic challenger Heath Shuler." Rothenberg adds, "And that's why Republicans in 2006 are starting to look like the Democrats in 1994."

Abramoff Scandal Takes Toll On Burns. Roll Call (5/25, Duran) reports national Democrats "may consider Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) the poster boy for the Jack Abramoff scandal and in deep trouble politically. But back home in Big Sky country, he's just Conrad — and doing just fine." Eastern Montana "is Burns' stronghold, and if watching him work the crowd" at the Bucking Horse Sale "is any indicator, the folks out here don't seem too eager to buck the three-term Senator from office." But while Burns "vehemently denies that he did any favors for Abramoff, the allegations have taken a toll. His poll numbers have sunk and the Democrats are doing everything they can to make sure he does not rebound. The Montana Democratic Party, aided by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, began airing television commercials last August raising the question of whether Burns broke the law."

McCain Returns Contributions To PAC. The Washington Post (5/25, A15, Cillizza, 744K) reports Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) "returned $20,000 in campaign contributions from two prominent Texas businessmen after staff members for his political action committee discovered that there was an investigation into one of their companies." The donations "were made to Straight Talk America -- McCain's leadership political action committee -- by Sam and Charles Wyly, billionaire brothers who have been major players in Republican fundraising for years. Each cut a $5,000 check to Straight Talk, as did Sam's wife, Cheryl, and Charles's son, Charles III." The "contributions drew notice because the two brothers bankrolled Republicans for Clean Air, a soft-money 527 group that attacked McCain for his environmental record during his 2000 presidential campaign." The Wylys "are the subject of state and federal investigations centered on their transfer of revenue from stock options to offshore family trusts."

Roll Call (5/25, Kane) reports the "much-hyped detente between Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and big Texas donors to President Bush ran into an embarrassing snag last month, prompting the Senator to return $20,000 in donations from the Wyly family after realizing they were being investigated by federal tax authorities." McCain, whose "active courtship of Bush's financial network has been widely promoted by his political aides, gave back the checks from Sam and Charles Wyly Jr. and other relatives after his political action committee's 'vetting system' turned up multiple probes into the Wylys regarding their offshore holdings on the Isle of Man."

Gore Says He Has No Plans To Run For Office. The AP (5/25) reports Al Gore is "talking as if he has ruled out another run for the presidency. 'I don't intend to be a candidate ever again,' the former Democratic presidential candidate said in an interview broadcast Wednesday." But the AP adds Gore "then invoked the time-honored language of politicians who know it's perhaps folly to categorically rule anything out." On NBC's Today Show, Gore added, "I've said I'm not at the stage of my life where I'm going to say never in the rest of my life will I ever think about such a thing."

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 5, 3:55, Brokaw, 9.87M) reported, "The Vice President's film tonight, which is called 'An Inconvenient Truth', is a stylish and compelling video version of an argument that he's been making for a long time that global warming is real and it's getting worse. But, to many of his former political allies, this is a film about more than global warming." Gore is "suddenly everywhere again, the leading man in a new documentary that graphically describes the realities and consequences of global warming." Gore's "high-profile involvement in this film and in other public appearances these days is causing a political buzz. Already your friends and admirers are saying to me, after seeing the film, he's running again." Gore: "I have no intention of being a candidate again." Brokaw: "No intention or a firm commitment?" Gore: "Well no intention, no plans, and I am involved in a kind of campaign but it's not for candidacy, Tom. It's a campaign to change the minds of the American people."

DOJ_NMG_0029467

Gore May See Buzz About Political Prospects As Way To Boost Film. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 10, 2:20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Al Gore is back with a new kind of campaign, not a political one, but one for his signature cause. Mr. Gore is the star of a new documentary about global warming. Intended or not, it's got a lot of people talking about Al Gore." ABC (Harris) added, "The movie is creating buzz. But will it create results? The producers say it will help shift the debate on an issue, that's never been at the top of the national to-do list. But documentaries rarely create real social change. And it's unclear whether the people who need convincing will go see it." The substance "may be overshadowed by speculation about whether the movie's a spring board for a presidential run. Some Democrats are encouraging Gore, because they're worried about Hillary Clinton's chances." Gore says "he's not running. But hasn't said he won't run. One commentator recently said, perhaps Gore isn't using the buzz from his movie to boost his presidential prospects. Maybe he's using the buzz from his presidential prospects to boost his movie and his cause."

Broder Notes "Buzz" During Clinton Speech Was About NYTimes Story On Her Marriage. David Broder writes in the Washington Post (5/25, A29, 744K), "The two sides of Hillary Rodham Clinton -- the opposites that make her potential presidential candidacy such a gamble -- came into sharp focus Tuesday morning at the National Press Club." The "buzz in the room was not about her speech -- or her striking appearance in a lemon-yellow pantsuit -- but about the lengthy analysis of the state of her marriage to Bill Clinton that was on the front page of that morning's New York Times. … Three times in the question-and-answer session, she referred to her husband as 'Bill,' praising him for seeing that his library in Little Rock incorporated a lot of energy-saving features. Other than that, the elephant in the room went unmentioned."

Feith Met With Hostility By Georgetown Faculty. Under the headline "Faculty's Chilly Welcome for Ex-Pentagon Official," the New York Times (5/25, DeParle, 1.19M) reports, "The move to a teaching position at the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown by [Douglas] Feith, a former Pentagon official, set off a faculty kerfuffle, with 72 professors, administrators and graduate students signing a letter of protest, some going as far as to accuse him of war crimes." Feith has received a "two-year appointment" (ineligible for tenure) from the school dean and the Georgetown provost.

Reagan, Bentsen Comments Cited As Classic Political Put Downs. The Washington Post (5/25, C1, Copeland, 744K) examines rhetorical put downs, citing the late Sen. Lloyd Bentsen's debate comment to Dan Quayle, 'Senator, you're no Jack Kennedy,'" and late President Ronald Reagan's, "There you go again" line to then-President Jimmy Carter as examples of "yo-momas from which no one can recover." The Post adds, "The perfect put-down is a checkmate, and the smart opponent…will laugh and concede the round."

WSJournal Eulogizes Bentsen. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M) eulogizes former Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, who died earlier this week. The Journal remembers Bentsen "as the Senate Democrat who helped make the supply-side revolution possible. … To his credit, Bentsen was willing to consider new ideas, even some offered by non-establishment thinkers. He became, at a crucial moment, a convert to the supply-side policy mix of tighter money to re-establish price stability and tax cuts to lift incentives to work and invest. … Lloyd Bentsen was what used to be known as a growth Democrat, or what we like to call a Jack Kennedy Democrat."

Former NTSB Chief Warns Secondary Roads Being Neglected. Former National Transportation Safety Board chairman Jim Hall, who now heads Hall & Associates LLC, a safety and security consulting and government relations firm, in an op-ed in USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) warns that legislators are increasingly building new toll roads to pay for infrastructure, but ignoring the impact on secondary roads. Hall states, "Now is the time for leadership at the federal and state levels to require a percentage of toll road profits to be used to improve the safety of secondary roads. Otherwise, we will be traveling down a very dangerous road, indeed, creating two classes of safety: safe highways for drivers with money, and unsafe roads for the rest."

Rice Rules Out Direct Talks With Tehran As Snow Is Seen As Hinting At Possibility. USA Today (5/25, Slavin, 2.31M) runs a story headlined "White House Hints At Talks With Iranians," reporting "the Bush administration said Wednesday it might talk to Iran about the nuclear issue but only if Iran suspends its uranium enrichment program. 'When that happens…then there may be some opportunities,' White House spokesman Tony Snow said." Snow "declined to give details other than to say the talks would include other countries."

DOJ_NMG_0029468

The New York Times (5/25, Weisman, 1.19M) reports the Administration yesterday "rejected calls for a direct dialogue with Iran over its nuclear program and declared that the United States had taken steps toward closing differences with Europe, China and Russia on a package of incentives and threats of punishment for the Iranian government. After a day of talks in London on a package" of incentives, Secretary Rice "said more work needed to be done in coming days or weeks. 'The London meeting had good progress. We did not expect that they were going to finalize all matters, and I think they're still working on some matters.'"

The Washington Times (5/25, Sands, 90K) says that while the Bush Administration "yesterday rejected the idea of direct talks with Iran," it "is facing increasing calls from allies, policy experts and even Mr. Bush's fellow Republicans to consider the first direct talks with Iran's Islamic regime since the 1979 seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran." Snow, says the Times, "said the United States would not even consider face-to-face negotiations until Iran bowed to international demands to halt its uranium enrichment program, a critical step in the development of nuclear weapons." AFP (5/25) also says "the White House, under growing pressure to have bilateral talks with Tehran, insisted there would be no direct negotiations with Iran unless it suspends its uranium enrichment program."

The AP (5/25, Gearan) reports Rice "said talks Wednesday on perks and penalties meant to stop Iran from pursuing nuclear activities that the West fears could produce a bomb produced 'good progress,' suggesting the United Nations could act soon if Tehran remains defiant. Meanwhile, the possibility of direct talks between Iran and the United States appeared distant despite back channel overtures from Iran and additional pressure on Washington from its negotiating partners and others." Rice had been meeting with IAEA head Mohammed El-Baradei, who "told reporters the United States alone must decide if it wants to sit down for direct talks with Tehran, something the Bush administration has rejected as premature at best. White House press secretary Tony Snow ruled out direct talks at least until Iran ends all uranium enrichment, which Iran has refused to do, and allows international inspections."

The Financial Times (5/25, Dombey, Dinmore) keys on continuing US-Russian disagreement, saying, "Moscow and Washington failed to overcome their differences over Iran's nuclear programme yesterday, with a meeting of top diplomats in London unable to agree on what sanctions or incentives to present to the Islamic republic. … With speculation continuing that a diplomatic impasse could lead to a US military strike on Iran, the EU believes both threats and incentives are necessary to convince Tehran to halt development of the nuclear fuel cycle." The Times adds that Undersecretary Burns "also spoke to diplomats from Canada, Japan and Italy about possible sanctions and counter-proliferation measures, a US official said, signalling US efforts to broaden its coalition."

More Commentary On Iran. Yale professor Abbas Amanat writes in the New York Times (5/25, 1.19M), "It is easy to label Iran's quest for nuclear energy a dangerous adventure with grave regional and international repercussions. It is also comforting to heap scorn on President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for his earlier denial of the Holocaust and his odious call for the obliteration of the state of Israel. … Yet there is something deeper in Iran's story than the extremist utterances of a messianic president and the calculated maneuvering of the hard-line clerical leadership that stands behind him. We tend to forget that Iran's insistence on its sovereign right to develop nuclear power is in effect a national pursuit for empowerment, a pursuit informed by at least two centuries of military aggression, domestic meddling, skullduggery and, not least, technological denial by the West."

Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/25), "Even though Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is pursuing a diplomatic track to stop Iran from going nuclear, Bush's liberal critics are demanding an even more generous (or 'realistic') stance: A US offer of direct negotiations and a possible 'grand bargain' including security guarantees. Right-wingers, for their part, advocate preparations for military strikes." He adds, "I come down thinking that Bush ought do it all vis-à-vis Iran: Unleash the US ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to explore openings with Iran for a grand deal, while also keeping up the diplomatic drive for stiff economic sanctions and preparing to bomb (or let Israel bomb) if nothing else works."

Olmert Impresses Congress With Anti-Terror Talk, Separation Plan. Several major newspapers featured coverage of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's address to a joint session of Congress. Most of the stories remark on the positive reaction on the Hill to the Prime Minister's speech. The AP (5/25) reports Olmert told Congress "that Israel would be a 'willing partner in peace' with the Palestinians, but would draw its own borders in the West Bank should it conclude it has no negotiating partner." He "drew a sustained standing ovation when he declared, 'We will not yield to terror,' a reference to suicide attacks on Israelis such as those that killed a 16-year-old American high school student observing the Passover holiday in Israel this year." Olmert "said the West Bank withdrawal is vital to Israel's security and the cause of peace and cannot go forward without U.S. support," and "called on the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to seek a negotiated solution -- the preferred route for both Mr. Olmert and President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0029469

The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Branigin, 744K) says Olmert "urged the Palestinian Authority to meet his terms for peace talks or face a unilaterally imposed settlement in the West Bank, and he warned that a nuclear-armed Iran would constitute 'an intolerable threat' that he said 'cannot be permitted to materialize.'" Olmert "acknowledged Palestinians' 'national aspirations' and asserted that Israel has no desire to rule or oppress them. But he said Israel cannot wait indefinitely for the Palestinians to become acceptable negotiating partners, and he outlined" his unilateral disengagement plan. He "was repeatedly interrupted by ovations," and "stressed common ideals and said the United States and Israel share resolve to confront 'the scourge of suicide terrorism.'"

The New York Times (5/25, Erlanger, 1.19M) says Olmert "left Washington for home late Wednesday a pretty happy man. He was embraced by President Bush and reassured about Iran, and he received 16 standing ovations from a joint meeting of Congress for a speech that was strong on emotion and rhetorically tough on terrorism and Iran. More important, Mr. Olmert received just enough presidential support for his main initiative -- another unilateral pullback of Israeli settlers, from a large portion of the West Bank — to satisfy an Israeli public that craves American approval and respect." The Times says, however, that "those around Mr. Olmert were a little disappointed, too, that the American embrace of what Mr. Olmert is calling realignment was so tepid and conditional, especially given that the task of pulling some 70,000 Israeli settlers out of the West Bank will dwarf, in emotional cost as well as numbers, the much-praised withdrawal from the Gaza Strip." Knight Ridder (5/25, Douglas), Financial Times (5/25, Morris) and Washington Times (5/25, Fagan, 90K) run similar reports.

More Commentary On Olmert's Speech. The New York Times (5/25, 1.19M) editorializes, "Speaking to Congress yesterday, Mr. Olmert said Israel was willing 'to negotiate with a Palestinian Authority.' He added, 'In a few years they could be living in a Palestinian state, side by side in peace and security with Israel.' We'd like to see that, too. We only hope that Mr. Olmert and Mr. Bush realize that there will not be peace in the Middle East unless the Palestinians have a say in creating a state that can function."

Key Abbas Security Aide Assassinated. The Washington Times/AP (5/25, Barzak) reports Nabil Hodhod, "a Gaza security chief loyal to the Palestinian president was killed Wednesday when his car blew up, the second attack on a top commander in less than a week. There was no claim of responsibility, but the explosion came at a time of an increasingly bloody power struggle between President Mahmoud Abbas' forces and those of the Hamas-led government." The AP calls Hodhod "the highest-ranking official to be killed in a week of violent incidents, sparked by Hamas' fielding of its own militia in defiance of a ban by Abbas. Two other senior security officers have been targeted."

Israeli Raid Leads To Riot In Gaza Strip. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, King, Abukhater, 958K) reports, "Violence spread Wednesday from the volatile Gaza Strip to the West Bank, where Israeli troops shot dead four Palestinians in this usually placid city after a riot broke out during an Israeli arrest raid." The fighting in Ramallah, "the Palestinians' administrative and commercial capital, was the most intense in the city since a massive Israeli military incursion into the West Bank four years ago when they laid siege to the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's compound. Now forays by Israeli troops into the city center are rare, particularly during daylight hours." The New York Times (5/25, Myre, 1.19M) and Washington Post (5/25, A21, Wilson, 744K) run similar reports.

Novak Says Hyde Urging Bush To Act On Behalf Of Palestinian Christians. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (5/25) writes this morning that Rep. Henry Hyde "is pleading the case of endangered Palestinian Christians to President Bush." Hyde "said in a letter sent Friday to the White House: 'I cannot be blind when Israeli actions seem to go beyond the realm of legitimate security concerns and have negative consequences on communities and lands under their occupation.' He urged the president to take up this issue with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on his Washington visit this week." Hyde also sent the White House a report "prepared by his staff based on visits to Israel and Palestine over the past two years" that said the "Israeli security wall and expanding Jewish settlements in the West Bank…'are irreversibly damaging the dwindling Christian community.'" Novak notes, however, "There is no sign that Bush studied the House report or even that it made its way through an unsympathetic National Security Council staff into his hands. … 'It would be helpful,' says the Hyde report, 'if the United States Government committed itself to working with the Israeli government to end support for and prevent the establishment of new realities on the ground, which complicate a negotiated solution over Jerusalem, destroy its multicultural identity and constitute an increase in the political volatility of the city.' But will George W. Bush be that helpful?"

WHO Investigating Indonesian Avian Flu Cluster Outbreak. As World Health Organization investigators continue to investigate whether the avian flu deaths of eight family members in Indonesia were caused by human transmission of the virus, media coverage continues to mount. All three networks and the nation's dailies dedicated extensive coverage to the WHO's investigation which has raised the possibility that the H5N1 virus has mutated and could cause a pandemic.

DOJ_NMG_0029470

ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 3, 2:20, Litke, 8.78M) reported, "By the time medical investigators began reaching the remote village, nearly all the victims had been buried and many of the villagers were too grief-stricken, and too frightened, to recall events, making the mystery that much difficult to solve." There "have been a few cases of human-to-human virus in Asia. Between mother and child. Between patient and health worker. But those are clusters of two. This case involves up to eight victims. What also troubles the World Health Organization, no one has found the original source of the outbreak."

On ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 4, 0:55, Vargas, 8.78M), medical editor, Dr. Tim Johnson, said the fact that virus samples so far show no mutations is "so far, very reassuring. And the second fact that it hasn't spread since two weeks ago, in the village or in the families of the village, is also I think very reassuring. If this has mutated into a pandemic virus, would have spread to hundreds, probably thousands of cases."

The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 4, 1:55, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Romania is taking steps tonight to fight the spread of bird flu, putting dozens of communities under quarantine to contain a new outbreak. In Indonesia, it now appears likely the virus spread person-to-person among eight members of the same family, killing seven of them, but the World Health Organization says this does not mean that bird flu has mutated into a form that could cause a worldwide epidemic." Dr. Anthony Fauci, National Institute of Allergy & Infectious Diseases: "The important point that we should emphasize to the public is that in examination of the virus itself, there doesn't appear to be any of those molecular or genetic changes or mutations as we call them that are associated with what we would consider a better transmissibility from human-to-human."

In separate interview on CNN's The Situation Room (5/24) Fauci said, "The somewhat encouraging news thus far within the framework of a serious situation is that there have not been other cases outside of the family unit. In other words, not a casual contact, not any of the nurses or the doctors or others who were taking care of them. So this could be a reflection of one of those unusual cases where you do get a family cluster." And in yet another interview on ABC News' Nightline (5/24, Moran) Fauci was asked if the family cluster means we are "one step closer to a pandemic." Fauci responded, "No. It doesn't. It's something you have to take very seriously and observe. If the virus itself changed and we saw there was casual contact beyond what the family unit was showing us, then I would be concerned that the virus was evolving in a way that was more efficient."

NBC Nightly News (5/24, lead story, 2:30, Francis, 9.87M) reported, "No one else outside the family is ill, not friends or hospital workers. The peasants are as baffled as scientists. Was it from the poultry that roams free or the pigs that kids play with? The World Health Organization's top epidemiologist here says villagers finding a sick bird may have cooked and eaten it." Dr. Steven Bjore, World Health Organization epidemiologist: "There's no security cams out there that we can go back and look at to see where someone actually touched a bird. That's just not possible. So we're really working backwards as best we can in a difficult situation."

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 2, 1:10, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "The WHO had a containment plan that called for very severe action if it was only a cluster of five people with human-to-human transmission, but when they took a close look at the case and found that it was contained to this one family, they decided to step down. But if there are any more cases in this village that could change very quickly."

USA Today (5/25, D11, Manning, 2.31M) adds Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said, "There is no sign of an impending pandemic," but conceded that this is "probably the third example where we've seen pretty good evidence" that the virus passed from one person to another. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Chong, 958K) quotes WHO spokeswoman Maria Cheng as saying "investigators had not found H5N1 in the animals in that area, so the likely explanation is human-to-human transmission."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/25, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports Dick Thompson, "a WHO official who arrived in Indonesia yesterday," said that it would "probably take a while to decide whether human-to-human transmission had occurred, because that determination was largely made by process of elimination."

Indonesian Findings May Raise Global Alert Level. The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Sipress, 744K) reports the World Health Organization "might soon convene an expert panel to decide whether an unprecedented human outbreak of bird flu in Indonesia should trigger a higher global alert for a possible pandemic," health officials said Wednesday. If the global alert status were increased, the Post says international stockpiles of antiviral drugs "would probably be shipped to Indonesia and travel from the country would be monitored in an attempt to contain the outbreak."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, A6, Zamiska, 2.11M) quotes WHO spokeswoman Maria Cheng as saying, "What we're dealing with is possibly the first instance of second-generation human-to-human spread." In response, Cheng said the WHO is "considering convening a group of international experts, such as Nancy Cox from the US

DOJ_NMG_0029471

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, to discuss the implications of the latest findings, including whether to raise the group's pandemic alert level." However, the Financial Times (5/25, Donnan, Jack) Cheng "stressed that there was no plan in the coming days to convene the international committee of experts that would determine whether to increase the agency's current risk assessment of the likelihood of a pandemic."

Bird Flu Fears Ignite Debate On Scientists' Sharing Of Data. As fears of an influenza pandemic grow, the Washington Post (5/25, A20, Brown, 744K) reports that a "struggle has emerged between experts who believe the latest genetic data on the H5N1 bird flu virus should be made public immediately and others who fear that such a policy would alienate the countries collecting virus samples and the scientists analyzing them." The issue "may come to a head this week" at the WHO's World Health Assembly in Geneva where health ministers from more than 190 countries will consider a resolution that would require them to provide flu data and virus samples to the scientific community "in a timely manner." If adopted, the Post says that "probably would end the current system whereby flu researchers decide when and how quickly crucial genetic data on the virus are made available to other scientists."

Saudi Arabia Now Flush With Petrodollars. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 5, 3:00, Sciutto, 8.78M) reported that "moment you land" in Saudi Arabia, "you see a kingdom of limitless oil wealth. A building boom. Luxury cars. Lavish shopping malls. On our trip, we were particularly struck by the expensive, new, Western-style bars and restaurants. Saudi Arabia is sitting on a fortune. With estimated oil reserves under desert sands worth more, if you can believe it, than the entire US economy." Civil servants' "salaries have gone up 15% in the last year, a direct result of the government's increased oil revenues. This is a country with oil money to spend, from the most grandiose infrastructure projects, to the smallest businesses." Gas prices "were just cut by one-third, to 61 cents a gallon. Cheap gasoline makes big SUVs, especially American-made ones, popular. Part of the reason is that at today's prices, a full tank of gas costs less than $25 US." Starting with the first oil boom in the 1970s, Saudis learned to take their oil wealth for granted," but "when oil prices dropped and the population ballooned, came unfamiliar problems -- poverty. 25% unemployment. King Abdullah is promising this oil boom will be different. One-third of his new record budget focuses on education."

Fire At Turkish Airport Destroys Cargo Facility. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 6, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A spectacular fire at Turkey's largest airport, just outside Istanbul. The choking smoke shut one runway, disrupted flights, and forced 2,000 workers to evacuate. Tanker planes with sea water made 70 flights to douse the flames. Most of the airport's main cargo facility was destroyed and three people were injured. A short circuit may have started the fire."

Europeans Fear Creation Of Russia-Algeria Gas Cartel. Increased cooperation in the energy sector between Russia and Algeria is raising European fears that the two countries might form a gas cartel to control process. The Washington Times (5/25, Mihailescu, 90K) reports, "Top natural gas executives from the two countries announced last month that they were preparing a memorandum of cooperation that would cover joint efforts in the exploration, production and marketing of Algerian gas. Industry reports also say the Russian gas giant Gazprom has undertaken a project with Algeria's state-run gas company, Sonatrach, under which the latter would fulfill Russian contracts to deliver natural gas to France."

Japanese PM To Visit US. The AP (5/25) reports that Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi will visit President Bush next month. During a June 29 meeting, the two leaders "will discuss the war on terror, security and prosperity in Asia and global economic issues, the White House said in a statement."

The Financial Times (5/25, Sevastopulo) reports that Koizumi "will visit Graceland, the former home of Elvis Presley, the King of rock and roll, as part of his farewell trip before stepping down as prime minister in September. In a highly unusual move, Mr Bush is considering accompanying Mr Koizumi to Memphis for the visit. Mr Bush decided to give Mr Koizumi, a huge Elvis fan, the Graceland trip to thank him for his support, including taking the politically difficult decision to send Japanese troops to Iraq." The Times also notes that "rolling out the red carpet for Mr Koizumi may also irk Chinese President Hu Jintao whose recent visit to Washington was marred when a protester managed to enter the White House and disrupt his South lawn arrival ceremony."

UN On Pace To Run Out Of Funds In July. The Washington Times (5/25, Pisik, 90K) reports that the UN "is on a pace to run out of funds months earlier than usual this year. The organization has regularly dipped into peacekeeping reserves to pay its operating budget for a month or two late in the year, while waiting for the United States to transmit the money it usually pays when its own fiscal year begins in October. But this year, a $950 million spending cap largely imposed by the Bush administration will have the organization run out of money as early as July, according to U.N. officials familiar with the organization's budget."

DOJ_NMG_0029472

Venezuelan University Aims To Prepare Students For Social Activism. The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Reel, 744K) reports on the Bolivarian University of Venezuela, which provides a free education to the "massive underclass that [President Hugo] Chavez aims to empower through the social programs that have fed his domestic popularity. The school, the cornerstone of those programs, is aimed at educating millions and promoting the sort of social activism that Chavez says can help Venezuela's poor majority to overcome decades of oppression by the rich."

Morales Has Closely Aligned Bolivia With Venezuela. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, De Córdoba, Luhnow, 2.11M) notes that since taking office as Bolivia's President, Evo Morales "has aligned his country so closely with Venezuela's Hugo Chávez that it is sometimes difficult to tell where one government begins and the other ends. … Bolivian opposition leader Jorge Quiroga, who lost to Mr. Morales in the presidential race, contends that 'we have become a colony of Venezuela.' Mr. Morales rejects that accusation, but refers to Mr. Chávez as Bolivia's 'godfather.'" The Journal adds, "For the U.S., Mr. Chávez's tightening alliance with Bolivia both threatens to undo years of political and economic liberalization in South America and is the latest in a series of energy-security threats. President Bush on Monday said he was 'concerned about the erosion of democracy' in Bolivia and Venezuela."

Polls Show African Support For Democracy Is Eroding. Multi-nation polls released yesterday show that Africans are growing increasingly frustrated with democracy. The Washington Post (5/25, A26, Timberg, 744K) reports, "Afrobarometer, a nonprofit polling project, reported that surveys conducted since 2000 have revealed a slow but steady deterioration in support for democracy, with particularly steep declines in Nigeria, Tanzania, Botswana and Uganda. Sixty-one percent of Africans surveyed said they regard democracy as preferable to other political systems. But the pollsters found that flaws in many democracies across the continent have undermined support for the concept."

Bono Continues Tour Of Africa. NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 10, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported rock star Bono's tour of Africa "continued today" in "the West African nation of Ghana, where today Bono mixed humanity with policy. The man from Ireland who is greeted as a visiting head of government today met with the president of Ghana. He considers these high-level meetings a necessity but he prefers to approach the problem at the ground level." Most Africans "don't know who Bono is. They just know he's out to help them by raising billions, along with awareness."

Americans Accused Of Plotting Coup In Congo. Twenty-six security works, including three Americans, were arrested and jailed in Congo last week on suspicion of plotting a coup in advance of July's national elections. The Washington Post (5/25, A26, Timberg, 744K) reports, "Fifteen of the suspects are employed by a South African security company, Omega Security Solutions, whose parent company has offices in Pretoria, the South African capital. A company official said the detained Americans work for two U.S. companies that are arranging security and logistics for the campaign of a presidential candidate in Congo. The other suspects are Nigerians."

US Response To China's Military Buildup Seen As Inadequate. Dan Blumenthal, resident fellow in Asian studies at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Washington Post (5/25, A29, 744K), "The Pentagon's annual report to Congress on China's military power, released this week, reveals that Beijing's buildup has advanced well beyond what most analysts considered likely just 10 years ago. … But our China policy leaves us a day late and a dollar short when it comes to the challenge posed by the speed of Beijing's military buildup. … A policy seeking to shape China into a responsible global actor works only if you are willing to recognize when it is not working. That time may be fast approaching."

LATimes Says US Backing Somali Warlords "Repackaged" As Anti-Terror Fighters. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (5/25, 958K) says that in Somalia, the US "appears to be supporting one group of Somali warlords, who have repackaged themselves as secular anti-terrorists, to fight another group of equally brutal Islamist Somali warlords. … The Bush administration fears that Al Qaeda operatives and 'foreign fighters' are profiting from Somalia's chaos to establish a beachhead in the strategic Horn of Africa. Even if these concerns are valid, arming thugs to fight a proxy war against Islamists is a clumsy game the U.S. is likely to lose." The US "should stick to its policy of trying to help create a government that can finally end the anarchy in Somalia."

UN Official Calls Continuing Hunger Around World "Unacceptable." James T. Morris, executive director of the UN World Food Program, writes in the Washington Post (5/25, A29, 744K), "Today I will brief a congressional committee on ways of dealing with a problem that has dogged mankind from the beginning: hunger. It's a problem that -- I'm pleased to say -- we have almost overcome in the United States. … So, to my mind, it is unacceptable that you need travel only a few hundred miles from our shores to find societies in which hunger is still a grim component of daily life."

DOJ_NMG_0029473

WSJournal Praises Montenegrin Break With Serbia. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M) says, "The people of Montenegro (population 620,000) on Sunday chose to break up their union with Serbia -- all that was left of Yugoslavia -- and give birth to the Continent's 24th and 25th new nation-states since the end of the Cold War. As long as these decisions are freely, peacefully and constitutionally made, the more the merrier. … Montenegro's leaders plan to join the EU as soon as possible and attract investors with policies inspired by slightly larger Estonia. … The mushrooming of new states in Europe has tended, especially after the wars of the early 1990s, to coincide with the spread of freedom on the Continent. May it continue."

WPost Skeptical Of Burmese Regime's Promise Of Change. An editorial in the Washington Post (5/25, A28, 744K) says, "Burma's dictators may be willing 'to turn a new page in relations with the international community.' … But don't pop the champagne corks yet. The ruling junta has made many similar promises in the past, and it has yet to honor one." The Post adds that "there is no question that the people support Aung San Suu Kyi -- a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, wedded to nonviolence, committed to peaceful dialogue with the nationalities that Burma's regime seeks to wipe out. The U.N. Security Council ought to welcome positive statements -- and demand positive action."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Justices Restore Exit Exam."
"Homes In Katrina Condition."
"Angelides A Favorite Of Pension Fund Interests."
"An Immigrant Underground."
"Ramallah Erupts After A Long Lull."
"House GOP's Back Is To The Wall On Borders."
"Celebrities Crop Up At Farm Protest."

USA Today:
"Retiree Benefits Grow Into 'Monster.'"
"Doctors Will Transplant A Face — But Whose?"
"Psychiatric Drugs Fare Favorably When Companies Pay For Studies."

New York Times:
"Immigration Bill Backed In Senate, Setting Up Clash."
"House Leaders Demand Return Of Seized Files."
"Levees Rebuilt Just In Time, But Doubts Remain."
"Families Add 3rd Generation To Households."
"Some In Mexico See Border Wall As Opportunity."
"Hussein's Former Envoy Gushes With Adulation On Witness Stand."

Washington Post:
"Return Of Jefferson Files Is Sought."
"In Rapt Courtroom, A Struggle Of Wills."
"Check On Workers' Status Would Expand."
"A Rare Stamp Reunited With Its Lost Love Story."
"Group Urges Takeover Of D.C. Agency For Disabled."
"Chavez Educates Masses At University In His Image."

Washington Times:
"Arrests Of Illegals Falls Off Clinton Pace."
"Murder Charges Likely In Iraq Raid."
"ADHD Drugs Take Toll On Minors."
"Regulators To Review Mortgage Practices."
"Russian, Algerian Energy Ties Spur Concern."
"Getting Kinky In Texas."

Detroit Free Press:
"Mom: Cops Failed To Act On OD."
"Your First Look At New Metro Terminal."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Alabama's Got A New 'Idol.'"
"Senate Set To Pass Illegals Bill."
"Border In Their Backyard."
"Pomp, Circumstance And Pronunciation."

Houston Chronicle:
"D.C. In Tug Of War On Immigration."
"Jury Seeks Exhibit Lists, Full Transcript."
"Down In The Delta, Going Is Slow."
"At 87, Legendary Principal Staying The Course."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Abramoff Investigation-Hastert; Abramoff Investigation-Analysis; Indonesia-Avian Flu; Avian Flu-Analysis; Saudi Arabia-Oil Boom; Turkey-Airport Fire; CA Town-Wal-Mart; Back Therapy; Geography Bee; Gore Movie.
CBS: Senate-Immigration Reform; Soldier-Citizenship Efforts; Iraq-Marines Investigated; Indonesia-Avian Flu; Congress-FBI Search; Nursing Shortage; NASA-Satellite Launch; Private Spaceports; Commencement Speech Addresses; Injured Racehorse; NYC-Police Horses.
NBC: Indonesia-Avian Flu; Avian Flu-Analysis; Iraq-Maliki Interview; Iraq-Bush, Blair; Gore Movie; Housing Market; Senate-Immigration Reform; Congress-FBI Search; Stock Markets; Africa-Bono.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate-Immigration Reform; Indonesia-Avian Flu; American Idol Winner.

DOJ_NMG_0029474

CBS: National Guard-US Border Deployment; Libby Case-Cheney Testimony; Jefferson Raid; Duke Rape Case.
NPR: Libby case-Cheney Testimony; Bush-Energy; Fox-US Visit; Iran-Nuclear Program; Foreign Stock Markets; MA-Catholic Health Care Service Executive Resigns; SC-Bauer Plane Crash; MD-Muhammad Trial.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Remarks at Change of Command Ceremony for US Coast Guard Commandant, Fort McNair.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ full Committee. Hearing on restructuring the UN. UN Amb. John Bolton. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on Indian education. Associate Deputy Interior Secretary Jim Cason; Kevin Skenandore, Office of Indian Education Programs; Ryan Wilson, president, National Indian Education Association; Ivan Small, National Association of Federally Impacted Schools and superintendent, Fort Peck School District; Beth Kirsch, series producer, Between the Lions, WGBH; Bernie Teba, Native American liaison, New Mexico Children, Youth and Families Department, Santa Fe; David Gipp, president, United Tribes Technical College. Location: Room 485, Russell.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on Indian education. Location: Room 485, Russell.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and votes on nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on S.2686 - Communications Act of 2006. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the outlook for growth of coal fired electric generation and whether sufficient supplies of coal will be available in the near term and in the future. Howard Gruenspecht, Deputy Administrator EIA; Mac McLennan, Tri-State Generation and Transmission Association, Westminster, Colo.; David Wilks, Excel Energy Services, Minneapolis; others. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENT AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Votes on pending nominations. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10 a.m. SPECIAL AGING _ Full Committee. Hearing on pandemic flu preparations. Secretary of Health and Human Services Leavitt; Steve Cline, North Carolina Chief of Epidemiology; Nancy Donegan, Director of Infection Control at the Washington Hospital Center/MedStar. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS AND HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committees. Joint hearing on the theft of VA record for 26.5 million veterans. Secretary Nicholson. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

1 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights Subcommittee. Hearing on legally assisted suicide and euthanasia. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on the congressional role in federal financial management. Comptroller General David M. Walker; former OMB Director James C. Miller III; former CBO Director Douglas J. Holtz-Eakin; former Rep. Tim Penny; Chris Edwards, Cato Institute; Maya MacGuineas, New America Foundation. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

3 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R.5441 - Homeland Security Department Appropriations Act.

9 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Full Committee. Markup the foreign operations and legislative branch appropriations bills. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

9 a.m. SAELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed, members only briefing on global hotspots. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

9 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on the theft of Veterans Affairs data on 26.5 million veterans. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

9:45 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Rural Enterprises, Agriculture and Technology Subcommittee. Hearing on charitable giving. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on Defense Department preparations for the hurricane season. Assistant Secretary Paul McHale, National Guard Bureau Chief Lt. Steven Blum, Maj. Gen. Richard Rowe of the U.S. Northern Command, Retired Maj. Gen. Mark Bowen of the Alabama National Guard, and Maj. Gen. Douglas Burnett of the Florida National Guard. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on the Office of Thrift

DOJ_NMG_0029475

Supervision. OTS Director John Reich; Michael Nolan, Chairman, Fifth District Savings Bank; Theodore Gurzynski, Pyramax Bank; Geoff Smith, Woodstock Institute. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. RESOURCES _ National Parks Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the line item veto, with Patrick Toomey of the Club for Growth, Thomas Schatz of Citizens Against Government Waste, Edward Lorenzen of the Concord Coalition, James Horney of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

11 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Hearing on food aid. Michael E. Hess, assistant administrator, USAID; Tony P. Hall, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations Organization for Food and Agriculture; Sean Callahan, vice president, Overseas Operations, Catholic Relief Services. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

11 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Oversight Subcommittee. Hearing on charities and employment tax compliance. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

12 p.m. HOUSE ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Smithsonian Business Ventures, including Smithsonian on Demand. Smithsonian Institution Secretary Lawrence Small, CFO Alice Maroni, General Counsel John Huerta, and Gary Beer of Smithsonian Business Ventures. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

1 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on executive compensation. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

2 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Prevention of Nuclear and Biological Attack Subcommittee. Hearing on U.S. efforts to get international assistance to prevent nuclear smuggling. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ International Terrorism and Nonproliferation Subcommittee. Hearing on Pakistan's nuclear arms aid to North Korea. David Albright, president, Institute for Science and International Security; and consultant Leonard Weiss. Location: Room 2255, Rayburn.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee. Hearing on the smuggling of aliens. Location: Room 2237, Rayburn.

Other: PRIME MINISTER TONY BLAIR OF THE UNITED KINGDOM _ Highlights: Meets with President Bush before and after a scheduled 7:30 p.m. joint news conference.

MEMORIAL DAY EVENTS _ Memorial Day-related events. Highlights: 1 p.m. House Republicans hold a Memorial Day rally. West Front Steps, Capitol. 4 p.m. Rep. Tom Davis sponsors a reception for the Gold Star Wives of America. Room 2154, Rayburn.

AVIATION INDUSTRY _ 8 a.m. - 3 p.m. The US Chamber of Commerce holds a summit on the state of the U.S. aviation industry, with FAA Administrator Marion Blakey, Sen. Ben Nelson, Rep. John Mica, US Airwaysa CEO W. Douglas Parker, retired American Airlines President Bob Crandall, Travel Industry Association President Robert Dow, and others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-HOMELAND SECURITY _ 9:45 a.m. - 2 p.m. Senate Democrats will host a major homeland security summit, bringing together lawmakers, leaders, and policy experts from across the country for events throughout the day to discuss what they say are the tough and smart solutions needed to protect America. Highlights: 9:45 a.m. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Chair, Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee, Assistant Democratic Leader Richard Durbin, give opening remarks. 10 a.m. Dr. Robert Atkinson, President of the Information Technology & Innovation Foundation; Jamie Gorelick, Member, the 9/11 Commission; Ruth Ann Minner, Governor, State of Delaware; Michael O'Hanlon, Senior Fellow, the Brookings Institution, participate in a panel discussion on improving crisis communication. 12:30 p.m. Former Senator Bob Kerrey, Member, the 9/11 Commission and President, the New School, gives lunch keynote . 2 p.m. Dr. Irwin Redlener, Associate Dean, Columbia University Mailman School of Public Health; Director, National Center for Disaster Preparedness; Michle Flournoy, Senior Adviser, International Security Program, Center for Strategic and International Studies; Dr. Tara O'Toole, CEO and Director, University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, Center for Biosecurity; James Perkins, Jr., Mayor, Selma, Alabama; and Harold Schaitberger, President, International Association of Fire Fighters, participate in a panel discussion on post-Katrina emergency preparedness. Location: Room 902, Hart Senate Office Building.

RIGHT-LEFT DIVIDE _ 8:30 a.m. The Hudson Institute's Bradley Center for Philanthropy and Civic Renewal, others, hold a symposium with conservatives to discuss ideas that move American politics and the forces that shape ideological views, with Francis Fukuyama of Johns Hopkins University, Robert George of Princeton University, Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute, others. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

SCHOOMAKER _ 8:30 a.m. Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker speaks at a breakfast sponsored by The

DOJ_NMG_0029476

Hill. Location: Thornton Room, Hyatt Regency-Washington on Captiol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

TAX REFORM _ 9 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds an event analyzing the President's Advisorty Panel on Federal Tax Reform's tax reform proposals, with Robert Carrtoll and Craig Johnson, both of the Treasury Department, Kevin Hassett of AEI and Rudolph Penner of Urban Institute. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

YERXA _ 9 a.m. The Washington International Trade Association holds a breakfast meeting with WTO Deputy Director Rufus Yerxa. Location: Horizon Ballroom, Ground Level, Reagan Trade Center.

SOCIAL SECURITY-BOOMERS _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The National Academy of Social Insurance hosts a discussion seminar on ``Can We Afford Social Security When Baby Boomers Retire?" Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Lounge.

US-SWISS _ 9:30 a.m. US Trade Representative Rob Portman, Swiss Minister of Economic Affairs Joseph Deiss sign the U.S.-Switzerland Trade and Investment Cooperation Forum Agreement. Location: Indian Treaty Room, Eisenhower EOB.

MISSING CHILDREN-GONZALES _ 9:45 a.m. Attorney General Gonzales speaks at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day Awards ceremony. Location: Great Hall, main Justice.

COAST GUARD _ 10 a.m. Coast Guard change-of-command ceremony, with Adm. Thad Allen assumsing the position of Commandant. Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff participating. Location: Fort McNair.

NORTH KOREA _ 10 a.m. The US Commission on International Religious Freedom holds a briefing on North Korean refugees in China, with former USAID Administrator Andrew Natsios, Hiroshi Kato of the Life Funds for North Korean Refugees, and Joel Charny of Refugees International. Location: Room SC-4, Capitol.

SAME SEX MARRIAGE _ 10:30 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The Alliance for Marriage holds a news conference in support of the Marriage Protection Amendment. With Senator Bill Frist; Matt Daniels, founder, AFM; and others. Location: LBJ Room, U.S. Capitol.

PELOSI _ 10:45 a.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi holds weekly press conference. Location: Room H-206, Capitol.

IMMIGRATION-GOP OPPOSITION _ 11:15 a.m. Republican senators opposed to the Senate immigration compromise legislation will hold a press conference. Location: Senate TV/Radio Gallery.

METH LEGISLATION _ 11:30 a.m. Rep. Barbara Cubin and Sen. Jim Talent hold a news conference on meth legislation. Location: Cannon Terrace.

GASOLINE PRICES _ 12 p.m. Consumer Federation of America holds a telephone briefing to release a study of consumer attitudes toward gasoline prices and what consumers will do to reduce the dependence on foreign oil. A report on innovate steps necessary to achieve higher gas mileages also will be released. Notes: Callin number: 888-262-0101; passcode: Ask for CFA Energy Blueprint Press Conference.

POLICE-IRAQ-AFGHANISTAN _ 12 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a session on police building in Iraq and Afghanistan, with Col. John Agoglia, Army War College; David Bayley, SUNY Albany; Ali Jalali, National Defense University. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

IMMIGRATION-DAY LABORERS-UNIONS _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Laborer's International Union and the National Day Laborers Organizing Network hold a luncheon discussion for Spanish language journalists on immigration issues and how both organizations plan to work together to fight for immigrant worker rights and to create safer, more humane environments for workers. Location: Laborer's International Union, 905 16th St., NW.

JAMES-NATO _ 12:30 p.m. Gen. James Jones, NATO Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, speaks at a National Press Club luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

ENSIGN-PROTEST_ 1 p.m. Jon Stolz, executive director, Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America Political Action Committee appears at Sen. John Ensign's office to seek an apology for Ensign's remarks concerning those objecting to the Iraq war. Location: Room 356, Russell.

DEMOCRATS-GAS PRICES _ 2 p.m. House and Senate Democrats will hold a press conference at a local gas station to ``highlight the financial pain that Americans face daily and that Bush Republicans seem determined to ignore." They will unveil a report by the Center for American Progress that outlines the effect of rising gas prices on Americans earning the minimum wage. Location: Capitol Hill Exxon, 339 Pennsylvania Ave SE (corner of Pennsylvania Avenue and 4th Street SE).

DRUG FREE WORKPLACE _ 2 p.m. Labor Secretary Chao, labor union leaders, contractor associations, others, hold a signing ceremony to expand the existing multiunion Drug-Free Workplace Alliance. Location: Woodrow Wilson Bridge construction site.

LONG TERM CARE _ 2:30 p.m. Reps. Earl Pomeroy, Bruce Capito, Tom Allen, others, hold a news conference on long term care. Location: Cannon Terrace.

ELBARADEI-SECURITY _ 3 p.m. Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency and recipient of the 2005 Nobel Peace Prize will give a commencement address on the topic of ``Globalizing Security, A Challenge for Your Generation" for the graduating class of The School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS). Location: DAR Constitution Hall, 18th and D Sts. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0029477

OLSON _ 5 p.m. Federal Reserve Board Governor Olson speaks on community development and the bigger picture. Location: Hispanic Theatre at the Tivoli, 3333 14th St. NW.

MCKINNON _ 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) will hold a Statesmen's Forum featuring The Commonwealth Secretary General Don McKinnon. Location: CSIS, 1800 K St. NW, Conference Level B-1.

BRADLEY PRIZES _ 7 p.m. Presentation of the 2006 Bradley Prizes, honoring Fouad Ajami of the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, Clint Bolick of the Alliance for School Choice, Hernando de Soto of the Institute for Liberty and Democracy and Shelby Steele of the Hoover Institution. Entertainment by Della Reese. Location: Kennedy Center.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0029478

Goodling, Monica

From: Goodling, Monica
Sent: Friday, May 26, 2006 8:17 AM
To: Goodling, Monica
Subject: The Morning Update: 5/26/06

<http://www.whitehouse.gov/>
MAY 26, 2006

2:50 pm EDT

THE PRESIDENT and Mrs. Bush depart The White House en route Camp David via Marine One
The White House | Washington, DC

President Bush Discusses Iraq In Joint Press Conference With UK Prime Minister Tony Blair. THE PRESIDENT: "This past weekend, the world watched as Iraqis stood up a free and democratic government in the heart of the Middle East. With our help, Iraq will be a powerful force for good in a troubled region, and a steadfast ally in the war on terror. <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/print/20060525-12.html> With the emergence of this government, something fundamental changed in Iraq last weekend. While we can expect more violence in the days and weeks ahead, the terrorists are now fighting a free and constitutional government. They're at war with the people of Iraq, and the Iraqi people are determined to defeat this enemy, and so are Iraq's new leaders, and so are the United States and Great Britain." (President George W. Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair, Press Conference, Washington, DC, 5/25/06)

Secretary Of Defense Donald Rumsfeld Discusses Progress Of Iraqi Security Forces. SEC. RUMSFELD: "But the Iraqi security forces are now over 263,000, you know. They've passed a quarter of a million security forces. And they're gaining more experience all the time. They're better equipped all the time. They're taking over more responsibility every week, every month. And we feel very good about their progress, particularly in the ministry of defense forces, as opposed to the ministry of interior. <http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0605/25/lkl.01.html> " (CNN's "Larry King Live," 5/25/06)

New York Times Columnist Thomas Friedman Writes American Troops Must "Stand With" Iraqis. "As long as I see Iraqis ready to take a stand like that, I think we have to stand with them. When we don't see Iraqis taking the risk to build a progressive Iraq, then it is indeed time to pack and go. That moment may come soon. It's hard to tell. I won't hesitate to say so - but not yet. ... What you are seeing in Iraq today is the 'hard labor' of nation building in a country that has gone through almost 50 years of tyrannical rule <http://select.nytimes.com/gst/tsc.html?URI=http://select.nytimes.com/2006/05/26/opinion/26friedman.html&OQ=_rQ3D1Q26hp&OP=5c8c9fd0Q2F5vc35hpQ7D

77h5XVVQ3D5V)5XQ3D57Q5DJDJ7D5XQ3DQ27Q7DJc_,2DUNh,P> , Mr. Ibrahim said." (Thomas L. Friedman, "Standing By Stand-Up Iraqis," Op-Ed, The New York Times, 5/26/06)

President Bush Discusses Hurricane Preparedness. "President Bush highlighted U.S. preparedness for the upcoming hurricane season as he marked a change of command Thursday at the U.S. Coast Guard, which rescued 33,000 people after Hurricane Katrina. 'We're determined to learn the lessons of Katrina, and we're doing everything possible to be prepared for the next storm,' Bush said. <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060525/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush_coast_guard&printer=1;_ylt=AvT10z_3mmYLQn1XkgqXbTwGw_IE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE> 'The Department of Homeland Security has reviewed emergency plans for all 50 states and America's 75 largest cities. The department is working closely with communities to identify any weaknesses in their plans and to find ways to improve them now.'" (Deb Riechmann, "Bush Says U.S. Learning Lessons Of Katrina," The Associated Press, 5/25/06)

Economy "Zooms Forward." "The figure released by the Commerce Department yesterday showed gross domestic product during the quarter surpassing the 4.8 percent annual rate estimated a month ago. It marked the strongest growth spurt in 2 1/2 years. <http://www.boston.com/business/markets/articles/2006/05/26/economy_zooms_forward?mode=PF> The upgrade mostly reflected stronger US exports and better inventory building by businesses." ("Economy Zooms Forward," The Associated Press, 5/26/06)

Minorities Increase Share Of Second-Home Purchases In Growing U.S. Economy. "But a new study on homeownership by the National Association of Realtors suggests that the benefits of recent economic growth have been more widespread than critics want to admit. We already knew that U.S. homeownership overall is at an all-time high of nearly 70%. The minority homeownership rate of 52% is also unprecedented. Now comes news that minorities are also increasing their share of second-home purchases <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB114860605812263817.html?mod=opinion_main_review_and_outlooks> ." (Editorial, "Home Economics," The Wall Street Journal, 5/26/06)

Senate Passes Immigration Reform Bill. "If the Senate bill's provisions were to make it into law, they would be the most substantial overhaul of immigration law in two decades. ... Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, described the vote as 'a success for the American people' as well as for the immigrants 'who hope to participate someday in that American dream.' Mr. Bush issued a statement praising the Senate for its vote and the House for passing an earlier immigration bill that he said 'began a national dialogue.' He urged both chambers to work together to pass a bill that he could sign into law. <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/05/26/washington/26immig.html> "(Rachel L. Swarms, "Senate, In Bipartisan Act, Passes An Immigration Bill," The New York Times, 5/26/06)

Border Patrol Preparing For "Unprecedented Expansion" On U.S. Borders. "After three years of steady growth, the Border Patrol is about to embark on an unprecedented expansion. If Congress approves President Bush's request for 6,000 new agents over the next 2 1/2 years, the patrol will have 18,000 agents on the nation's 5,000 miles of border with Mexico and Canada.

<http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/news/20060526/a_academy26.art.htm>
That would double the number of agents since 9/11 raised new concerns about terrorists' ability to slip into the country across land borders." (Mimi Hall, "Secure Border Takes Serious Study," USA Today, 5/26/06)

President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair of the United Kingdom Participate in Joint Press Availability
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-12.html>

* In Focus: Global Diplomacy
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/globaldiplomacy/>

President Attends Change of Command Ceremony for the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-1.html>

President's Statement on Passage of Energy and Water Appropriations Bill
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-2.html>

President Commends Senate for Passage of Bipartisan Immigration Reform
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-10.html>

President Applauds House Vote Approving Energy Exploration in Arctic National Wildlife Refuge
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-11.html>

President's Statement on Materials Recovered from Congressman William Jefferson's Office
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-5.html>

President's Statement on America's Economic Growth
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-3.html>

President's Statement on S. 1869, the "Coastal Barrier Resources Reauthorization Act of 2005"
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-16.html>

President Signs S. 1165 and S. 1869
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-15.html>

President Bush to Welcome President Paul Kagame of the Republic of Rwanda <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525.html>

Statement on Federal Disaster Assistance for Maine
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-9.html>

Statement on Federal Disaster Assistance for New Hampshire
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-8.html>

Statement on Federal Disaster Assistance for Massachusetts
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-7.html>

Memorandum for the Attorney General and the Solicitor General of the United States

<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-6.html>

Black Music Month, 2006
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-13.html>

Nominations Sent to the Senate
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-14.html>

Press Briefing by Tony Snow
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/05/20060525-4.html>

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, May 26, 2006 8:31 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, May 26, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060526.pdf; agnb060526.doc

The Attorney General's News Briefing and Department of Justice News Clips will not be published on Monday, May 29, in observance of Memorial Day.

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MAY 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

FBI Seeks Interviews With Lawmakers About NSA Surveillance Program Leak....3
4th Circuit Panel Hears "Virginia Jihad" Appeal....4

Homeland Response:

House Bill Would Give DHS $32 Billion In 2007....4
Bush Says US Prepared For Hurricane Season....5
Bunning Places Hold On Paulison Confirmation....5
Congress Working To Revamp Flood Insurance....5

War News:

Bush And Blair Admit Errors In Iraq, But Stand By Decision To Oust Saddam....6
Rumsfeld Says Troop Withdrawals Will Be Based On Conditions On Ground....7
Probe Expected To Find Marines Committed "Extensive, Unprovoked" Killing Of Civilians....8
Karzai Visits Wounded Civilians....9
Navy Missile Program Reaches Milestone....9

DOJ:

New York Girl Receives DOJ Courage Award....9

Corporate Scandals:

Jury Finds Lay, Skilling Guilty In Enron Trial....9
Fannie Mae CEO Will Not Head Accounting Probe....16
House Committee Holds Hearing On Executive Pay Packages....16
Former Wal-Mart Official To Be Sentenced In August For Fraud....17
Top Hedge Fund Managers Average $363 Million In Annual Pay....17
Charity Holds "Shareholders" Meetings To Demonstrate Accountability....17

Criminal Law:

Bush Orders Documents Seized By FBI Sealed For 45 Days 18
Hastert Says FBI Leaked Abramoff Probe Story To Intimidate Him....22
Sources Say Novak Told Rove He Would Not Identify Him....22
Former Chicago Sanitation Official Testifies About Political Hires....23
House Committee Backs Limits On Internet Gambling....23
Federal Judge Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend....24
Circuits Divided On Lethal Injection....24
Gotti Trial Judge Critical Of New Federal Indictment....24
Prosecutor Assails Wecht Lawyers' Contentions In Evidence Motion....24
FBI Finds Nothing At Barn Site In Search For Hoffa Remains 25
FBI Recovers $1.1 Million From Miami Airport Heist....25
Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Skills Showing At Maryland Murder Trial....25
Attorney Says Fairfax County Gunman Was Denied Psychiatric Care....26
Financial Firms Unite To Fight Child Porn....26
Canada Fights Surge In Violent Crime....27

Civil Rights:

North Carolina Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Cross Burning....27
Black Male Initiatives Said To Promote Racial Stereotypes....27

Antitrust:

Former Michigan Schools Official Charged With E-Rate Fraud....27
House Judiciary Committee Votes To Ban Internet Content Fees....28
Google Seals Software Deal With Dell....28
Yahoo, eBay Team Up To Battle Google....29

Environment:

GAO Says Bush Greenhouse Gas Programs Not Producing Results 29
House Votes To Allow ANWR Drilling 29
NYTimes Says Only Disasters Prompted Mine Safety Overhaul Bills 30

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Prescription Drug Distributor Pleads Guilty To Selling Stolen Drugs 30
Reporting Continues On Overdoses Linked To Fentanyl-Laced Drugs 30
"Operation Street Sweep" Nets Suspects Facing Drug Charges In Tennessee 31
17 People From 3 States Face Charges In Drug Investigation 31
Ohio Businessman Accused Of Money Laundering Pleads Guilty 31
Researcher Finds "No Association" Between Marijuana And Lung Cancer 31
Idaho Man Indicted On Drug-Smuggling Charges 31
Judge Refuses To Halt California Gun-Store Closure 31
Dallas Gun-Crime Team Wins DOJ Award 32

Immigration:

Senate Approves Immigration Reform Bill By 62-36 Margin 32

Tax:

Treasury Ends Phone Tax 35
FBI, IRS Seek Florida Water District Land Transaction Records 36

Congress-Administration:

Frist Hopeful Hayden Will Get Confirmation Vote Before Recess 36
Landrieu Agrees To Lift Hold On Kempthorne Nomination 36
Democrats Put Hold On Schwab Nomination 36
Senate Clears Way For Vote On Kavanaugh Nomination 36
Tony Snow Seen As Improving Press Relations While Delivering Less Information 37
Snow To Leave Treasury In June 37
Rumsfeld Says Cheney Doesn't Try To "Polish" His Image 38
Nicholson Testifies Before Hostile Congress On VA Data Theft 38
Lawmakers Seek To Provide More Benefits To Veterans 40
GAO Review Criticizes Agency Hiring Practices Under Bush 40
Congress Has Until June 5 To Decide On Air Traffic Controller Pay 41
Official Says Smithsonian Locked Into Deal With Showtime 41

Other News:

GDP Up 5.3% In First Quarter 41
Spokane Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Settle Abuse Claims 42
Poll Shows Harris Trails Nelson By 32 Points 42
Poll Finds Schwarzenegger Approval At 36% 42
Krugman Says Documentary Shows Gore "Sort Of Person" Who Should Run Country 43
US Envoy To IAEA Says Iran Unlikely To Give Up Nuclear Program 43
Abbas Threatens Hamas With Referendum On Recognizing Israel 43
Bush, Canadian PM To Meet In July 44
Putin Takes Issue With Cheney Comments 44
Australian Troops Land In East Timor 45
Sudan Agrees To Permit UN To Assess Darfur For Peacekeeping Force 45
Militias Battle In Deadliest Mogadishu Fighting In 14 Years 45
Chavez Using Venezuelan Oil Wealth To Promote Personal Agenda 45
Uribe Likely To Be Reelected 45
Bush Said To Have Abandoned Pledge To Spread Democracy 46
Teacher Says Post-Election Unrest Would Weaken Mexico 46

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 46

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 47

DOJ_NMG_0029485

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Seeks Interviews With Lawmakers About NSA Surveillance Program Leak. CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported on "new fall-out…in connection with the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program. On top of everything else, CNN now confirms the FBI wants to interview top members of the House and Senate about the disclosure of the program to The New York Times. Two sources with knowledge of the leak investigation say they don't know if any lawmakers have been questioned yet. Only a few House and Senate members were briefed on the NSA program before it became public. Watch this story to explode, as well." CQ (5/26, Stern, Kady) adds, "House members and aides said they have been contacted as part of an FBI probe into the source of a leak about another NSA surveillance program aimed at the content of international telephone calls between people in the United States and people overseas suspected of links to terrorists." Meanwhile, "the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee cautioned against the executive intruding too deeply into legislative branch turf. 'There is no credible claim that anyone in Congress leaked anything,' said Jane Harman, D-Calif. 'I urge the Justice Department to carefully consider separation-of-powers issues and the appearance of intimidation before proceeding any further.'"

Administration May Assert "State Secrets" Privilege In Suits Against Phone Companies. Legal experts expect the Bush Administration to assert the "state secrets" privilege in the lawsuits against phone companies who turned call records over to the NSA. To prove their cases, the plaintiffs in the suits would need to "delve into the depths of the NSA's surveillance program," the Wall Street Journal (5/26, Searcey, 2.11M) reports. The government "considers such information top secret." If judges accept the Administration's claim, "as has been the case in nearly every instance in which it has been asserted since the early 1950s, the suits will dissolve."

Henninger Says Roberts Opinion Summarizes Court's Thinking On Fourth Amendment. Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/26, 2.11M) that the American people "has shown little interest in" the NSA's domestic surveillance program. In "opinion polls about the NSA's surveillance programs, strong majorities essentially say, So what? Something approximating 'So what?' was the Supreme Court's answer this week to the proposition that the police might sometimes enter a home to prevent mayhem without a search warrant. … But it was a Fourth Amendment case. And we have little choice other than to apply the same Constitution to flyspecks and national tragedies, to brawling drunks in a Utah kitchen and al Qaeda agents plotting the next 9/11. Chief Justice John Roberts's opinion in Brigham is in fact a nice summary of the Court's thinking on the exceptions to requiring search warrants, what he called the Fourth Amendment's 'ultimate touchstone' of 'reasonableness.'"

Gonzales Criticized For Threatening Prosecution Of Journalists. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (5/26) editorializes, "The latest evidence of this administration's wary, and often hostile, approach, to the news media is the statement by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that his office is reviewing the possible prosecution of journalists under turn-of-the-20th century espionage laws. He spoke on ABC's 'This Week' about The New York Times' disclosure last year that the National Security Agency was, without warrants, eavesdropping on international phone calls in the pursuit of terrorism suspects. … 'There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility,' Gonzales said regarding the possibility of prosecuting the journalists who won a Pulitzer Prize for the story." The Caller-Times continues, "Whether it is retroactively removing declassified documents from circulation, or seeking to rummage among the papers of deceased muckraking newspaper columnist Jack Anderson, or sending platoons of Justice Department agents bearing subpoenas after reporters, the White House has shown it will play hardball with the press. Bush's penchant for secrecy predates Sept. 11, but the terrorism threat has turned this into obsession. It's a sentiment that would have found favor with President Nixon, who fought the publication of the Pentagon papers in 1971. … Even if Gonzales' statement expresses only the administration's pique over the disclosure, rather than a real intent to prosecute, the effect is nonetheless chilling. And that chill hampers the flow of information, one of those democratic values which the fight against terrorism is supposed to protect."

DOJ_NMG_0029486

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (5/26) runs an op-ed by Boston Globe columnist Derrick Z. Jackson, who writes, "Journalists. Get the rack ready! Our attorney general is coming for us, snarling like a guard dog at Abu Ghraib." Jackson continues, "It is almost funny to see Gonzales scour the statutes to harass journalists. This is the same administration that cannot spell the word law if you spot it the 'l' and the 'a.' It has already set the presidential record in claiming the authority to circumvent the law in more than 750 cases." Jackson adds, "The actions of Gonzales show how little the Bush administration promotes the rights of the press. With every pronouncement, freedom is disappearing, in incremental steps."

The Odessa (TX) American (5/26) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales may have simply been launching a trial balloon on one of the Sunday political chat shows when he hinted that certain laws could be interpreted to authorize the prosecution of journalists who receive leaks of classified material. … If so, that trial balloon needs to be punctured. If not, the law needs to be changed. If it's intended as intimidation, Gonzales deserves the scorn all bullies deserve." The American adds, "Unfortunately, government has become so big, so secretive and so inclined to classify material that is embarrassing or scandalous rather than vital to national security that whistle-blowers and leakers are sometimes the only way citizens can learn what government is really doing in their name. … Prosecuting journalists would not be the end of freedom as we know it, but it would be a step on the road to more overbearing government."

The Austin American-Statesman (5/26) editorializes, "When he was nominated to be U.S. attorney general, Alberto Gonzales had a mostly quiet record as a Texas Supreme Court justice, secretary of state and George W. Bush's attorney, both as governor and president. … But now it seems the signs were there all along that he is a lawyer willing to defend executive power to an extreme rarely seen in national politics." The American-Statesman continues, "Since taking over the Justice Department…Gonzales has acted as if he is still the president's general counsel, not the top law officer in the land. … Gonzales began the week by assaulting the First Amendment and threatening to prosecute journalists under an ancient espionage law. The attorney general objects to journalists revealing classified material — even when that information shouldn't be classified and properly informs the public." The American-Statesman concludes, "It's no secret that the president and Gonzales harbor no fondness for a free press. Their loathing is palpable, and they have declared war on journalists. They might prosecute The New York Times for writing about the NSA's no-warrant eavesdropping on U.S. citizens, and they are eager to tap journalists' phones when they think information is being leaked. … It is chilling to consider how far this administration will go to crush dissent and free speech, and how far Gonzales will go to defend it. … What a disappointment he has been."

4th Circuit Panel Hears "Virginia Jihad" Appeal. The AP (5/26, O'Dell) reports, "Three U.S. Muslims convicted in a conspiracy that began with paintball games to train for a holy war against the United States were improperly denied a jury trial, their lawyers told a federal appeals court Thursday." The AP continues, "A federal prosecutor, however, argued that the three had to live with their 'tactical decision' to entrust their fate to a judge. … 'They got exactly what they wanted,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg told a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals." The AP adds, "Masoud Khan of Gaithersburg, Maryland, Seifullah Chapman of Alexandria and Hammad Abdur-Raheem of Falls Church were part of what prosecutors called a 'Virginia jihad network' that prepared to join the Taliban by playing paintball games in the woods near Fredericksburg in 2000 and 2001. … In all, the government charged 11 men. Six entered plea bargains and two were acquitted. … Khan was convicted of the most serious charges, including conspiracy to levy war against the United States and conspiracy to contribute services to the Taliban. He trained with the militant, anti-American group Lashkar-e-Taiba, which the government later designated a terrorist organization. … Lawyers for Chapman and Abdur-Raheem contend their clients and Khan should have been tried separately. Chapman's attorney, John Zwerling, said his client was essentially forced to choose a bench trial because a jury's post-9/11 passions might be inflamed by the more serious allegations against Khan."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Bill Would Give DHS $32 Billion In 2007. The House yesterday sought to provide billions of dollars on protecting the nation from terror attacks :without putting too much strain on taxpayers," the AP (5/25, Jordan) reported. The House was working on a spending bill that would give the Homeland Security Department "$32 billion in 2007, $1.8 billion more than this year. The legislation moved toward passage as lawmakers debated dozens of competing proposals to bolster national security." Democrats "accused the Bush administration of not doing enough to protect the nation from terrorists, and lawmakers from both parties noted widespread management problems at Homeland Security."

DOJ_NMG_0029487

Bush Says US Prepared For Hurricane Season. In an article appearing on at least 39 news websites, the AP (5/26, Riechmann) reports speaking at Fort McNair yesterday to mark Adm. Thad Allen's takeover as commandant of the US Coast Guard, "President Bush highlighted US preparedness for the upcoming hurricane season." Bush said that during Hurricane Katrina, "the whole world" watched "Coast Guard rescuers plunging from helicopters, lifting people from rooftops, hoisting them to safety." The AP adds that the overall response to Katrina was "botched" by the federal government, but "Bush said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has taken steps to reform FEMA, improve partnerships with the Red Cross and the Defense Department and expand federal supplies."

Bunning Places Hold On Paulison Confirmation. In an article appearing on no fewer that 87 news websites, the AP (5/25, Jordan) reported the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee approved R. David Paulison's nomination as chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency yesterday "after he pledged to refile three years of tax returns to correct questionable travel deductions." Paulison said in a statement that he was "pleased to have this matter raised and resolved," and Sen. Joe Lieberman said Paulison had "answered the committee's questions…completely" in regard to errors found in Paulison's state and federal returns.

However, CQ (5/25, Chemnick, Starks) reported that following Paulison's approval, Sen. Jim Bunning "immediately placed a hold on the nomination in an effort to pressure FEMA into developing an appeals process that would help flood victims whose insurance claims are rejected, according to a spokesman for Bunning." Referring to former FEMA director Michael Brown, CQ noted, "In contrast to his predecessor, Paulison has emergency management experience. He was in charge of the US Fire Administration for four years before joining FEMA." A separate AP (5/26, Jordan) article reports, "Angry over FEMA's flood insurance program," Bunning will delay Paulison's confirmation until FEMA "develops a suitable appeals process for property owners whose flood insurance claims are rejected," according to a spokesman for the senator.

Collins, Lieberman Make Case Against Removing FEMA From DHS. Sens. Susan M. Collins and Joseph I. Lieberman, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (5/26), write that their committee report on the response to Hurricane Katrina calls for FEMA to "be strengthened, protected and given a more regional focus to promote faster and better-tailored responses to natural disasters or terror attacks — and be reconstituted as the National Preparedness and Response Authority as a mark of serious change." Collins and Lieberman compare calls to remove FEMA from DHS to taking "an intensive-care patient outdoors," adding that the agency "probably never was capable of responding effectively to a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina — even when it was an independent agency." Its "withdrawal from DHS can only weaken the agency further and transfer its problems elsewhere."

Congress Working To Revamp Flood Insurance. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Schroeder) reports, "As hurricane season approaches, Congress will speed action on a bill to shore up the National Flood Insurance Program by raising policy premiums for the most vulnerable coastal properties. … The Senate Banking Committee unanimously approved a flood-insurance bill yesterday that is similar to a measure passed in March by the House Financial Services Committee." Both "would require policyholders with vacation homes in risky areas to pay fair-market rates for their premiums. The Senate measure also would end subsidies for structures that have received claims from repeated flood damage."

CQ (5/25, Freedman) reported that the Senate measure, sponsored by Sen. Richard C. Shelby, "takes into account the concerns of panel members from flood-prone states, such as Robert Menendez, D-N.J., who said he would resist efforts to eliminate subsidies on primary residences." Meanwhile, "Shelby made it clear that this legislation will not end his examination of the flood program, which is administered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and will be up for reauthorization in 2007."

DOJ_NMG_0029488

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Blair Admit Errors In Iraq, But Stand By Decision To Oust Saddam. In a press conference last night, President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair admitted mistakes in the way they handled the Iraq war, but continued to stand by their decision to launch the invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein. The AP (5/26, Hunt, Raum) the two leaders also "vowed to keep troops there until the new Iraqi government takes control. 'Despite setbacks and missteps, I strongly believe we did and are doing the right thing,' Bush said." Blair, meanwhile, "declared that after a meeting earlier this week with Iraq's new prime minister, 'I came away thinking the challenge is still immense, but I also came away thinking more certain than ever that we should rise to it.'" They "refused to discuss withdrawing troops from Iraq."

Media coverage this morning almost universally depicts the too leaders as weakened by the Iraq war. For example, The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Kessler, Fletcher) reports the news conference "came at a moment of acute political weakness for both men." In an analysis piece, the Washington Post (5/26, A4, Kessler) says that "dragged down by popular discontent over their adventure in Iraq," both Bush and Blair "have reached the lowest point of their careers." Blair is "desperate to hang on for at least another year." The Post adds, "As the Economist magazine put it earlier this month, the Bush-Blair partnership has become the 'axis of feeble.'"

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/26, Sanger, Rutenberg) called them "badly weakened by the continuing violence in Iraq," and says they spoke "in subdued, almost chastened, tones." In "an unusual admission of a personal mistake," adds the Times, Bush "said he regretted challenging insurgents in Iraq to 'bring it on' in 2003, and said the same about his statement that he wanted Osama bin Laden 'dead or alive.' … Mr. Blair, whose approval levels have sunk even lower than Mr. Bush's, said he particularly regretted the broad decision to strip most members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party of their positions in government and civic life in 2003, leaving most institutions in Iraq shorn of expertise and leadership." USA Today (5/26, Jackson, Benedetto) notes Bush also "identified the abuse scandal at the US-operated Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad as the biggest mistake of the war."

With Blair "described as stiff and defensive," a story in the New York Times (5/26, Stanley) argues there has been as "role reversal" in the Bush-Blair Friendship – another sign of the leaders' "diminished standing." The Times says Blair "has always served as the world's Bush-whisperer, but at their joint news conference last night, it was almost the reverse. Mr. Blair, the normally silver-tongued prime minister, seemed stiff and defensive, and it was Mr. Bush who tried to smooth things over and help Mr. Blair out." When "a British reporter actually suggested that this was his last official Washington visit," Blair "looked dismayed and tongue-tied." Bush "jumped in, saying with a laugh, 'Don't count him out, let me tell it to you that way.'" The Times adds, "That role reversal was as good a sign as any of how the two friends' political standing has eroded since they made the case together for war in Iraq." Blair "came to Washington to help the president, but this time, perhaps for the first time, he looked like he needed the president's help."

The Financial Times (5/26, Daniel) says Bush and Blair struck "a sombre note," and adds the leaders' "political obituaries will be dictated by the fate of Iraq." In a similar report, the AFP (5/26) reports that "as the death toll rises, both Blair and Bush have seen their popularity ratings drop. Both need to show their constituencies that there is some movement forward in Iraq, observers say."

The Washington Times (5/26, Curl, Dinan), however, emphasizes that Bush and Blair voiced "optimism that a new unity government will be best able to end insurgent violence and establish stability." The White House, adds the Times, "spent much of yesterday downplaying expectations that the two leaders would make a major announcement about troop withdrawals. But that was the subject of most of the questions, from both the US and British press, and Mr. Bush said he does not plan to keep U.S. troops in Iraq any longer than necessary." The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Richter), under the headline "Bush Says Early Iraq Troop Cuts Unlikely," reporting the Bush-Blair meeting "had given rise to hope that they might signal the beginning of a troop drawdown long sought on both sides of the Atlantic."

Bush and Blair met last night before and after their 7:30 PM EST news conference. ABC and NBC both briefly noted their meeting before the press conference. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 6, :20, Vargas) reported, "The President welcomed his closest ally in the war, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, to the White House. The war's unpopularity has helped drive both men's public approval ratings to stunning

DOJ_NMG_0029489

lows. Tonight, they are expected to reaffirm their policies but offer no timetable for the withdrawal of soldiers from Iraq." And NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 3, 0:30, Brown) reported, "A White House spokesman says Iraq will be topic A at tonight's news conference, but neither Mr. Bush nor Mr. Blair are about to announce troop withdrawals."

Hume Says Bush Was More Forthcoming Than Blair About Mistakes. Brit Hume said on Fox News (5/26) that Bush "seemed a bit more forthcoming than Prime Minister Blair, it seemed to me anyway, in his answer about the mistakes that were made. The President mentioned several things, things he said himself in the course of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Prime Minister Blair indicated that some things they thought were going to be a problem proved not to be and some things they did not anticipate would be problems turned out to be and that the commitment of the enemy to the fight is something he felt they should have understood."

Kondracke Sees "New Twist" In Leaders' Argument. Morton Kondracke said on Fox News (5/26) that Blair "is a much more eloquent, traditionally much more eloquent spokesman for the policy than the President is. And I think he was a bit more tonight, although I don't think he rose to the heights that Tony Blair has in the past." Kondracke noted that the leaders made "a kind of a new argument, that we should be resolved here in Iraq because the enemy is resolved. The enemy knows that if democracy succeeds in Iraq, it will -- it can succeed anywhere in the world and that they have lost a decisive battle. That is a new twist on the argument that I hadn't heard before and it's something that Blair brought with him."

Barnes Says It Was A "Buck Up" Press Conference. Fred Barnes said on Fox News (5/26), "I thought this was a buck up press conference, trying to buck up America, buck up England and showing once again when you had these two powerful countries, Britain and the U.S., and this cause in Iraq, that the leaders of the two countries are unflinching. And despite setbacks and missteps as President Bush admitted, they are optimistic about the outcome there, while not promising any specific things that they're going to do."

Crowley Says Press Conference Showed "What History Will Record." Candy Crowley said on CNN (5/26), "What you saw here tonight is precisely what history will record, that these are two men who started this war together, basically, and who stuck with it, and are sticking with it now, saying, 'We cannot leave.' They have -- you know, they have had every opportunity to walk back from this, and they can't. It is -- they are tied to this war, and that's what we saw in question after question."

Galloway Says Blair Assassination Would Be "Morally Justified." The Washington Times (5/26, Harper) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "British leftist George Galloway has taken his opposition to the Iraq war to the point of saying that the assassination of British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be 'morally justified.' In an interview with GQ, the men's fashion magazine asked him: 'Would the assassination of, say, Tony Blair by a suicide bomber — if there were no other casualties — be justified as revenge for the war on Iraq?' Mr. Galloway, a member of Parliament for the Respect Party, responded, 'Yes, it would be morally justified. I am not calling for it — but if it happened, it would be of a wholly different moral order to the events of 7/7,' referring to the deadly al Qaeda attacks on the London mass-transit system last year."

Rumsfeld Says Troop Withdrawals Will Be Based On Conditions On Ground. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) how close the US is to bringing troops back from Iraq. Rumsfeld said, We had hit a high of 160,000, and we're now down to 130,000. We have gone back up from time to time when there was an event, for example, the elections in December. We beefed up some of the forces. But the Iraqi security forces are now over 263,000, you know. They've passed a quarter of a million security forces. And they're gaining more experience all the time. They're better equipped all the time." When asked if troops will be coming back by mid-2007, Rumsfeld said, "You know, once you start doing that, then you're stuck with a number, a date, and it just doesn't do any good. It's based on conditions on the ground."

Rumsfeld Denies He Sent Fewer Troops To Iraq Than Were Requested. Rumsfeld was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) if more troops should have been sent into Iraq initially. Rumsfeld said, "You know, it's an interesting question, and I suppose history will decide that. The fact of the matter is that we sent the number of troops that every single general in the chain of command wanted. Now, could you have overridden them and sent more? You know, people run around saying, well, you sent less than the generals wanted. That's just utter nonsense. It's not true."

DOJ_NMG_0029490

Rumsfeld Surprised By Absence Of WMD In Iraq. Rumsfeld was also asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) if the strength of the insurgency is the thing that has surprised him most about Iraq. Rumsfeld said, "No, I would think the absence of -- not finding weapons of mass destruction would be the biggest surprise. I mean the intelligence everyone saw it. Everyone believed it. And, goodness knows, the President did, the United Nations, the Congress, people all saw it there, the other countries in the world."

Rumsfeld Says He Did Not Offer To Resign. Asked about calls from six retired generals for his resignation, Rumsfeld said on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26), "It's reassuring to know that there are 7,500 generals and admirals on active duty and retired and six -- does it surprise you? They tried to fire George Washington. General McClelland called Abraham Lincoln a gorilla and an ape. There is nothing new about this." Asked if he offered to resign, Rumsfeld said, "No. Before I even could think about it, the President came out and said 'You're not going to resign.'"

Friedman Urges US To "Move Into The Background." In the New York Times (5/26), Thomas Friedman urges continued American involvement in Iraq. He writes, "The reason that the violence in Iraq is so intense — mass executions, mosques blown up — is in part because of all these pent-up grievances [of 50 years]. But in part it is also because two very entrenched forces in that part of the world — the theocrats and the autocrats; that is, the Qaedas and the Arab regimes surrounding Iraq, even the 'pro-America' ones — are deeply worried that we might succeed." He draws on the advice of Egyptian activist Saad Eddin Ibrahim; Friedman concludes that "the best thing the Americans could do now to help this process is to move into the background in Iraq … Let the Iraqis invite our help, but let's get out of their faces wherever possible. Also, Mr. Ibrahim said, 'We need America to get back on the moral high ground that it has slid down from since 9/11.'"

Probe Expected To Find Marines Committed "Extensive, Unprovoked" Killing Of Civilians.

The New York Times (5/26, Shanker, Schmitt, and Oppel) reports, "A military investigation into the deaths of two dozen Iraqis last November is expected to find that a small number of marines in western Iraq carried out extensive, unprovoked killings of civilians, Congressional, military and Pentagon officials said Thursday." The New York Times mentions the possibility that the Marines could face "capital" charges and that this incident could be the "the gravest case involving misconduct by American ground forces in Iraq." It quotes Minnesota Rep. John Kline, a retired Marine, who said, "This would be an atrocity."

A more assertively phrased article by the Los Angeles Times (5/25, Perry) reports, "Marines from Camp Pendleton wantonly killed unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, and then tried to cover up the slayings in the insurgent stronghold of Haditha, Iraq, military investigations have found. Officials who have seen the findings of the investigations said criminal charges, including murder, were expected, which would make the Nov. 19 incident the most serious case of alleged U.S. war crimes in Iraq." An inquiry overseen by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell attributes "as many as 24" Iraqi deaths to the alleged perpetrators, who were conducting a sweep after the bombing death of a fellow Marine.

NBC and CBS last night both reported the story. The NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 5, 2:05, Brown) reported the military is "investigating two separate incidents in which Marines are accused of killing innocent, unarmed Iraqi civilians." Commandant Hagee "today issued a strong message to the entire Corps to have the 'moral courage to do the 'right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines.' Hagee reportedly told members of Congress that Marines killed as many as 24 innocent Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha last November, not the 15 first reported." A second incident "occurred only last month in the town of Hamandiyah. A senior military official tells NBC News seven Marines were accused of dragging an innocent Iraqi from his home at night, shooting him, then planting an AK-47 and a shovel next to his body to make it appear he had been bearing an IED, a roadside bomb."

The Washington Times (5/26, Scarborough) reports, "The Corps is bracing for the worst, congressional sources say, and [is] regularly briefing members of Congress. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) will likely complete its investigation this summer." It includes a passage sympathetic to the Marines in Anbar province: "In the fog of combat, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish Iraqi civilians from hardened al Qaeda terrorists."

Marine Commandant Flies To Iraq. The AP (5/25, Burns) reports, "The top Marine general said Thursday that he feared, based on two recent cases of alleged killings of civilians in Iraq, that some Marines could become 'indifferent to the loss of a human life.' His office announced that he was enroute to Iraq to reinforce the Corps' standards of behavior in combat." The New York Times (5/26, Shanker, Schmitt, and Oppel) writes that "the commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, flew from Washington to Iraq on Thursday to give a series of speeches to his forces re-emphasizing compliance with international laws of armed conflict, the Geneva Conventions and the American military's own rules of engagement."

DOJ_NMG_0029491

Knight-Ridder (5/25, Brown) writes that Gen. Hagee briefed Sens. John Warner and Carl Levin, chair and ranking Democrat, respectively, of the Armed Services Committee, before flying to Iraq. The Washington Post (5/26, Ricks) reports that retired Marine Gen. David Brahms predicts a coming "firestorm" that will be "worse than Abu Ghraib." It adds that "if [predictions of murder charges prove valid], the case is likely to make it more difficult for the Bush administration to bolster support for the war."

The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 6, 2:25, Schieffer) reported Gen. Hagee is "taking an unprecedented action tonight. He's flying to Iraq to personally tell Marines they are accountable for their personal conduct, even under the pressure of combat." CBS (Martin) added, "The investigations are not over yet, but a lawyer for one of the Marines tells CBS News there's a strong possibility some of them will be charged with murder." In "a separate incident last month in Hamandiyah, another squad of Marines killed one Iraqi civilian."

Karzai Visits Wounded Civilians. The New York Times (5/25, Gall) describes a surprise visit by Afghan President Hamid Karzai "to his hometown of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan today to visit civilians wounded in an American bombing raid." One Afghan official says of the president's brief visit: "People were telling him we really need security, but that we do not need foreign troops, and helicopters and tanks anymore, we Afghans should take care of it." The Times quotes an increased figure for civilian deaths: "The numbers of civilian casualties in the bombing continued to rise. At least 35 civilians were killed and 15 wounded when United States planes bombed Taliban fighters in a village of Tolokan, west of Kandahar, on Sunday night, said Abdul Qadar Noorzai, the head of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission in Kandahar."

Navy Missile Program Reaches Milestone. The Washington Times (5/26, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The U.S. Navy this week reached a milestone in its sea-based missile defense program. A modified SM-2 interceptor missile launched from the Hawaii-based Aegis cruiser USS Lake Erie successfully shot down an incoming short-range test missile in the final few seconds before impact. It was the first sea-based intercept of a ballistic missile in the terminal, or last stage, of flight."

DOJ:

New York Girl Receives DOJ Courage Award. WTEN-TV, Albany, NY (5/26) reports, "A local hero receives a national award; and if anybody deserved one, 15-year-old Stephanie Quackenbush does. … She is the Albany girl who fought off an armed attacker and then helped send him to prison. Today she received 'The Courage' award. … And courage is something Stephanie has plenty of. So much, she was honored at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day awards ceremony. She shares the credit with her mom." WTEN-TV adds, "There were words of praise from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'Today we honor all who work for our children, because they are our dreams and our future,' says Gonzales." WTEN-TV adds, "Stephanie almost never lived to see her future. On June of last year, on the way to school she was attacked by a man armed with a butcher knife. Quackenbush fought and screamed, even after the man told her he was going to stab her. … Her screams got the attention of two men, as her attacker ran. He turned out to be 24-year-old Darius Ashley, who is serving 25 years in prison for the assault on Quackenbush, and the rapes of two other girls."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Finds Lay, Skilling Guilty In Enron Trial. Former Enron CEOs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were found guilty of a total of 25 counts of fraud and conspiracy in the financial scandals that ultimately led to the collapse of the company. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Koppel, Lattman) reports, "For former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, overturning yesterday's guilty verdicts will be a long shot, legal specialists say." Their chances are weak because "the two are expected to seek reversals in the Fifth US Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which lawyers say is one of the more pro-government benches in the nation." Houston attorney Christopher Bebel says that the trial judge, Simeon Lake, "is on solid ground."

DOJ_NMG_0029492

The convictions are being universally portrayed as a clear win for the prosecution, and as a vindication of the government's strategy in the case. USA Today (5/26, Farrell), for example, describes the verdict as "a resounding victory for federal prosecutors." Prosecutors "said the trial should send a message to executives who manipulate their companies' earnings. 'No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules,' said Sean Berkowitz, director of the Enron Task Force. 'You will be held accountable for your actions.'" The Financial Times (5/26, McNulty, Ben White) calls the verdict "the federal government with its most important victory in a five-year crackdown." CNN's The Situation Room (5/26) refers to "a huge victory for prosecutors," and the Washington Times/AP (5/26, Hays) to "a major victory for the government."

The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Mulligan) quotes Berkowitz saying, "The jury has spoken, and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country: You can't lie to shareholders. You can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interest." The Times adds, "Fellow Enron task force member and Orange County federal prosecutor John C. Hueston said that the verdicts will make it harder for top executives to blame their company's problems on their underlings to avoid legal responsibility. 'CEO's cannot hide behind accountants. They cannot hide behind lawyers. They cannot hide behind claims of ignorance when they have been paid tens of millions of dollars to be the faithful stewards of shareholders and investors,' Hueston said."

The story was the lead on each of the networks last night, which also ran follow-up stories on the reaction of former Enron employees and others, devoting a total of about 15 minutes of coverage to the story. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, lead story, 3:05, Vargas) reported, "Lay and Skilling could be locked up for up to 30 years." ABC (Cuomo) added, "Enron has become the poster child for corporate greed and deception. The question was whether the system could hold those at the top accountable. And today, the jury sent a clear message -- justice can reach her hand into the board rooms of the rich and the powerful." NBC Nightly News (5/25, lead story, 3:10, Brown) showed Paul McNulty, Deputy Attorney General, saying, "The message of today's verdict is simple. Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals." The CBS Evening News (5/25, lead story, 2:50, Cowan) called the verdict "a resounding approval of the government's case against Enron's former giants."

The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Johnson) reports, "The Enron investigation has been the most sophisticated and painstaking white-collar criminal probe in history, Justice Department officials said, producing convictions of 18 people. … 'This was the most important corporate scandal of our lifetimes,' said securities-law historian Joel S. Seligman. 'It was one of the immediate causes of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the governance reforms of the New York Stock Exchange and NASD, and the most consequential reorientation of corporate behavior in living memory.'"

The New York Times (5/26, Barrionuevo) reports, "The 12 jurors and 3 alternates, who all agreed to talk to about 100 reporters at a news conference after the verdict, said they were persuaded -- by the volume of evidence the government presented and by Mr. Skilling's and Mr. Lay's own appearances on the stand -- that the men had perpetuated a far-reaching fraud by lying to investors and employees about Enron's performance." The panel "rejected the former chief executives' insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few underlings who stole millions in secret side deals. And the jurors said they did not believe that negative press and failing market confidence combined to sink the company." A second New York Times (5/26, Bajaj, Whitmire) story notes jurors said they "simply could not believe…that Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling were telling the truth when they claimed they didn't realize that something was rotten at Enron. How, they repeatedly wondered, could Enron's former chief executives not have known what was going on?" The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Rust) runs a similar report on the jurors' comments under the headline "Defendants Sunk By Their Testimony."

USA Today (5/26, Iwata) reports Lay and Skilling "could face prison terms of anywhere from 10 years to life, some legal experts say. … Skilling's counts carry a maximum prison sentence of 185 years; Lay's, a maximum of 45 years, not including his separate convictions in a bank fraud case." US District Judge Sim Lake "will base their prison terms on several factors, including total dollar loss to investors, the number of people hurt by the fraud and whether Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, obstructed justice by lying on the witness stand."

Analyzing the case's long-term impact, the Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Scherer, Axtman) says that "today, CEOs can no longer use the excuse that they can't be responsible for other people robbing the company. They can't reward friends with a seat on the board of directors - today, the board must consist of knowledgeable people who will challenge company procedures when it's necessary. And, CEOs, if they choose to ignore the changes, could well be out of their jobs." In a similar piece, the New York Times (5/26, Eichenwald) writes, "The Enron case will forever stand as the ultimate reflection of an era of near madness in finance, a time in the late 1990's when self-certitude and spin became a substitute for financial analysis and coherent business models. Controls broke down and management deteriorated as arrogance overrode careful judgment, allowing senior executives to blithely push aside their critics. "

DOJ_NMG_0029493

The AP (5/26, Hays) reports, "Skilling's $5 million bond, which restricts him to the continental U.S., remains in effect. Lay, who surrendered his passport, posted a $5 million bond secured with family-owned properties at a hearing following the verdict. … The Enron founder was also ordered to stay in the Southern District of Texas or Colorado, avoid contact with any victim of the offense charged, report to pre-trial services regularly and must not own a gun or use alcohol excessively or drugs."

The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Babineck, Flood, Roper) reports, "The jury panel spent 16 weeks listening to often diametrically opposed testimony, with the government calling 25 witnesses plus three more on rebuttal. Several had struck cooperation agreements with the government and acknowledged crimes, and most claimed Lay and Skilling were part of a conspiracy to profit personally by duping the world about Enron. … 'We stole. We all benefited financially at the expense of others,' said former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, who is expected to serve a 10-year prison sentence after admitting he masterminded fraudulent bookkeeping schemes and bled Enron to the tune of $45 million in the process. … The defense impugned Fastow's character and told jurors he was a liar then and he's a liar now, implying he fabricated evidence and testimony that Skilling approved of 'bear hug' deals with Fastow's LJM partnerships to hide Enron debt and guarantee Fastow wouldn't lose money."

The New York Post (5/26, Geller) reports, "The prosecution was jubilant. … 'The government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it,' said lead prosecutor Sean Berkowitz. … 'You can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interests. No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules.'"

Bloomberg (5/26) reports, "In the wake of Enron's meltdown, government prosecutors cracked down on corporate crime. CEOs of WorldCom Inc., HealthSouth Corp., Adelphia Communications Corp. and Rite Aid Corp. were prosecuted for accounting fraud or looting company treasuries. All were convicted of fraud except HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy, who now is on trial on unrelated bribery charges in Alabama." Bloomberg adds, "The eight-woman, four-man jury convicted Skilling on 19 of the 28 charges against him while finding Lay guilty of all of the six counts against him. The government presented a total of 25 witnesses against the men, including a parade of former Enron executives. … 'It's safe to say each of them is facing north of 20 years real jail time,' said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and co-author of Federal Sentencing for Business Crimes. The calculation of the size of the fraud will play a part in determining the exact sentence. 'There's going to be a mini- trial on sentencing issues.' … Prosecutors should feel vindicated as well, said Behre, now a partner at Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker in Washington. 'This case epitomizes a new paradigm of corporate criminal prosecutions. We now hold the highest-level executives responsible for the misconduct of the company. These two guys are as high as they get.'"

CNN/Money (5/26, Pasha, Seid) reports, "Both Lay and Skilling could face 20 to 30 years in prison, legal experts say. And Lay will also face an additional hefty term in prison for his conviction in the bank fraud case. … 'I think absent a successful appeal, they will both die in prison,' said Jamie Wareham, global chairman of litigation at the international law firm Paul Hastings. 'When you're a judge that's concluded that two men have lied to you for hours and hours and hours, light sentences aren't going to flow.'"

Prosecutors Said To Have Learned Lessons From Scrushy Trial. USA Today (5/26, Farrell) says "the only significant failure in the Justice Department's campaign against corporate fraud occurred in Alabama last year, when a federal jury acquitted former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy of masterminding a $2.7 billion fraud, even though five former CFOs testified against Scrushy. In discussing that case after the verdict, several jurors seemed confused about what the government was trying to prove against Scrushy. In the Enron trial, government prosecutors wanted to avoid the same mistakes." USA Today adds that "to win criminal convictions in federal court, prosecutors needed actual proof of guilt against the two men. And, because there were no emails tying Lay and Skilling directly to the fraud, prosecutors made a strategic decision to focus the trial on whether Lay and Skilling told the truth in public, not if Enron's accounting was illegal. To that end, perhaps the biggest single break for the prosecutors occurred in December, a month before the trial was to begin, when Richard Causey, the former chief accounting officer of Enron, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud. … With Causey out of the picture in a plea deal, prosecutors could focus their case against Lay and Skilling exclusively on whether the two men were honest in statements to employees, analysts and investors."

DOJ_NMG_0029494

Many Questions About Enron's Demise Said To Remain Unanswered. Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (5/26, Smith) says that "because a third defendant, former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey12, pleaded guilty just before the trial began, the case against Messrs. Skilling and Lay became simpler and less focused on the nitty-gritty of how Enron operated." As a result, "while the defendants insisted Enron was a healthy energy-trading company that fell victim to a 'run on the bank,' there was little detailed exploration of the roots of Enron's problems -- including how it became so dependent on paper trading gains that had little real cash attached to them and so vulnerable to credit calls that made it incapable of riding out a crisis." The Journal adds, "Indeed, more than four years after the Enron scandal began, it is still impossible to say what was real at Enron and what was smoke and mirrors."

The Washington Post (5/26, D1, Masters, Johnson), however, reports the Enron "tale" was "complicated, with labyrinthine partnerships and intricate accounting entries, and no documents directly tying the guys at the top to the decisions carried out by others. It was a tough case to be a must win. When the jury returned its verdicts -- guilty on 25 of a combined 34 counts -- it was a clear win."

Lay, Skilling Hurt Defense With Their Testimony. The AP (5/26, Hays) reports, "Kenneth Lay may have paved his way to prison when he testified in his own defense against fraud and conspiracy charges, snarling at a prosecutor and telling a jury of middle-class men and women that he couldn't turn off his rich lifestyle 'like a spigot,' despite $100 million in personal debt. … Jeffrey Skilling may have guaranteed himself a string of convictions when he couldn't counter incriminating testimony from prosecution witnesses with more than, 'It's not true.'" The AP continues, "The epic undoing of the founder and former chief executive of what was once the seventh-largest company in the country and his hand-picked successor came in telling moments throughout the trial of more than four months. … Lay and Skilling entered the trial with a claim that shocked many: Not only were they innocent of wrongdoing, no fraud at all occurred at Enron. Skilling boiled it down with a statement at the end of his 7 1/2 days of grueling testimony: … Prosecutors knew going in that both defendants would seek to exonerate not only themselves, but the company as well. Lay forecast that approach in a speech to Houston business and academic leaders in mid-December, while Skilling's legal team used a court filing to signal their intent. … But Enron fell so precipitously into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 from being the nation's seventh-largest company the year before that something had to be rotten, whether Lay and Skilling knew about it or not."

Knight Ridder (5/26, Burns) reports, "So much for the bold defense of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. … The pair was convicted Thursday by federal jurors who listened to both former Enron Corp. executives spin a tale from the witness stand about a truly great company that was sadly misunderstood." Knight Ridder continues, "From the start, legal observers questioned the strategy of promoting Enron as a 'shining star,' since the rest of the world concluded long ago it had been misled about the one-time Houston energy giant. … Former insiders cooperating with the government swore under oath that the company had lost its moral bearings and manipulated its financial results to deceive a gullible public. … The outcome of the case, with Skilling and Lay facing long prison terms, is likely to encourage future corporate executives targeted in criminal investigations to adopt a lower-risk approach, some legal experts predict."

Skilling Says Holding Trial In Houston Hurt His Chances. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Emshwiller, McWilliams, Davis) reports, "In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Skilling said that when he was pronounced guilty on the first count of conspiracy, 'that floored me. God, there was no conspiracy.' He said that the relatively short jury deliberations had raised his hopes. But 'we were just on a tilted football field,' he said, referring to going on trial in Enron's headquarters city."

The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Babineck, Flood, Roper) notes that "in Houston…thousands of employees lost their jobs -- 4,000 at once the day after Enron filed for bankruptcy on Dec. 2, 2001. Many lost their retirement savings, which was invested in near-worthless Enron shares."

DOJ_NMG_0029495

Successful Appeal Seen As Unlikely. The Times (UK) (5/26, Doran) reports, "Legal experts said, however, that the likelihood of a successful appeal was slim because the jury had obviously considered each count in turn, rather than returning a blanket decision."

Texas Lawyer (5/26, Jeffreys) reports, "Joel Androphy, a partner in Berg & Androphy in Houston who has watched most of the trial, says he gives Skilling -- unlike Lay -- reasonable odds at a successful appeal. … Androphy says Lake's instructions to the jurors will help Skilling's appeal. Androphy believes the evidence was not sufficient against Skilling to justify the judge's instructions that the jurors should consider 'willful blindness.' The government had laid out a case against Lay that he specifically avoided learning details but not so against Skilling." Texas Lawyer adds, "Androphy says two government witnesses were extremely important to the prosecutors' case: Ben Glisan, the former Enron treasurer who pleaded guilty in 2003 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison term, and Mark Koenig, the former head of investor relations at Enron who has pleaded guilty to aiding securities fraud at Enron. … Androphy's assessment is the jurors put little stock in the defense's arguments that the government's witnesses were tainted by deals they cut with prosecutors to avoid jail time."

McNulty Calls Verdict Triumph For DOJ. The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Hedges) reports, "In Washington, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty called the verdict a triumph for the Justice Department, and the federal Enron task force that was created in late 2001. … 'Lay, Skilling and their numerous coconspirators perpetrated an elaborate scheme to mislead analysts and investors about Enron's true financial picture. Their efforts to mislead the markets were protracted, deliberate and dishonest,' McNulty said. 'At a time when the company was foundering, these defendants perpetrated a lie that Enron was a robust and growing company in the strongest financial condition it had ever been in. And as they knew, the truth was something very different.' … He added, 'The message of today's verdict is simple: Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals.'" The Chronicle adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who had recused himself from the Enron investigation because of corporate donations he received as a Texas judge, did not comment. … But McNulty lauded the work of a task force he said, 'worked thousands and thousands of hours. They've gone over millions of pages of documents. They have devoted years of their professional life, sacrificing time from families, all in the effort to try to hold individuals accountable for corruption.'"

Some Say Verdict Will Embolden Federal Prosecutors. The Financial Times (5/26, Kirchgaessner, Waldmeir) reports, "The conviction of Ken Lay and Jeffrey Skilling is the successful culmination of a legal strategy Department of Justice prosecutors have been fine tuning since the day, in 2001, when Enron, one of America's most respected companies, collapsed under the weight of a massive fraud." The Times continues, "That strategy called on law enforcement officials to indict and seek the conviction of chief executives of companies on fraud charges – often involving complex accounting schemes – even if there was little or no solid evidence that the executives intended to commit a crime or even knew the fraud existed." The Times adds, "In the case of Enron, says Michael Missal, a former attorney at the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart, the verdict will further embolden prosecutors to "go after the people at the very top", holding them responsible for wrongdoing at the companies they ran. … Dan Small, a litigation strategy expert at the law firm of Duane Morris, also believes the victory will rejuvenate the justice department at a time when, he says, the legal community has been wondering whether momentum of prosecuting corporate fraud has slowed down. … But one former senior counsel at the justice department disagrees. Timothy Coleman, an attorney at Dewey Ballantine, says the guilty verdict represents the end of an era that began and ends with Enron and that the political forces that put aggressive prosecution of white collar crime at the top of law enforcement's agenda will now subside."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Davies, Scannell) reports, "The convictions of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling culminate a crackdown on turn-of-the-century corporate malfeasance. They also will likely embolden the government to continue its campaign." Among the targets are "two dozen or so companies under federal investigation into whether they improperly backdated stock-option grants to enrich executives."

Task Force Navigated Tough Road To Conviction. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Emshwiller) reports, "The Enron Task Force's uneven record looks sharply improved after it scored big wins in its defining case yesterday with the convictions of former Chief Executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling." The task force suffered a major reversal when "a conviction of … Arthur Andersen LLP was overturned" by the Supreme Court. It was criticized for allegedly unfairly penalizing "thousands of innocent Andersen employees." The Journal notes that its prosecutors "have won convictions against seven individuals, while one person has been acquitted. A trial of several former executives of Enron's high-speed telecommunications unit ended with no convictions and acquittals on numerous counts." In addition, the task force suffered from "communication problems, bureaucratic infighting and disagreements over tactics."

DOJ_NMG_0029496

Convictions Solidify Corporate Reform Movement. Knight Ridder (5/26, Greising) reports, "Enron. The very word encapsulates an era. … It conjures images of too-cozy board rooms, all-powerful CEOs, compliant accountants, greed-struck employees and, ultimately, out-of-luck investors. … And now, thanks to the convictions of former chief executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, Enron finally can stand for something else. … It stands for justice, thanks to the jury's unequivocal verdict." Knight Ridder add,s "The convictions also likely will embolden the sheriffs in town - federal prosecutors, the Securities and Exchange Commission, ambitious district attorneys and even a few private investors - to forge ahead in the challenging, ongoing effort to battle business corruption. … Some argue that a guilty verdict was not needed to exact justice. A flurry of post-Enron reforms, highlighted by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, had done that, they say. … 'Even if there had been an acquittal, that would have been OK,[said Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. 'The changes that this case has brought are a victory in their own right.' … But Andrew Weissmann disagrees. Weissmann laid the investigative foundation for Thursday's verdict as head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. Before he stepped down nearly a year ago, he sifted through the grubby entrails of the corrupt Enron enterprise. … Weissmann also led the prosecution of Arthur Andersen. And since the Supreme Court threw out the Andersen guilty verdict because of the judge's flawed jury instruction, he has seen how a final verdict can muddle the public's perceptions of right and wrong."

Former Employees Praise Guilty Verdicts. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 2, 1:55, von Fremd) reported, "Many former Enron employees said they've waited more than four years for this moment." Deborah DeForge, former Enron employee: "Just hearing that they found them guilty, kind of renewed my sense of fairness in the justice system." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (5/25, story 2, 1:55, Mason) reported, "For Enron's former employees, the guilty verdicts ended five years of misery," while NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 2, 2:00, Brown) asked, "So was justice served? Many of the people who bet their life savings on Enron say yes." The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Burns) reports Sherri Saunders, "who lost her job and $1 million in retirement savings, said the verdict 'gives me a little comfort.'" The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Patel) runs a story about former workers, titled "For Ex-Enron Employees, Verdict Is Personal," and the Washington Post (5/26, D1, Ahrens) and USA Today (5/26, Appleby), among other newspapers, run similar reports.

Political Impact From Enron Verdicts Seen As Unlikely. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Both parties doubt Enron verdicts will have large political impact. 'The public verdict is already in on CEO greed at the expense of the company's own employees,' says ex-Clinton strategist Stan Greenberg. Adds Republican pollster Neil Newhouse, 'There could have been a public backlash had the verdicts not come in guilty.'"

Verdict Said To Mark "Beginning Of The End Of The Bush Era." Under the headline "Kenny Boy, Meet Brownie," Howard Fineman writes on Newsweek's website (5/26), "If you want a date to mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era in American life, you may as well make it this one: May 25, 2006. The Enron jury in Houston didn't just put the wood to Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling. The jurors took a chainsaw to the moral claims of the Texas-based corporate culture that had helped fuel the rise to power of President George W. Bush. … Ultimately, Bush's Justice Department pressed the case against Enron -- and won. Still, when the history books are written, the debit side of the Bush-era ledger will include a line labeled 'Kenny Boy.' That's the nickname Bush gave the guy he later claimed he barely knew. "

Under the headline "Once A Friend And Ally, Now A Distant Memory," the Washington Post (5/26, A10, Goldfarb) reports, "In the 1980s, when Bush was working in the Texas oil industry, his firm invested in a drilling partnership with Lay's company, a predecessor to Enron. In 1992, Lay was co-chairman of the Republican National Convention in Houston that re-nominated President George H.W. Bush. Later, Lay was a major fundraiser for George W. Bush's political career." Vice President Cheney "invited Lay to take part in his secret energy task force meetings. Cheney also talked to the Indian government about a debt it owed Enron for the rebuilding of a power plant."

DOJ_NMG_0029497

British Banker Fighting Extradition Calls Enron Verdict "Terrifying." Bloomberg (5/26, Murphy) reports, "A British banker fighting extradition to the U.S. on Enron Corp.-related charges said he was 'terrified' by today's convictions of the company's former Chairman Kenneth Lay and ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling and questioned why the men chose to fight the case. … 'It was either an incredibly brave or foolhardy thing that they did, and I guess they're paying the consequences now,' David Bermingham said in a telephone interview from his home outside London. 'They had both hands tied behind their back, and they were up against the 400-pound gorilla. The deck was completely stacked against them.'" Bloomberg adds, "Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew, all former employees of Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, are wanted in Texas for allegedly pocketing millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership. … They are among the 33 individuals, including Lay and Skilling, the U.S. government has prosecuted in connection with the energy trader's implosion, which wiped out thousands of jobs and more than $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight. … Bermingham said today that while he didn't have any opinion on whether Lay or Skilling were guilty of the fraud and conspiracy charges against them, the fact that both men may spend the rest of their lives in prison only reinforced the importance of the bankers' ongoing battle against extradition."

Defendants' Wives Faced Their Own Kind Of Pressure. USA Today (5/26, O'Donnell, Fetterman) reports, "In courtroom wrangling over white-collar crimes, the way family support is perceived can be important. In the Enron trial, it was often about the wives." USA continues, "Linda Lay, the former secretary turned second wife to Enron ex-chairman Ken Lay, stood by her man every day of the four-month trial that ended in her husband's conviction Thursday. … Usually, she sat in the first row of the spectator gallery, about 20 feet from her husband. But as the clock approached 11 a.m. in Houston Thursday, the hour of judgment for Ken Lay, she moved into the front part of the courtroom to be beside him." USA adds, "Linda Lay maintained the same tight grasp on her husband's hand that she's had in all the trips to and from the courtroom. … That wasn't the case with Rebecca Carter, former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling's second wife and former corporate board secretary. She did not attend every day of the trial and was not in the courtroom when it was time for a verdict. Outside the courthouse, after being convicted on all counts, Skilling thanked his family, especially his three children, but didn't mention his wife. … Beth Bonora, a jury consultant in San Francisco, says it's important for those on trial to have family members in the courtroom to 'convey that other people care about you and believe in you. … People are curious about relationships, the dynamics' of family members in the courtroom."

Public Not Keen On Enron-Related Books, Film, Memorabilia. USA Today (5/26, Lieberman, Howard, Petrecca) reports, "Enron's legacy includes several well-regarded books, an Oscar-nominated documentary, a mountain of memorabilia and — based on sales of those items — lots of yawns." USA continues, "Publishers, who made the biggest bets on public interest in Enron, hope for a few more sales off the verdict, but don't expect much. … 'There were a lot of (Enron) books and relatively few readers,' says Michael Cader, editor of industry newsletter Publishers Lunch. 'It was a complex case and the extent to which it meant anything to general readers was elusive.'" USA adds, "Meanwhile, auctioneers don't expect a surge of Enron-mania for souvenirs. 'Some of the wind is out of the sails because of the length of time of the trial,' says Dennis Kruse, president of the National Auctioneers Association. … This week, 66 Enron items have sold on eBay, says eBay spokesman Dean Jutilla, while bidders snapped up 1,285 items tied to American Idol winner Taylor Hicks."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) editorializes, "If anyone still thinks corporate chieftains are above the law, yesterday's 29 guilty verdicts against former Enron CEOs Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay should put that myth to rest." The Enron verdicts "are proof, if more were needed, that lying to employees, shareholders and the public about corporate finances is a serious crime that will be punished.

The New York Times (5/26) editorializes, "We hope the jury's verdict deters other corporate kingpins from breaking the rules. As Paul McNulty, deputy attorney general, put it in a news conference shortly after the verdict was announced, 'No one, including the heads of Fortune 500 companies, is above the law.' At the same time, white-collar criminal cases can be difficult, paper intensive and hard to explain to juries. We expect the verdict in the Enron case to encourage prosecutors to pursue them."

The Washington Post (5/26, A20) writes in an editorial, "There is a danger in this verdict, however. In the wake of Enron's bankruptcy, some argued that the problems of corporate America were the work of a few bad apples." Yet, adds the Post, "this decade's business scandals were not just about bad apples, and putting those apples in jail is not going to change that."

DOJ_NMG_0029498

USA Today (5/26) editorializes that Enron was a case "that epitomized an era, the one that the federal prosecutors absolutely had to win. Now that they did…public attention to issues of corporate fraud and governance might wane. That would be a shame because much more remains to be done before shareholders and employees can be confident that senior managers are acting in their company's best interest, not their own."

Steven Perlstein writes in the Washington Post (5/26), "Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling are right about one thing: The games they played at Enron were no different than the games being played at hundreds of other big public companies during the late 1990s. So in that respect, it is unfair that Lay and Skilling (and their partner in crime, Andy Fastow) have been singled out for criminal prosecution. Unfair -- and totally necessary. … For all the nuance and sophistication of our legal system, the convictions of Lay, Skilling, Bernard Ebbers, Dennis Kozlowski, the Rigases and the Arthur Andersen accounting firm amount to nothing more than old-fashioned hangings in the public square. They are the way by which a capitalist society gets its most powerful economic actors to abide by the rules that make free markets work."

Novelist James P. Othmer writes in the New York Times (5/26, Othmer) that "this is about much more than the fate of Kenny Boy Lay and Jeff Skilling. This is about us. The Masters of the Universe. The all-knowing, type-A power mongers in crimson suspenders with bottomless expense accounts. This is about the fate of the prickly, unapologetic, rule-averse tough guys like you and me who run this country, not because we're particularly talented or charming, but because we have the gift of arrogance."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (5/26) editorializes, "The convictions of former Enron execs Lay and Skilling provide some justice for Washingtonians bilked by the Western energy crisis. Even within perhaps the worst-led Justice Department in U.S. history, enough capable, dedicated, honest prosecutors remain to win difficult convictions. Jurors saw through the defense's attempts at explanations, evasions and excuses."

Fannie Mae CEO Will Not Head Accounting Probe. Dow Jones (5/26) reports, "Reversing course Thursday, Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen B. Ashley said chief executive officer Daniel H. Mudd won't lead the company's investigation into who should be fired or punished because of the housing giant's $10.6 billion accounting scandal." Dow Jones continues, 'Instead, Ashley said that four independent board members who have joined Fannie Mae (FNM) in the last 18 months would spearhead the probe. … 'The board and myself have developed our thinking further for how a review of the personnel mentioned in the OFHEO report would be handled,' Ashley said in an interview." Dow Jones adds, "Ashley said the board decided to change its plans on Wednesday, one day after he said on an analyst call that Mudd would lead the review. … He said the decision was 'internal' and didn't come from pressure by regulators or lawmakers. … The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight and the Securities and Exchange Commission fined Fannie Mae $400 million Tuesday for 'deliberately and systematically' creating earnings 'illusions' to hit targets from 1998 through 2004. … The SEC and Justice Department are both looking into the roles individuals played in the accounting scandal. Tuesday's agreement only settled allegations against the company."

WSJournal Says Fannie Mae Scandal Is Political. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) says in an editorial that Fannie Mae's "regulator issued its long-awaited, 340-page report on the company's $10.8 billion accounting woes this week, and the news is that the internal rot is even worse than we ever imagined. This is the Beltway's Enron, yet the political class still hasn't fixed the core problem, which is Fannie's political protection." The Ofheo (Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight) report "makes clear that Fannie's core expertise was manipulating its earnings and rigging the politics. The management of credit risk that was supposed to be its stock-in-trade was way down the list." The "larger story here is that Fannie Mae is less a corporate outrage than a political one. It is the tale of a company that has grown rich off an implicit taxpayer subsidy and then plowed those profits back into buying political protection in Congress and feckless regulation from the executive."

House Committee Holds Hearing On Executive Pay Packages. The AP (5/26, Gordon) reports, "Lawmakers on Thursday addressed an issue that rankles company shareholders and the public -- executive pay packages and perks -- at a time when revelations of excess surface almost daily." The AP continues, "A senior Democrat, Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, wants Congress to give shareholders a greater say over executive compensation. … 'There have clearly been abuses,' Frank said at the start of a hearing by the House Financial Services Committee. The session became an impassioned debate between Democrats and Republicans over the morality of lavish compensation, an argument portrayed by panel members as a clash between faith in capitalism and advocacy of socialism." The AP adds, 'Frank had earlier used a parliamentary rule to force the majority Republican leaders of the committee to convene the hearing. … The partisan rhetoric flew, as befits an election year. Countering Frank's legislative proposal, Republicans disclosed that they have a bill of their own in the works: one that would rein in trial lawyers, a group that is a perennial ally of Democrats and generous contributor to their campaigns. … The subject clearly hits a nerve with Americans, who hear reports almost daily of excessive pay and perks for executives while their companies stumble, lay off employees or renege on billions of dollars in pension obligations for workers' retirement. The chasm between executives' salaries and the pay of rank-and-file employees continues to widen."

DOJ_NMG_0029499

Former Wal-Mart Official To Be Sentenced In August For Fraud. The AP (5/26, Kabel) reports, "A federal judge has set a sentencing hearing Aug. 11 for Thomas Coughlin, the former No. 2 executive at Wal-Mart Stores Inc., who pleaded guilty in January to fraud and tax charges for stealing money, gift cards and merchandise from the world's largest retailer." The AP continues, "Coughlin, 57, faces a maximum of 28 years in prison after pleading guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of filing a false tax return. He also could be fined $1.35 million." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson, who accepted Coughlin's guilty plea in January, set the sentencing hearing for Aug. 11 in his courtroom in Fort Smith, Arkansas. … Prosecutors have recommended a sentence but Dawson sealed the plea agreement pending a presentencing report. … Wal-Mart referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin allegedly had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary cocktail mix. Wal-Mart estimated losses at up to $500,000."

Top Hedge Fund Managers Average $363 Million In Annual Pay. USA Today (5/26, Shell) reports, "James Simons, a mathematician turned money manager who prefers hiring Ph.D.s over MBAs, inched out oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens Jr. as the world's best-paid hedge fund manager in 2005, collecting an estimated $1.5 billion, according to rankings released today by Institutional Investor's Alpha magazine." USA continues, "In rising to the top of what amounts to a who's who list of the secretive hedge fund world, Simons, of Renaissance Technologies, unseated 2004's top earner and first-ever billion-dollar man, Edward Lampert of ESL Investments, who is best known for buying Kmart and masterminding the blockbuster deal to buy Sears. Lampert's earnings dipped to an estimated $425 million last year, down from $1.0 billion in 2004. … Pickens also topped $1 billion, earning an estimated $1.4 billion. The average pay of the 26 (there was a tie for 25th place) on the list was $363 million, up 45% from $251 million in 2004." USA Adds, "Other big-name managers with big-time reputations in the top 10 included: financier George Soros, who was named 'the man who broke the Bank of England' in 1992 after a winning bet against the British pound netted him more than $1 billion; Steven Cohen of SAC Capital Advisors, whom BusinessWeek called 'the most powerful trader on Wall Street you've never heard of' in a July 2003 cover story; and legendary trader Paul Tudor Jones II. … The surge in pay comes amid an explosive growth in the industry, which now has roughly 8,000 funds and $1.2 trillion in assets. A lucrative business model for hedge fund managers, which, on average, entitles them to 2% of assets under management and 20% of the profit, makes these large paydays possible, Peltz says. A $10 billion fund would earn $200 million from the 2% management fee alone. Super-successful managers charge even more."

Charity Holds "Shareholders" Meetings To Demonstrate Accountability. The New York Times (5/26, Strom) reports that for the last four years, Direct Relief, a charity which provides "donated medicine and medical supplies to communities around the world, has held a 'shareholders' meeting' for contributors to demonstrate its accountability and to burnish its relationship with its donors. … The charity began holding the shareholders' meetings to expand its appeal to donors locally and beyond." Direct Relief "invites representatives of the organizations it has supported to attend the meetings and explain how the charity has assisted them, as well as to offer primers on the challenges they face in providing health services in impoverished and conflict-ravaged countries."

DOJ_NMG_0029500

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Orders Documents Seized By FBI Sealed For 45 Days. Amid the rising tension between the Administration and Congress over the FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, President Bush yesterday ordered the Justice Department to seal the documents seized by the FBI. The Office of the Solicitor General will hold the documents for 45 days, which Bush said in a statement released yesterday, "will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government." Press reports characterize Bush's order as "a highly unusual intervention," an "extraordinary" and "remarkable."

ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 4, :20, Vargas) reported, "Congressional leaders sharply criticized the FBI for raiding the offices of Democratic Congressman William Jefferson in a search for evidence. … Today, President Bush ordered everything the FBI seized to be sealed for 45 days. He said he wants to give both sides time to resolve their dispute." The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "When FBI agents searched the office of Democratic Congressman William Jefferson, it marked a dubious first. … Today, the President got into the act." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Mr. Bush's order was welcomed by the House Speaker, who says important principles are at stake. … A senior law enforcement official said the cooling off period would not affect the investigation of Congressman Jefferson. 'There is videotape of the congressman putting cash in the trunk of his car,' the official tells CBS News. There's 'two plea agreements and more than enough evidence to finish the case.'" NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 6, 0:30, Brown) noted, "Congressional leaders of both parties are calling the raid a violation of the Constitution's guarantee of separation of powers."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported that President Bush has "stepped directly into the escalating battle between the executive branch and Congress," by ordering "all materials seized in a raid on a Congressman's office, sealed for 45 days." CNN (Bash) added that "this really was not an easy move for this president to make. He often errs on the side of expanding executive powers. But clearly, President Bush right in the middle of this constitutional confrontation between members of Congress and the Justice Department." CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (5/25, Bash) noted, "The constitutional showdown between Republicans in Congress and the Republican administration was escalating by the minute, and President Bush blinked."

FOX News' Special Report with Brit Hume (5/25, Wilson) reported that Bush "noted the nation had never faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," but "what is not clear...is exactly how far the FBI had gotten in its five-day review of the records. The decision came on a day when some in Congress publicly disagreed with their Hill leaders." Sen. David Vitter: "We've had raids before on legislators' homes, federal judges' chambers, member of a different branch, their professional offices, their chambers -- and those led to criminal convictions which were upheld." Sen. Jeff Sessions: "This was a search based upon a court order -- an FBI agent went to a federal judge with a sworn affidavit in which he alleged there was probable cause."

The AP (5/26, Kellman) reports, "Republican officials who spoke on condition of anonymity said Vice President Dick Cheney had become involved as the administration worked to ease the anger of the speaker, who has enormous control over the president's legislative agenda. … Within minutes, the heads of the battling institutions stood down and began talking about solutions. Hastert said the order would 'give us some time to step back and try to negotiate with the Department of Justice.' Gonzales said the move provides 'time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress.' The FBI said it would comply with Bush's order." The Los Angels Times (5/26, Reynolds, Schmitt) adds, "White House officials would not say whether Bush had spoken personally to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the Jefferson raid," but "Gonzales, who approved the search of Jefferson's office, issued a statement saying he was satisfied with the president's decision. … A government official…said Justice Department negotiators were adamant that the department not relinquish the seized materials, because it could compromise the investigation. The official said some senior department officials had been prepared to submit their resignations if Bush had ordered them returned."

In a front-page story, The Washington Post (5/26, Eggen VandeHei) reports that Bush's order is "a remarkable

DOJ_NMG_0029501

intervention by the nation's chief executive into an ongoing criminal probe of alleged corruption. … Bush hoped to mollify Hastert…at a time of increasingly sour relations with the GOP-controlled Congress, according to White House sources." The Post adds that "the agreement…marked a setback for the FBI and Justice Department," and "the negotiations angered many federal prosecutors and FBI agents, who believed that the search warrant for Jefferson's office…was lawful and necessary because of Jefferson's refusal to comply with a subpoena issued in August." However, "one law enforcement official" said, "If we can bring down the rhetoric and cool off, it may be better for everyone in the end." Under the headline "To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Seized Files," The New York Times (5/26, Hulse, Johnston) notes, "Before Mr. Bush's decision to step in, what law enforcement officials described as a tense drama had played out," and Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty "at one point…told Scott Palmer, chief of staff to Mr. Hastert, that he would quit rather than give up the materials to Mr. Jefferson. … At the F.B.I., officials said they would comply with the deal but complained privately that it would bar them from examining the materials discovered in the search for more than a month. Senior F.B.I. officials were not consulted in negotiations and regarded any effort to keep them from evidence as an unfair intrusion that could compromise their investigation."

The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Neikirk) calls the order an "extraordinary step" and adds, "A Justice Department official familiar with the negotiations with Congress said House leaders put the agency in an untenable position by demanding return of the Jefferson documents. 'Do you think there's any way the Justice Department would give incriminating documents back to an entity that the target is connected to? No way,' said the source." Knight Ridder (5/26, Kuhnhenn) says Bush's decision is "a highly unusual intervention" and reports, "In a joint statement following the president's announcement, Hastert and Pelosi said they had directed House lawyers to negotiate with the Justice Department to establish procedures for obtaining 'evidence of criminal conduct that might exist in the offices of members.' ... According to lawmakers who were briefed by the Justice Department, the agents carted away one box of records from Jefferson's office. The FBI-House confrontation has roiled Washington politics."

Meanwhile, The Washington Times (5/26, Dinan, Fagan) reports, "Not all lawmakers, however, are opposed to the FBI's actions." Sen. David Vitter "was briefed yesterday by high-level Justice Department officials and said, 'I feel more strongly than ever that that search was legal and constitutional.' … Some House Republicans also said it's politically bad for Republicans to be feuding. 'I don't think we should be fighting with the FBI going into an election,' said Rep. Joe Pitts, Pennsylvania Republican." AFP (5/26, Lozano) also reports on Bush's order.

MarketWatch (5/26, Watts) reports, "ABC News, citing unidentified law-enforcement sources, reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating a letter Hastert wrote three years ago to then-Interior Secretary Gale Norton to block an Indian casino -- which would have competed with casinos operated by tribes represented by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and is cooperating with an ongoing investigation. … The Justice Department twice issued denials of the story, saying that Hastert wasn't the subject of an investigation. Such denials are rare; the agency usually refuses to confirm or deny the existence of a probe. … ABC News late Wednesday posted an update on its Web site, saying that despite the department's statement, federal law-enforcement sources said the network had accurately reported that Hastert was 'in the mix' of the FBI probe of congressional corruption."

Bloomberg (5/26, Runningen) reports, "Hastert has expressed frustration that the White House didn't consult him before the FBI searched Jefferson's offices on May 20. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, was videotaped accepting a leather briefcase containing $100,000 in cash from a government witness, according to an FBI affidavit filed in connection with the search warrant. He has denied wrongdoing and hasn't been charged with a crime. … Hastert discussed his constitutional concerns directly with Bush this week, said Ron Bonjean, the congressman's spokesman."

Fallout From FBI Raid Could Threaten Bush Legislative Agenda. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, A4, Cummings, Mullins) reports that the "FBI raid…is fueling a power struggle between Congress and the administration that could hobble President Bush in his efforts to move his legislative agenda." Speaker Dennis Hastert "has been one of the White House's best friends on Capitol Hill," ensuring "a succession of legislative victories over the years to President Bush even when it meant bending the will of his own moderate or conservative wings." However, if the rift with Congress widens, "more administration officials could find themselves being hauled before skeptical -- if not hostile -- oversight committees." Furthermore, "the battle could…embolden the Senate to pass a tougher version of legislation limiting the administration's ability to conduct domestic spying programs," and "there could be more fights over spending bills, even as the spat could scuttle any hope of passing a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, which the White House views as a key prong of its election strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0029502

Hastert Faces Ire Of Rank-And-File Republicans In Closed-Door Meeting. CQ (5/26, Ferrechio) reports Speaker Dennis Hastert "found himself facing pushback from his own party Thursday." He "spent two hours behind closed doors with the rank and file, listening to their complaints about Hastert's defense of institutional prerogative — a concept that is not the easiest to explain to an angry constituent. Most House Republicans emerged from the meeting grim-faced and closed-mouthed, but one member characterized sentiment as 'mostly opposed' to Hastert's high-profile fight against the raid. Some members believe the Justice Department acted lawfully when it executed a court-approved search warrant on Jefferson's office."

Conservatives Criticize Hastert. The Washington Times (5/26, Hallow) reports, "Conservatives yesterday expressed confusion and outrage over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's defense of a Democratic congressman whose Capitol Hill office was raided last weekend by the FBI. 'Only thing I can figure is that Denny got up one morning and said, "Our approval with the public is at 27 percent -- how can I drive that down further?"' said former Rep. Bob Barr, Georgia Republican. … Radio host Rush Limbaugh yesterday told his millions of listeners that the Hastert-Pelosi alliance shows the GOP has become 'politically tone-deaf,'" and "veteran conservative activist Richard Viguerie said Mr. Hastert 'is clueless -- he just doesn't get it, doesn't understand he has to make changes, the same in the Senate.'"

Dispute Seen As Political Threat For Both Parties. The AP (5/26, Raum) reports that the "FBI raid…has triggered an exceptional display of congressional bipartisan unity. But there are pitfalls for both parties. Additional prosecutions loom in the investigation surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and calling more attention to corruption — and congressional privilege — could further drive down election-year approval ratings for all of Congress. … Furthermore, the flap comes at a time when the Bush administration faces criticism for pushing the envelope of its executive powers in warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency and in other surveillance and detention programs. For Democrats, the more they blast FBI tactics against one of their own, the harder it will be to make their 'culture of corruption' label stick against Republicans."

Meanwhile, USA Today (5/26, 4A Konigsmark) reports, "Louisiana has always borne a reputation for corrupt politicians. Jefferson's alleged misdoings may cause more than just red faces, however. Louisiana is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina, and billions in federal dollars await congressional approval. … Not only could it be bad for Louisiana, but also for Democrats nationally, who are trying to win mid-term elections by painting Republicans as corrupt. This week, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi asked Jefferson to give up his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He refused."

Hastert Praises Bush Order, Says Constitutional Concerns Can Be Resolved. In a USA Today (5/26) op-ed, Speaker Dennis Hastert writes, "The issue that has concerned me…since Saturday night is not if the FBI should be able to search a member of Congress' office, but rather how to do it within the boundaries of the Constitution. On Thursday, President Bush recognized that serious constitutional issues needed to be resolved" and "wisely" ordered the records sealed. Hastert adds, "Justice Department officials now insist that this specific case required them, for the first time, to conduct a search. I regret that when they reached this conclusion, they did not work with us to figure out a way to do it consistently with the Constitution. But that is behind us now. I am confident that in the next 45 days, the lawyers will figure out how to do it right."

New Orleans Abuzz Over Jefferson Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Simmons, 958K) reports Rep William Jefferson "has long provided one of Louisiana's favorite success stories: the sometime-sharecropper's son who rose from rural roots to attend Harvard Law School, become a Democratic Party power player and reach the halls of Congress. So when the FBI revealed that it had videotape of Jefferson accepting $100,000 in cash that the bureau said was intended to bribe a Nigerian official — and that $90,000 of it had been found in the freezer of Jefferson's home — constituents…reacted with shock, disappointment and a touch of amusement hardened by experience. … Now that the city's mayoral elections are over and incumbent C. Ray Nagin is in office for four more years, Jefferson's travails are the buzz around many quarters of this city." The Times notes that "the general sentiments among friends and supporters have been disbelief and denial."

DOJ_NMG_0029503

LATimes Calls Bush Order "More Indefensible" Than Hastert, Pelosi Complaints. The Los Angeles Times (5/26) editorializes, "It is outrageous enough that both the speaker and the minority leader have complained about a lawful FBI search of the offices of a fellow House member. It's even more outrageous that the president is now trying to placate them by announcing that records seized in the search will be off-limits to investigators for 45 days." The Times notes that "the FBI searched Jefferson's offices because that's where he kept his records. This wasn't a case of jackbooted thugs from the executive branch rifling willy-nilly through congressional files in search of embarrassing information," and "the agents who searched Jefferson's office were acting lawfully and within the requirements of the 4th Amendment." The Times adds that "President Bush's actions on Thursday even more indefensible than Hastert's and Pelosi's. … Although the president is the head of the executive branch, he shouldn't second-guess the conduct of a criminal investigation because of meritless complaints from Capitol Hill. The sooner this 'seal' is broken, the better."

NYTimes Calls Congressional Claims "Overblown." The New York Times (5/26) editorializes, "The F.B.I. is going to have to show some very good reasons for having precipitated this showdown," but "the constitutional claims made by the Congressional leadership on the Jefferson case seem overblown. House and Senate members are protected from arrest while going about their official business to shield them from intimidation and meddling by the executive branch in the affairs of state, not to deter law enforcement officials from doing their lawful duty to investigate possible felonies." The Times adds that "members of Congress who have been politically comatose or complicit as the Bush administration built itself an imperial presidency, immune from the historical powers of the legislative branch, are up in arms. … It seems like a phony approach to a real problem."

More Commentary. USA Today (5/26) editorializes, "Now we know what it takes to make Congress mad enough to stand up for constitutional rights. When the government snoops on your phone calls and records without warrants, lawmakers barely kick up a fuss. But when the target is a fellow congressman — one under investigation for taking a bribe, no less — they're ready to rumble. … If only those leaders were as profoundly disturbed about executive branch incursions on the rights of average citizens. You certainly have to wonder where they've been for the past several years while the Bush administration ran roughshod over the legislative branch and launched anti-terror programs of questionable legality."

In an editorial, The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/26) criticizes the "unprecedented" FBI raid as "the wrong thing for the FBI or any other body of the federal government to do. At the very least, representatives of the legislative branch of government should have been present for the search, to assure that the FBI limited itself to collecting evidence of crime. Given the Bush administration's general approach to the rule of law…there is otherwise no guarantee of respect of separation of powers," which "was crossed so sharply Saturday night and Sunday."

In an editorial distributed by Scripps Howard (5/26), Dale McFeatters writes, "From the standpoint of public sympathy, the House couldn't have chosen a worse time to stand on constitutional principle. The voters surely do not share the House members' outrage at a weekend FBI raid of a congressional office in connection with a spreading influence-peddling investigation that has tarred the whole institution. … Indeed, after ABC reported that GOP House Speaker Dennis Hastert might get caught up in that probe, Hastert accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him because he so vehemently objected to the raid. This was fine irony coming from a legislator who couldn't do enough to broaden the department's powers through the Patriot Act and its renewal." McFeatters adds, "It says something about the state of relations between the administration and Congress that the Justice Department and White House seemed stunned by the strenuous reaction. After all, they had trampled over Congress' prerogatives before with no discernible reaction. … The two leaders are on shaky constitutional ground, legal scholars say. The Constitution makes an exception to lawmakers' legal immunity for felonies and nothing in that document says Capitol Hill should be a sanctuary for committing them. However, historians could find no precedent for a warrant and search of a congressional office. … Still, there is a serious issue of government to be addressed. The potential for Soviet-style intimidation is clear. Members of Congress must be confident that they are free from politically motivated reprisals from the executive branch and, at the same time, the Justice Department must be free to conduct legitimate investigations into unlawful conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0029504

The Texarkana (TX) Gazette (5/26) editorializes, "Basically, the august members of Congress figure they are entitled to the equivalent of diplomatic immunity while on Capitol Hill. … This imperial attitude has no real foundation. Lawmakers may be used to deferential treatment and exceptional courtesy—and even expect law enforcement to look the other way from time to time—but they are not above the law and their offices are not akin to church sanctuary. … In fact, their offices are not even theirs. They belong to the people of the United States, many of whom are getting fed up with the pervasive attitude of near-royal entitlement among Washington insiders." The Gazette adds, "This was not political intimidation, which is what the Constitution was guarding against with the separation of powers, but a valid criminal investigation. … Hastert has complained to the president, and the White House says it is taking the Legislative Branch's complaints most seriously. … But the dispute between these two branches of government will almost certainly be decided down the road by the third, the Judicial Branch and the Supreme Court."

Hastert Says FBI Leaked Abramoff Probe Story To Intimidate Him. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 5, 2:40, Vargas) noted, "We reported last night that sources tell us that House Speaker Dennis Hastert was among those whose dealings with Abramoff the FBI has been looking into. We have new details to report, tonight." ABC (Ross) added, "The Department of Justice issued two separate denials of our report. The Speaker demanded a retraction. And his colleagues suggested the FBI was out to get him with a bogus story. … On WGN radio in Chicago, Hastert says the story was a leak planted by the FBI to intimidate him." Hastert: "It's just not true. You know, the Justice Department said there is no investigation. And, you know, this is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people. And we're just not going to be intimidated on it." Ross: "As we reported last night, the investigation is still in its early stages. And our sources say it could well turn out that Hastert did nothing unlawful. But Federal law enforcement sources say the FBI in its next step will soon seek documents and e-mails from a number of members of Congress, who have been linked in the investigation to Abramoff."

The AP (Kellman) reports, "Asked later Thursday whether he thought he Justice Department retaliated against him with the leak, Hastert replied: 'All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect any dots they want to.' 'I thought it was an interesting sequence of events,' he added." DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, "We are not going to dignify or speculate about the motives of anonymous sources providing inaccurate information," but "Correspondent Brian Ross stood by his report, saying he has checked with his sources who say the story accurately represents the facts 'as they know them.' 'There's enough there for them (the FBI) to take a look at the speaker' and other members of Congress, Ross said in an interview." In its story about Bush's order to seal the Jefferson raid documents, The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Neikirk) notes, "White House spokesman Tony Snow said the government did not leak information to undermine Hastert. 'I got pretty categorical denials,' Snow said." In its story on Bush's order, The New York Times (5/26, Hulse, Johnston) adds that Snow "said senior officials at the Justice Department had assured the White House there had been no effort to embarrass Mr. Hastert. 'Just false, false, false,' Mr. Snow said.

CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported Hastert was "downright livid" about the ABC report, and Fox News' Special Report (5/25, Hume) noted that Hastert said the ABC story "could be a political retaliation for his criticism of the FBI's raid."

Other Networks, Cable News Passed On Story. The Washington Post (5/26, A6, Kurtz) reports, "Reporters for NBC, CBS, CNN, Fox News and other news organizations checked out ABC's report but were waved off by law enforcement officials. 'Within 15 minutes, we had three or four basic denials saying in effect this was a complete overreach, and we chose not to run it,' said John Reiss, executive producer of 'NBC Nightly News.'"

Sources Say Novak Told Rove He Would Not Identify Him. Bloomberg (5/26, Keil) reports, "Syndicated columnist Robert Novak assured presidential adviser Karl Rove that he wouldn't identify him to prosecutors investigating the disclosure of a CIA agent's name, a person familiar with the matter said." Bloomberg continues, "Rove told a grand jury that Novak called him shortly after the Central Intelligence Agency asked the Justice Department to investigate who leaked the name of operative Valerie Plame to Novak and other reporters, the person, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said. Novak revealed Plame's name in a July 14, 2003, column, citing unnamed administration officials. … The National Journal, which reported earlier today on the Sept. 29, 2003, conversation between Rove and Novak, said Justice Department prosecutors were concerned that Rove and Novak may have been working on a cover story to protect Rove. The report, citing people familiar with the grand jury testimony of both men, said then-Attorney General John Ashcroft was briefed on the matter." Bloomberg notes, "Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, said the White House deputy chief of staff didn't conspire to hide information. … 'Karl has never urged anyone to testify falsely or withhold information from the grand jury, and no one has ever suggested to him that they would, or that they intended to,' Luskin said in a telephone interview. 'The special counsel has never suggested there is any evidence to support such an allegation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029505

Former Chicago Sanitation Official Testifies About Political Hires. The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "Applicants for city jobs waited by the hundreds in a South Side auditorium for meaningless interviews that had no bearing on who ultimately was hired, a former Streets and Sanitation Department official testified Thursday" at the corruption trial of former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three codefendants. Jack Drumgould "told jurors that Mayor Richard Daley's office dictated who would be hired for 95 percent of blue-collar, union jobs in Streets and Sanitation." He "said he took orders from defendants Robert Sorich and Timothy McCarthy in a secret effort to circumvent a federal court order prohibiting political-based hiring for such jobs." The Tribune adds that defense lawyer Cynthia Giacchetti "challenged Drumgould's credibility on cross-examination," suggesting that he "agreed to cooperate with authorities to spare himself from indictment and retain his $6,000-a-month pension."

Sorich Lawyer May Seek Daley Testimony At Trial. The Chicago Sun-Times (5/25, Warmbir, Korecki) reported, "Mayor Daley could be called as a witness in the ongoing trial of four former city employees accused of routinely ordering the hiring or promotion of people based on politics, a lawyer for one of the defendants indicated Wednesday. The attorney for Robert Sorich opened the door to that possibility during a sidebar in the federal court trial, a transcript released late Wednesday revealed. … 'One of my assumptions is the mayor's testimony that he didn't believe that there was anything improper at the time, and he was not aware that there was anything improper going on. He's already testified under oath to that,'" Sorich defense lawyer Tom Durkin told U.S. District Judge David Coar on Wednesday in a private discussion." The Sun-Times adds, "When Coar asked whether the mayor would come in and testify, Durkin left the door open."

House Committee Backs Limits On Internet Gambling. The AP (5/25, Werner) reports, "A House panel approved legislation Thursday to crack down on the $12 billion Internet gambling industry by applying federal prohibitions to games like online poker, blackjack and roulette." The AP continues, "The bill by Rep. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., would update the 1961 Federal Wire Wager Act to apply to online gambling. It also would outlaw electronic transmission of funds to pay for gambling bets and give law enforcement agencies authority to block such money transfers." The AP adds, "Internet gambling already is mostly illegal in the United States, and most of as many as 2,300 gambling sites in existence are overseas. … The bill approved by the Judiciary Committee would 'prevent offshore fly-by-night gambling businesses from violating the laws of all states,' Goodlatte said. … But half of the $12 billion spent on online gambling is thought to come from U.S. bettors and some companies in this country want to get in on the action. The American Gaming Association, the industry's largest lobby, has opposed online gambling in the past but last month backed a study of the feasibility of legalizing it."

Bloomberg (5/26) reports, "The Bush administration Justice Department supports the proposed legislation. Online gambling's legal status in the U.S. is unclear. The Justice Department interprets a 1961 law against using telephone lines to place interstate bets as banning online gambling. Goodlatte said his bill would make that explicit." Bloomberg adds, "Gambling on the Internet is a $12 billion-a-year business that is growing rapidly offshore. Internet-based casinos such as PartyGaming Plc and 888 Holdings Plc, operating in locations such as Gibraltar and Antigua, rake in billions from U.S. gamblers. … The Goodlatte measure would force U.S. financial institutions to cooperate with federal law enforcement authorities in shutting down illegal gambling sites based outside the U.S. The measure exempts horse racing, fantasy-sports betting and state lotteries in the U.S. … By carving out an exception for horse racing, the bill hurts dog racing and jalai, Representative Robert Wexler, a Florida Democrat, said. The Judiciary Committee, controlled by Republicans, rejected proposed amendments calling for specific state regulation and for adopting criminal penalties for bettors of fines and up to two years in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0029506

Federal Judge Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend. The Buffalo News (5/26, Herbeck) reports, "When U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin sentenced a suspended Lewiston attorney in a criminal tax case last year, the judge called the man a longtime friend and added, 'It hurts me as much as it does you, Tim.' … The words spoken by the judge in his courtroom last August have caused an appeals court to remove him from the case of Timothy J. Toohey." The News continues, "Toohey, 59, pleaded guilty in February 2003 to underreporting his income by $1 million. Elfvin already has sentenced him three times - twice to probation, and then to 15 months in prison. … But every time, the Second Circuit Appeals Court found legal problems with Elfvin's handling of the case and ordered a resentencing. … Now, the appeals court has removed Elfvin from the case altogether, saying he should have recused himself because of his friendship with Toohey. … 'As is obvious, it's quite a mess,' Elfvin, 88, said in an interview with The Buffalo News on Wednesday. 'It's probably a good idea to have another judge handle it.'" The News notes, "A panel of appeals judges said remarks made by Elfvin in court last August revealed that his friendship with Toohey had caused him to be lenient on two previous occasions. … 'Those first two sentences really go back to a lot of the relationship that you and I had when I was practicing law,' Elfvin told Toohey, according to court records. 'You were a great friend, a good guy. . . . I really bent over backwards on your behalf in that regard. That explains those two sentences.' … After saying those words last August, Elfvin sentenced Toohey to 15 months in prison. Toohey's attorneys then appealed that sentencing, and Toohey has been out of prison while the appeal is pending. … The Toohey case has not yet been reassigned. The chief federal judge of Western New York, Richard J. Arcara, is expected to determine who will handle the case."

Circuits Divided On Lethal Injection. The National Law Journal (5/26, Maclean) reports, "A frustrated five-judge minority on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decried the 'dysfunctional patchwork of stays and executions' in capital cases since January, when the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to explore a procedural attack on lethal injection." The Journal continues, "Some 38 states use lethal injection out of the 39 that permit capital punishment. In all, courts around the country have granted nine stays of execution, but 15 condemned inmates have been executed during the same period that the lethal injection issue has been pending. … 'In some instances stays are granted, while others they are not, and the defendants are executed with no principled distinction to justify such a result,' wrote Judge Boyce Martin Jr. last week. He dissented after the full 6th Circuit refused, by a 7-5 vote, to reconsider the request to stay the Tennessee execution of Sedley Alley in Alley v. Little, No. 06-6550." The Journal adds, "Alley faced execution on May 17 for the 1985 rape and murder of a 19-year-old Marine corporal, Suzanne M. Collins, at Millington Naval Air Station near Memphis. Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen last week granted a 15-day stay of execution. Alley's case is the second to challenge the Tennessee chemical protocol used in executions. The other, Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen, No. 05-1036, was set for the high court's conference meeting one day after Alley's scheduled execution. Rahman's case raises a frontal attack on lethal injection. … Critics claim that the chemicals used in lethal injections do not properly anesthetize the subject, and thus cause unnecessary suffering before death. … The situation around the country is unnerving for defense lawyers where stays may be handed out in one circuit but denied in the circuit next door."

Gotti Trial Judge Critical Of New Federal Indictment. The AP (5/26, Neumeister) reports, "The third racketeering trial of John 'Junior' Gotti was postponed Thursday by a federal judge who suggested the government was trying to sneak references to murders into a rewritten indictment." The AP continues, "The judge said it seemed the government was trying to reword the indictment until it could find a combination that would result in a conviction." The AP adds, "Two cases against Gotti in the last year ended with hung juries after defense attorneys argued that the mob scion had quit the crime mob life in 1999. … 'I'm really troubled,' U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin said of the new Gotti indictment, which includes an allegation that Gotti promoted people within the Gambino crime family if they committed murders. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou said there was no specific new evidence he could immediately point to that would support the murder references in Gotti's racketeering indictment. … Scheindlin reset opening statements in the next trial by seven weeks, from July 5 to Aug. 28, so lawyers would have enough time to argue the issues."

Prosecutor Assails Wecht Lawyers' Contentions In Evidence Motion. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (5/26, Conti) reports, "Federal prosecutors responded Thursday to allegations made by former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht's defense team that the district attorney and an FBI agent built a case against the renowned forensic pathologist based on politics and lies. Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings asked U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab to dismiss Wecht's request to have evidence tossed out, calling the defense team's previous court filings a 'journey down a road to a tangle of conspiracy theories.'" The Tribune-Review adds, "Also irrelevant to the charges against Wecht, Stallings wrote, are allegations that FBI Special Agent Brad Orsini…has a bad reputation and once asked a witness to lie. According to a ruling by Schwab last month, prosecutors have two reports outlining Orsini's history of departmental reprimands."

DOJ_NMG_0029507

FBI Finds Nothing At Barn Site In Search For Hoffa Remains. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/26, Krisher) reports, "After tearing apart a barn, FBI agents began digging up the ground where it stood Thursday, taking photos and video and sifting through dirt by hand as they searched for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a suburban Detroit farm. After a backhoe dug a hole at the site, FBI agents and crime-scene investigators jumped in to take pictures and comb through the soil. At one point, two dogs were sent into the hole. But after seven hours of digging, FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said nothing significant was found," calling it "Much ado about nothing." She added that "the search was expected to continue through the Memorial Day holiday weekend."

FBI Recovers $1.1 Million From Miami Airport Heist. The Miami Herald (5/26, Weaver, 323K) reports, "FBI agents have dug up $1.1 million in vacuum-packed cash stashed at two southwest Miami-Dade houses, recovering some of the loot stolen in a Goodfellas-style heist at Miami International Airport. Agents unearthed $300,000 of the sealed cash under brick pavers at the home of Karls and Cinnamon Monzon, who were indicted along with two others in last fall's $7.4 million warehouse ripoff at MIA. They also found an additional $800,000 at the residence of another person who has not been charged in the federal case. 'We're still searching for the rest of the money and for other suspects,' FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said Thursday. The FBI found the stolen cash in mid-May." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/26, Johnson, 249K) notes, "A total of $1.26 million has been recovered so far, but it is only a small chunk of the $7.4 million taken from the cash shipment that arrived at the airport," bound for the Miami Federal Reserve Bank. Orhuela said, "We're still looking. We're going to follow all the logical leads we can until we find it all."

Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Skills Showing At Maryland Murder Trial. The Baltimore Sun (5/26, Scharper) reports, "John Allen Muhammad, who aggressively hammered his former accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo with questions and shouted at prosecutors yesterday, appeared deflated today, as three witnesses whom he had called added little or nothing to his defense." The Sun continues, "Muhammad, who is representing himself, meekly ceded to most of the prosecution's objections that his questions were leading, inappropriate or irrelevant. … The state rested its case against Muhammad, 45, yesterday after unveiling an enormous amount of evidence over three weeks, including ballistics reports, fingerprints, DNA and Malvo's firsthand account of the pair's murderous rampage. Muhammad is on trial in Montgomery County for six counts of murder in the October 2002 sniper shootings." The Sun adds, "One of the defense witnesses, Heidi Mansen of Silver Spring, said outside the courtroom that she believes Muhammad is guilty of the slayings, and she hopes her testimony won't sway the jury. … 'I'm hoping that my testimony amounts to nothing compared to the other evidence against him,' Mansen said. She testified that she saw a red car feet away from the scene of one of the sniper shootings. Police later said that the car was not involved in that crime. … 'I felt bad because I had testified against the wrong person,' Mansen said. 'Just because I saw something doesn't mean that's what really happened.'" The Sun notes, "Muhammad's lack of legal finesse hampered his efforts in questioning other witnesses. … He doggedly tried to ask a Secret Service agent about a report that could not be entered into evidence as prosecutors successfully blocked nearly every question."

The Washington Times (5/26, Ward) reports, "Muhammad had little luck yesterday with witnesses he called in his defense, so today he might testify himself. … 'I reserve the right to answer that [later],' Muhammad told Montgomery County Circuit Judge James L. Ryan, when asked whether he planned to put himself on the stand." The Times adds, "Muhammad is representing himself, even though he has no legal training, and prosecutors objected to more than half of his hundreds of questions to witnesses yesterday, often successfully. … If he does take the stand,

DOJ_NMG_0029508

Muhammad's testimony would take the form of a 'presentation,' his standby attorney, J. Wyndal Gordon, said."

Potential Witnesses Hesitant To Testify For Muhammad. The Washington Post (5/26, B1, Londoño, Rich) reports, "Sniper John Allen Muhammad, who submitted a list of nearly 180 potential witnesses and has closely guarded his defense strategy at his trial in Montgomery County, intends to call no witnesses after today. … 'The difficulty we're having is witnesses don't want to be a part of Mr. Muhammad's defense,' J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's standby attorneys, told the judge. 'I've actually been told: "I don't care what you do. If the judge wants to send the sheriff after me, so be it. I'm not coming."' … Closing arguments could come as soon as Tuesday, and a verdict on six first-degree murder charges in the October 2002 shootings is likely before the end of next week."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (5/26, A20) editorializes, "Whatever Lee Boyd Malvo's reasons were for testifying against fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad this week -- whether to curry favor with prosecutors, or to redeem himself with the victims and their families, or to confront and defy his former mentor at last -- his appearance shed some light on the motive and method behind the pair's murderous binge in October 2002." The Post continues, "Malvo….laid out the older man's sinister purpose in undertaking the series of killings that paralyzed this region for weeks. Mr. Muhammad's intent, Mr. Malvo suggested, was to induce a wave of mayhem in the Washington area that would somehow allow him to take back his three children, whom he had lost to their mother in a custody dispute and who were living in Clinton. The wave of shootings was just the first phase of Mr. Muhammad's plan, Mr. Malvo said; after that he intended to plant bombs that specifically targeted children." The Post adds, "We don't know whether Mr. Malvo's appearance provided any psychological comfort or closure for the surviving victims and their loved ones. For the most part, the face-off between two killers was a sickening spectacle. But it did fill in the blanks of what is publicly known about an event that traumatized this region and left lasting psychological scars, and that has its own value."

Attorney Says Fairfax County Gunman Was Denied Psychiatric Care. The Washington Post (5/26, B1, Jackman) reports, "In the three months before he fatally shot two Fairfax County police officers, Michael W. Kennedy and his parents tried numerous times to get him immediate psychiatric help, their attorney said. Four times, Kennedy was sent home without getting help, and two mental health facilities told them not to bother coming in at all." The Post continues, "On one occasion, Kennedy, 18, who by this time claimed he was talking to God and was threatening suicide, was voluntarily admitted to a mental health facility in Rockville. But after several hours, he left of his own accord and carjacked a vehicle to return home to Fairfax. … 'This young man was crying out for help,' said Richard F. MacDowell Jr., the attorney for Brian and Margaret Kennedy, Michael Kennedy's parents. 'On at least five occasions, they sought mental health services and were turned away. I can't think of another case that would be this compelling as to how ineffective our mental health system has become.'" The Post adds, "Michael Kennedy's last contact with mental health professionals occurred May 4, four days before he carried seven loaded guns to the Sully District police station and opened fire, MacDowell said. Kennedy fatally shot Detective Vicky O. Armel and Officer Michael E. Garbarino before being shot to death by other officers. … MacDowell spoke on behalf of Kennedy's parents to express their frustration at a system that seemed unable or unwilling to help their son. MacDowell said Kennedy's mental condition was never diagnosed, except for "a generalized diagnosis of depression and then anxiety at the end. This was somebody who was obviously deeply troubled.""

Financial Firms Unite To Fight Child Porn. USA Today (5/26, Koch) reports, "The nation's leading banks and credit card companies will soon team with law enforcement in a groundbreaking coalition to catch people who sell child pornography online." USA continues, "The financial institutions will report child porn sites they discover on the Web to a central tip line, slated to expand next month to receive the information. The companies will block transactions for online child porn or, if law enforcement opens an investigation, help track sellers and buyers." USA adds, "The Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography represents a new phase in the war against what has become a multibillion-dollar, international business. Internet service providers, including AOL, already report child porn sites they find. … 'The scope of the problem is much greater than we ever thought. It's mind-boggling,' says Ernie Allen of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, a private group that runs the tip line. Allen says one website can attract tens of thousands of customers, mostly men, who use credit cards to buy $29 monthly subscriptions. 'People are getting into this because they see children as a commodity. There's no question organized crime is involved. … 'I haven't seen anything like it,' adds Drew Oosterbaan, chief of the Justice Department's child exploitation section. 'We're here to support the effort.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029509

Canada Fights Surge In Violent Crime. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Newman) reports from Toronto, "The predawn sting operation last week that resulted in more than 100 arrests of individuals associated with Toronto's Jamestown gang, is being hailed as the city's largest anti-gang sweep ever. The raid netted a substantial cache of guns, cocaine, marijuana, and stolen cars, and more than 1,000 criminal charges were levied." The Monitor continues, "Both the sting operation and the recent legislation are part of a larger crackdown on handguns and gang violence in Canada, particularly in Toronto where handgun murders and injuries doubled between 2004 and 2005. … But while police and the public applaud the hard-line approach, social pundits and criminology professors are skeptical that the approach is getting at the roots of the problem: poverty, illiteracy, dysfunctional families, and racism in a diverse ethnic population. They cite US cities such as Boston, where a similar initiative led to an 80 percent drop in homicide rates by 1999 - a success dubbed the 'Boston miracle.' But fatal shootings have more than doubled since." The Monitor adds, "In Canada, guns and gangs are a relatively new phenomenon, particularly in Toronto, known as 'Toronto the Good' for its traditionally safe streets and low homicide rates. There were 52 deadly handgun shootings in the city in 2005, compared with 12 in 1995. Police and social workers alike attribute the acts largely to young black males - many of whom are the children of West Indian immigrants - who feel marginalized and drop out of school early to join the 'gangsta' culture where they make quick money through drugs, guns, or prostitution."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

North Carolina Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Cross Burning. The Charlotte Observer (5/26, Aronoff) reports, "A former Morganton (NC) resident who admitted building and burning a cross has been sentenced to 20 months in federal prison, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Thursday." The Observer continues, "In 2004, a federal grand jury accused Grady Allan Carswell, 36, now of Lenoir (NC), of putting a burning cross in front of a black couple's home in the Bristol Creek community. … Carswell pled guilty in January 2005 to a one-count indictment related to the incident but said he burned the cross because of a land dispute with another neighbor, not out of racism." The Observer adds, "At a sentencing hearing Monday, U.S. District Judge Lacy Thornburg rejected that argument and ordered Carswell serve the prison time followed by three years' probation. He will also have to pay the victims about $2,200 in restitution. … 'Cross burning remains a vicious symbol of hatred and cannot be tolerated,' Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said in a news release. 'All American families have the right to live where they choose, undisturbed by racist threats.'"

Black Male Initiatives Said To Promote Racial Stereotypes. In a Washington Post op-ed (5/26, A21), Michael Meyers of the New York Civil Rights Coalition says, "I'm sorry to report that 52 years after Brown v. Board of Education, separate but equal is all the rage in certain parts of the education world -- especially on college campuses where special programs are offered that target minority students for 'special' and separate attention, counseling, mentoring, tutoring, residences and instruction. The latest of these race fads are the Black Male Initiatives (BMIs), government-funded and university-sponsored, and underway on campuses in states including Georgia, Kansas, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York." More "and more they are being shown to feature new variants of an old prejudice. This has included stereotyping all black male students as 'at risk,' and, for example, running special classes only for black men at CUNY's Medgar Evers College. This special instruction focused on black men's alleged deficiencies and their need to act more responsibly in order to reclaim their traditional patriarchal roles as leaders in the black community and of the so-called black race."

ANTITRUST:

Former Michigan Schools Official Charged With E-Rate Fraud. The Ann Arbor News (MI) (5/25, Kauth-Karjala) reports, "Former Willow Run schools superintendent Douglas A. Benit and his wife face federal criminal charges that they defrauded another school district and a federal program out of millions of dollars by steering contracts to companies they owned." The News continues, "Benit and his wife, Mary Ann Elam Benit, were arrested Wednesday, a day after a federal grand jury in Detroit returned the indictment. Both were released on $10,000 personal bonds and are scheduled to be arraigned May 31 in federal District Court in Detroit." The News adds, "Benit was fired from Willow Run last fall after a district investigation concluded that Benit had a conflict of interest with two companies that did business with the district and that he may have benefited from the connection. There have been no charges stemming from the Willow Run investigation, although Justice Department officials said the probe is continuing. … The federal indictment includes charges of fraud against the Ecorse Public School district and a federal program called E-Rate, which was intended to help school districts gain better Internet access. Benit was subpoenaed to testify before Congress concerning the E-Rate investigation in 2004. He appeared but declined to testify, citing the protections of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0029510

The Detroit Free Press (5/26, Higgins) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice says Benit used his position in the district, which he left in 2003, to steer contracts -- sometimes at inflated prices -- to Coral Technology Inc., an Ohio company he controlled. It allegedly occurred from March 1998 to October 2003. … The money came from the federal E-Rate program, which provides funding for Internet access and other telecommunications services to poor schools and libraries. The indictments bring to 13 the number of individuals charged as part of the Justice Department's ongoing investigation into fraud in the E-Rate program. Twelve companies have been charged. … The department 'will continue to vigorously pursue those who cheat the competitive process and who violate the public's trust ... by stealing from federal programs and taking advantage of lending institutions,' Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said in a news release."

House Judiciary Committee Votes To Ban Internet Content Fees. Dow Jones (5/26, Hughes) reports, "The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday voted to ban the nation's phone and cable companies from charging extra fees to companies such as Amazon.com Inc. and Google Inc. for speedier delivery of their content." Dow Jones continues, "By 20-13 the panel approved legislation being pushed by more than 100 consumer groups and businesses. The vote was, at least on the surface, a blow to Verizon Communications and AT&T Inc., which have said that new regulations may undercut their ability to invest in high-capacity networks." Dow Jones adds, "House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., is speeding ahead with the bill to assert court jurisdiction over a matter that some would prefer left to regulators. In so doing, he is also seeking to counter efforts by phone companies to keep open the option of building business plans organized around additional fees. … 'While the technological dynamics of the marketplace have changed over time, the threat of dominant firms abusing their market power to restrain competition has not,' Sensenbrenner said."

Google Seals Software Deal With Dell. The New York Times (5/26, Flynn) reports, "Google and Dell have reached an agreement to install Google software on millions of new Dell computers over the next few years, Google's chief executive said on Thursday." The Times continues, "The executive, Eric E. Schmidt, said the arrangement meant that Google's search toolbar would appear on the screens of new Dell systems, and that Dell users would be directed to a Web page branded by the two companies. … Mr. Schmidt, speaking at a Goldman Sachs Internet conference in Las Vegas, said the companies would share revenue from the deal." The Times adds, "While financial terms were not disclosed, many analysts assumed that Google would pay Dell a fee for the arrangement. If that is the case, said Safa Rashtchy, an analyst with Piper Jaffray, this will be the beginning of a era in which Google pays for alliances in order to maintain its growth rate. … Mr. Schmidt said that this would be first of several agreements with Dell. The time period of the deal was not disclosed. … The software, Dell said, would be put only on machines sold to consumers and to small and medium-size businesses. While the consumer market accounted for roughly 14 percent of Dell's revenue last quarter, the deal would nonetheless involve millions of new computers over time."

The Seattle Times/Bloomberg (5/26, Guglielmo, Thaw) reports, "The deal curbs Microsoft's ability to close the gap with Google. Microsoft is putting search in the new Vista version of Windows, scheduled to hit stores in January, in an effort to encourage more customers to use it. … While Microsoft dominates desktop software, Google has four times more users for its Internet search and Google leads in advertising revenue. Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer escalated spending on the company's MSN Internet unit to challenge Google and reclaim share of Internet search."

DOJ_NMG_0029511

Yahoo, eBay Team Up To Battle Google. USA Today (5/26, Graham) reports, "In a bid to challenge Google's growing domination of the Internet, auctioneer eBay joined forces with Google rival Yahoo on Thursday. The alliance brings text-based advertising to eBay from Yahoo and eBay's PayPal payment program to Yahoo. … Yahoo is the most visited website, with more than 100 million monthly visitors. But it has been losing market share in online searches to Google, which dominates the hot search advertising business — those little text ads that appear near search results. According to measurement firm ComScore Media Metrix, Google's search share rose 6.6% in April over the same time a year ago, while Yahoo's fell 2.7%." USA adds, "EBay, the Internet's fifth-most-visited site, according to ComScore, is also the Internet's largest purchaser of search ads, says John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website. 'It was inevitable that Yahoo and eBay would do this deal, because eBay needed to counterbalance its dependence on Google for traffic,' he says."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Delaney, Mangalindan, Guth) reports, "The land rush over the Internet entered a new phase yesterday as four tech titans -- Yahoo Inc., eBay Inc., Google Inc. and Dell Inc. -- announced alliances that signal more jockeying ahead over access to online consumers and the advertising they view on the Web. The high-profile deals also raise fresh questions about Microsoft Corp.'s efforts to keep step in the race." The Journal continues, 'Yahoo and eBay unveiled a broad partnership under which eBay will display ads brokered by Yahoo on its U.S. online auction site and marketplace. Yahoo will promote eBay's PayPal electronic-payment system as a way for consumers to pay for Yahoo services." The Journal notes, "Separately, Google and Dell confirmed an agreement to install Google software on Dell PCs before they are shipped to users. The deal, which Dell says could include as many as 20 million computers a year, will get Google's search services and ads in front of more users. … The agreements are the result of behind-the-scenes efforts by tech companies big and small to form alliances that strengthen their efforts to own a bigger piece of the Web landscape. At stake are huge future profits from Internet users and advertisers, whose buying and spending habits are still in flux."

The Washington Post (5/26, D4, Noguchi) reports, "The partnership spans some of the most critical areas of both companies' businesses, adding eBay's Paypal online payment system throughout Yahoo's operations and giving Yahoo an exclusive deal to sell display ads for eBay.com. … That two of the Internet's top brands decided to cooperate so closely highlights how powerful Google is becoming as it roves across the online business world, competing with eBay in online classifieds and payment systems and with Yahoo in search and content. It also leaves Microsoft in increasing need of a partner of its own, as its online service trails the others in search and advertising."

The New York Times (5/26, Hansell) reports, "The deal will expand Yahoo's share of Internet advertising, a market where it lost leadership to Google. Investors have been worried that eBay's highly profitable shopping site is being undercut as consumers increasingly find products through search engines or through free listing services like Craigslist. Google and Yahoo have introduced similar free services. … At the same time, eBay is spending $260 million a year to advertise its auctions on search engines, with 60 percent of that on Google, according to estimates by Jordan Rohan, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets."

ENVIRONMENT:

GAO Says Bush Greenhouse Gas Programs Not Producing Results. The Washington Post (5/26, A3, Eilperin) reports the Government Accountability Office says the "Bush administration's voluntary programs to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by industry have yet to deliver promised results." The "51-page report, which was requested by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), highlights shortcomings in two projects aimed at encouraging the private sector to cut emissions linked to global warming. The Environmental Protection Agency sponsors 'Climate Leaders,' while the Energy Department oversees 'Climate VISION.'" Both programs "encourage polluters to cut their greenhouse-gas releases, but in each case, according to the study, the administration has failed to ensure that participating firms set firm reduction targets or meet their stated goals."

House Votes To Allow ANWR Drilling. USA Today (5/26) reports, "The House of Representatives voted Thursday to allow oil exploration on a small portion of Alaska's 19 million-acre Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The vote was 225-201 to allow drilling on 1.5 million acres that federal geologists estimate hold 5.4 billion to 16 billion barrels of recoverable oil." The AP (5/26, Hebert) says the House action "may be little more than symbolic. Arctic refuge development, while approved by the House five times, repeatedly has been blocked in the Senate where drilling proponents have been unable to muster the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster." The AP adds, "Access to ANWR's oil has been a key part of President Bush's energy agenda, although over the last five years he's been unable to convince Congress of its merits. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Thursday urged the Senate to pass a drilling measure 'so we can strengthen our nation's energy security.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029512

The Washington Post (5/26, A5, Eilperin) notes the measure "marks the 12th time since 1995 that the House has voted in favor of opening the refuge to oil and gas development." The New York Times (5/26, Janofsky) runs a similar report.

The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Simon) reports "jittery" House Republicans "wanted to return to their districts for Memorial Day able to say that they had acted on energy legislation before the summer vacation season begins."

NYTimes Says Only Disasters Prompted Mine Safety Overhaul Bills. The New York Times (5/26) says in an editorial, "Another mine disaster is finally spurring Congress to pass long overdue repairs to the nation's threadbare safety laws. Mandates for such obvious necessities as extra oxygen supplies for trapped miners languished after an initial burst of concern over the disaster in January that killed 12 miners in Sago, W.Va. But the explosion last weekend in Kentucky that killed five miners has been followed by quick Senate approval of a bill ordering extra oxygen, more responsive rescue teams, and stronger underground barriers to seal off danger zones from workers. The Republican leaders in the House, lagging behind the Senate, hurried to catch up. But the sad truth is that safety equipment and rescue procedures have been scandalously neglected for years under company-friendly regulations that have been laxly enforced by government agencies stocked with political appointees who have come from the coal industry."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Prescription Drug Distributor Pleads Guilty To Selling Stolen Drugs. The AP (5/26) reports former drug distributor Gregory Broccoli "admitted Thursday that he sold $7.3 million worth of prescription drugs that he knew were stolen from warehouses and trucks." Broccoli "pleaded guilty to five conspiracy charges, acknowledging wrongdoing from 2002 through 2004 at a company he operated in Jersey City and Elizabeth called Providers Plus. Broccoli, 39, of Staten Island, N.Y., is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with a federal investigation that began in 2003." The "FBI investigation and guilty pleas from the defendants exposed a network of thieves and crooked wholesalers who obtained prescription drugs through illegal means, created fraudulent documents, and then reintroduced the prescription drugs into the marketplace, federal prosecutors in New Jersey said."

Reporting Continues On Overdoses Linked To Fentanyl-Laced Drugs. The AP (5/25) reports a mixture of heroin and a powerful painkiller "has been killing unsuspecting users who believe they are taking pure heroin. Officials from Philadelphia to Chicago have reported deaths from the drug, called fentanyl and considered 80 times more powerful than morphine. In the Detroit area - the apparent hub of the problem with more than 100 confirmed cases since last fall and about two dozen suspected ones in the last week - officials from the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are investigating, and community organizations are scrambling to get the word out to users."

In a sidebar, the AP (5/25) outlines reported deaths associated with the fentanyl-laced drugs.

The Detroit Free Press (5/25, Ben Schmitt, Hunt, Norris) reports local toxicologists "say they've seen a steady increase in fentanyl-related deaths since last fall, but nothing prepared them for the jump that began last week: At least 23 people have died in Wayne County since May 18 from what investigators believe was a lethal combination of heroin or cocaine and fentanyl. Now, as Michiganders gear up for the long holiday weekend and outdoor activities, county and Detroit officials are scrambling to get the word out about the drug's dangers." The Free Press adds, "Deaths linked to fentanyl-laced drugs have been reported in smaller numbers in cities across the country, including Chicago and Philadelphia, and investigated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency since last fall."

DOJ_NMG_0029513

In a separate story, the Detroit Free Press (5/25, Hunt) reports, "Law enforcement officials investigating fentanyl-related deaths in Wayne County say drug dealers could be crystallizing prescription fentanyl to use as a cutting agent for heroin and cocaine, but they doubt it. They believe someone is manufacturing the drug in an illegal lab."

The Detroit News (5/26) reports, "The Wayne County death toll attributed to fentanyl-laced drugs has reached 33 people in one week, putting Metro Detroit at the epicenter of a national health concern that reaches into several other states. There have been at least 200 confirmed deaths in five states attributed to the painkiller mixed with heroin or cocaine, with 130 of them in Wayne County since January 2005."

"Operation Street Sweep" Nets Suspects Facing Drug Charges In Tennessee. Memphis, Tennessee's, Commercial Appeal (5/26) reports, "Just two hours into Thursday's roundup, two teams of officers supervised by Memphis Police Lt. Charles 'Bubba' Cox had picked up four of 10 suspects on his list of those wanted on state or federal warrants. By late afternoon, 48 of 67 people indicted on drug and gun charges were behind bars in Operation Street Sweep. … Thirty of the suspects were being sought on federal indictments returned this week, and 24 are wanted for state crimes, mainly drug offenses. … At their first stop, one team, led by Joe Hoing, a 32-year Memphis police veteran assigned to the DEA drug task force, caught up with Nicholas Hull, 28, named in six counts of crack possession."

17 People From 3 States Face Charges In Drug Investigation. The AP (5/25) reports, "Seventeen people from Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts have been arrested on drug charges after a seven-month undercover investigation. Edward Arias and Jose Ortiz, both of Lawrence, Mass., were indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine by a federal grand jury in New Hampshire. They supplied more than 150 pounds of cocaine to southern Maine, said Kittery, Maine, Police Chief Edward Strong. Up to 15 more people could be arrested as the investigation continues, he said." The AP notes DEA involvement in the investigation.

The Portsmouth (NH) Herald News (5/25) reports, "News this week that 17 people are facing federal and state cocaine and marijuana distribution charges has 'definitely put a dent' in the local drug trade - from significant suppliers right down to street dealers," according to Strong.

Ohio Businessman Accused Of Money Laundering Pleads Guilty. The Dayton (OH) Daily News (5/26) reports a businessman "admitted Thursday to a federal felony charge of money laundering. … Glen Hurst, 55, of Butler Twp. pleaded guilty as part of a plea agreement." Hurst was "indicted in a wide-ranging case that focused on drug kingpin Earl Marshall, who pleaded guilty April 18 to five felonies and faces at least 18 years in prison. In 2004, federal officials called the case one of the largest trafficking operations in Dayton. It was investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and Drug Enforcement Administration."

Researcher Finds "No Association" Between Marijuana And Lung Cancer. Reporting continues on a marijuana study done in California. The Washington Post (5/26, Kaufman) today reports, "The largest study of its kind has unexpectedly concluded that smoking marijuana, even regularly and heavily, does not lead to lung cancer. The new findings 'were against our expectations,' said Donald Tashkin of the University of California at Los Angeles, a pulmonologist who has studied marijuana for 30 years. … Federal health and drug enforcement officials have widely used Tashkin's previous work on marijuana to make the case that the drug is dangerous. Tashkin said that while he still believes marijuana is potentially harmful, its cancer-causing effects appear to be of less concern than previously thought."

Idaho Man Indicted On Drug-Smuggling Charges. The AP (5/26) reports, "A federal grand jury has indicted a Sandpoint, Idaho, man on charges he attempted to smuggle marijuana, methamphetamine and the designer drug Ecstacy into the United States from Canada. Joseph A. Roberts, 43, was arrested by U.S. Border Patrol agents May 7…just south of the Canadian border in Okanogan County. … Federal prosecutors allege Roberts had nearly 170 pounds of 'B.C. Bud' marijuana, 143 pounds of methamphetamine and 16 pounds of Ecstasy when arrested."

Judge Refuses To Halt California Gun-Store Closure. The Chico (CA) Enterprise Record (5/26, Richman) reports, "A federal judge refused (Thursday) to postpone the government-imposed closing date for Northern California's largest gun dealer, Trader Sports of San Leandro, due to extensive violations of federal law." The Record continues, "Chief U.S. District Court Judge Vaughn Walker found that although Trader Sports likely will be hurt more by the closure than the public would be by allowing the store to remain open, the gun dealer hasn't substantially disputed the claims against it and isn't likely enough to succeed in its claims of an unfair administrative hearing to deserve a court-ordered stay. … Vaughn gave the store until June 2 - one day past the government's previously imposed deadline - to take the case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and seek a stay there. The store's attorney, Malcolm Segal of Sacramento, said he'll have to ask store owner Anthony Cucchiara whether to appeal." The Record adds, "The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms served Cucchiara months ago with notice that he'd have to surrender his license and close his store effective June 1. This followed a 13-month administrative hearing in which the ATF used evidence from a September 2003 inspection, along with earlier information, to argue Trader Sports has flouted federal firearms sale reporting requirements for years."

DOJ_NMG_0029514

The San Francisco Chronicle (5/26, Bulwa) reports, "Those who have been watching the fight between Cucchiara and the firearms bureau said it carries implications beyond the plight of a San Leandro gun shop. Trader Sports has a history of run-ins with regulators and is a high-profile target of gun-control groups. … 'Trader Sports is one of the worst of the worst,' Daniel Vice, a staff attorney for the pro-gun-control Brady Campaign in Washington, D.C., said Wednesday. He said license revocations are significant because the government issues them so rarely. … The U.S. attorney's office, which is defending the firearms bureau in the lawsuit, said the inspection of Trader Sports in September 2003 found 3,659 firearms on hand, even though store records showed 9,100 guns in inventory. … Cucchiara and the federal inspectors had tried to reconcile the discrepancy and found that an additional 2,036 guns could not be accounted for, bringing the total to 7,477, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lee wrote in a legal filing."

Dallas Gun-Crime Team Wins DOJ Award. The Dallas Business Journal (5/26) reports, "The city of Dallas' criminal prosecution team has received federal laurels for a program that has helped to reduce gun crime involving repeat offenders." The Journal continues, "Gun crimes committed by parolees in Dallas between October 2003 and September 2005 fell by about 45 percent, according to a recent crime study." The Journal adds, "The prosecution team -- which helped plan and implement the program -- was honored with a U. S. Department of Justice Project Safe Neighborhoods Achievement Award for exemplary local training, according to a Justice Department news release. … The community prosecutors, who have offices in seven Dallas neighborhoods, and others in law enforcement created a program that requires probationers and parolees to attend workshops that inform them of the consequences of violating terms of their release, which include not using or possessing firearms. … The Dallas team was nominated for the award by U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper of the Northern District of Texas. The award was presented by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul J. McNulty during a national conference earlier this month."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Approves Immigration Reform Bill By 62-36 Margin. The Senate yesterday approved an immigration reform bill supported by the White House that includes a path to citizenship. The margin of victory for the measure was 62-36. Most reports this morning, however, see little chance that a bill with get to President Bush's desk. Instead, many observers predict the upcoming negotiations with the House to come up with a compromise bill will end in failure. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Havemann), for example, says the task of reconciling the House and Senate bills "may prove impossible." Similarly, the New York Times (5/26, Swarns) says "Republican leaders acknowledged that delivering a final bill to President Bush's desk would be enormously difficult." Another New York Times story (5/26, Rutenberg) also concludes that "all indications are that once the negotiators…will hit a wall." The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer), meanwhile, reported Senate and House negotiators "will now try to work out the differences between their two versions, and it's not at all clear that they will succeed."

Still, says the Los Angeles Times (5/26, Gauette), "passage of the Senate bill represents a victory for Bush, who began a push for a broad overhaul of immigration policy with a speech in January 2004. His proposals sparked an extended debate about border security, the role of immigrants in American life and how best to deal with the estimated 12 million people who are in the country illegally."

DOJ_NMG_0029515

Bush's continued involvement in the process is seen as crucial to any chances for a House-Senate deal. The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Babington) reports "Democrats and Republicans alike said a House-Senate accord will be nearly impossible without the vigorous involvement of President Bush, who favors an approach similar to the Senate's." The White House "has already begun lobbying efforts, but it faces resistance from more than 200 House Republicans seeking reelection this fall, many in districts where the sentiment against illegal immigrants runs high." Knight Ridder (5/26, Montgomery) says "backers of the bipartisan Senate plan…acknowledge that the president is weakened by declining polls and his growing lame-duck status." Knight Ridder also runs a statement by Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer urging Bush to push for compromise, "After tonight, whether this bipartisan balance still survives or not really rests in the hands of the man at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue." USA Today (5/26, Kiely) runs a similar Schumer statement, "The ball is in the president's court."

ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 3, 2:10, Stephanopoulos) reported, "It's a rare sight in this Senate. Republicans and Democrats, together, declaring victory." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "This is a success for the American people. It is success for people who hope and participate -- hope to participate someday in that American dream." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid: "I am so proud of the Senate. This is the way that we should legislate: In a bipartisan basis." Stephanopoulos: "Now comes the hard part. The immigration proposals passed by the Senate today and the house last December are at odds on matters of core principle and hard politics," and "House leaders insist they won't budge on any measure that makes illegal immigrants citizens." The Senate "does have the White House on its side." White House press secretary Tony Snow: "The people who, at the end of this process, stand up and take the oath, will have spent more money and waited longer than any group in American history for the right to become American citizens."

NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 4, 2:10, Brown) reported, "The Senate bill includes beefed-up border security, including 6,000 National Guard troops, a guest worker program requested by the President, and, most controversial of all, a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the US supporters call that earned citizenship, noting that illegal immigrants would have to pay backs taxes and a fine, work for at least six years and learn US history and English, which the bill declares the national language." But "many House Republicans vigorously oppose both the guest worker program and citizenship for illegal immigrants, which they call amnesty."

The Washington Times (5/26, Dinan) reports the White House "yesterday predicted that the chamber's Republicans will give in." White House press secretary Tony Snow "said House Republicans will want to pass border security badly enough to back down from the fight against what many consider amnesty for illegal aliens, knowing there is a 'heavier political price for failing to act, than for acting.'" Said Snow, "If you are a Republican member of Congress and you're concerned about illegal immigration, do you really want to say to your constituents: You know, I'm going to wait a couple of years before I take up the issue of people knowingly hiring illegal aliens, I want to wait a couple of years before I go ahead and try to identify who the illegal aliens are, I want to wait a couple of years before I start grappling with what to do with these 11 or 12 million people who are here illegally.'"

Also offering a hopeful outlook for the upcoming talks, the Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Chaddock) says "GOP leaders are hopeful that threshold can be met, he adds. 'This will be a difficult conference, but the Speaker believes we can get to a balanced bill that will put border security first.'" This week, Bush's "top political adviser, Karl Rove, made his second trip to Capitol Hill to boost prospects for a compromise. While several Republicans who spoke with the press after the closed meeting said they were not convinced, others are signaling they may be interested in helping to broker a deal."

The AP (5/26, Espo) reports the House bill, "which passed on a largely party-line vote last year, is generally limited to border enforcement. It would make all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and it contains no provision for either a new temporary worker program or citizenship for men, women and children in the country unlawfully." In contrast, the Senate bill "would mark the most far-reaching changes in immigration law in two decades."

Fox News' Special Report (5/25, Hume) reported, "The stage is set tonight for a crucial and potentially contentious negotiation over immigration reform." Fox (Garrett) called the measure is "the most ambitious and politically perilous reform of immigration laws in at least 20 years."

The Chicago Tribune (5/26, James) calls the legislation's future "uncertain, especially in an election year. … House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) issued a non-committal statement that didn't even acknowledge that the Senate bill had any acceptable provisions and instead espoused the immigration priorities sought by the House majority in passing its measure in December." Boehner also "urged House Democrats to stop advocating 'troubling policies that encourage open borders and invite more illegal immigrants into our country' and to join House Republicans in making US borders more secure."

DOJ_NMG_0029516

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Kronholz, Lueck) reports, "Business lobbyists also hope to use the conference to boost the guest-worker program to 325,000 workers yearly from the 200,000 the bill now allows, and permit the number to rise further to meet labor-market demands." But "the House and Senate bills are so vastly different that there may be little room for compromise, and even less for measures that could be seen as improving the prospects of immigrants."

The Washington Times (5/26, Hurt) headlines its story "Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens," and describes the bill as one that "allows 10 million illegal aliens to become citizens, doubles the flow of legal immigration each year and will cost U.S. taxpayers an estimated $54 billion over the next 10 years." On the other hand, the Washington Post (5/26, A8, Goldstein) says "advocates of expanded immigration rights complain that 'hidden traps' woven through the bill's 300 pages erode significant due-process protections for all foreign-born people living in the United States. A coalition of civil rights, religious and legal groups says the legislation would make it easier for the government to detain or deport immigrants -- whether in the country legally or not -- while making it more difficult for them to prove they deserve asylum or naturalization." The Post adds, "One provision would add to the list of acts considered 'aggravated felonies' under immigration law -- automatic grounds for removal from the country. The rewritten list would include carrying fraudulent documents."

Ombudsman Says CIS Could Handle Guest Worker Program With Enough Funding, Time. The AP (5/26) reports CIS Ombudsman Prakash I. Khatri said yesterday that the agency could "definitely" handle a guest worker program that would provide illegal immigrants with a path to citizenship, as called for under the Senate's immigration bill, but that the "key" would be "funding and time allocated under the law." If such a program emerges from the Senate's compromise talks with the House, it "would greatly increase the workload of an agency already facing a backlog that has left some immigrants waiting years for citizenship or the 'green cards' that provide permanent residence status. US Citizenship and Immigration Services would need to hire and train more staff and require facilities to process the millions of applications expected, Khatri said."

Border Patrol Poised For "Unprecedented" Expansion. USA Today (5/26, Hall) reports the "482 students on this remote campus" at Artesia, New Mexico "are Border Patrol agents-in-training undergoing a rigorous, 19-week course. The Border Patrol Academy prepares men and women to join the rapidly swelling ranks of the agency that polices the nation's porous borders." The number of Border Patrol agents "has been growing since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and the grounds here reflect that. A new academic building with nine 50-seat classrooms has just been completed; a $14 million, 50,000-square-foot addition to the gym is under construction; and new dorms are on the way." The academy's "going to need the extra space. After three years of steady growth, the Border Patrol is about to embark on an unprecedented expansion. If Congress approves President Bush's request for 6,000 new agents over the next 21/2 years, the patrol will have 18,000 agents on the nation's 5,000 miles of border with Mexico and Canada. That would double the number of agents since 9/11 raised new concerns about terrorists' ability to slip into the country across land borders."

Border Patrol Warns Desert Crossing Death Toll To Rise. The Washington Times (5/26, Seper) reports the US Border Patrol "says an increase in the number of people who die trying to cross the desert to enter the United States illegally is expected as summer temperatures rise, and efforts are being made to ask the Mexican media to warn would-be crossers of the dangers involved." Last year, "473 persons died on the Southwest border -- a record number of deaths. Since Oct. 1, the Border Patrol reported 210 deaths -- 43 more than the same period a year ago. The western desert of Arizona accounted for more than 56 percent of the total number of deaths."

Fox Gets Mixed Reception At California Legislature. The New York Times (5/26, Broder) reports that in an "echo of the debate on immigration under way in Washington, the California Legislature gave visiting President Vicente Fox of Mexico a two-edged welcome on Thursday." Democratic and Latino members, "including the Assembly speaker, Fabian Núñez, embraced Mr. Fox, while some Republicans boycotted his evening address to a joint session of the Legislature. Other Republicans attended the speech, but wore yellow buttons reading 'No mas!' to protest Mr. Fox's support for liberalizing American policies on immigration."

DOJ_NMG_0029517

US To Deport 15 Undocumented Aliens Captured In Hanover County. The Washington Times (5/26, McLaughlin) reports the US Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency "is preparing to deport 15 illegal aliens from Mexico and Guatemala who were arrested Tuesday in Hanover County after the speeding van they were in was stopped by police." ICE spokeswoman Ernestine Fobbs said, "They were issued notices to appear before an immigration judge and more than likely will be removed from the United States."

Mexico's Failure To Improve Its Economy Criticized. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (5/26), Joel Kurtzman and Glenn Yago of the Milken Institute say, "The problem with the debate on immigration is that it has so far looked at just one side -- ours. Somehow, for political or other reasons, Mexico has escaped scrutiny. And yet we are suffering for Mexico's myriad of economic sins. Our part in creating the immigration mess is that we built a society filled with opportunities but surrounded it with a porous border. Mexico's part is that it has failed to produce enough growth, despite massive wealth. The solution is to open the borders even wider -- but open up Mexico, too. If Mexicans can come here, let our capital and ingenuity invest there freely. President Fox, tear down that investment-restriction wall!" The "only way for Mexico to reduce the number of workers it sends to the U.S. is to transform itself into a jobs-producing, high-opportunity economy. The way to begin would be to allow unfettered U.S. investment."

Dionne Says Proponents Of "Liberal" Immigration Policy Need To Address Costs. In his Washington Post column (5/26, A21), EJ Dionne says, "But advocates of a more liberal policy toward illegal immigrants need to take seriously the discontent that the anti-immigration movement has tapped into. Immigration has been a blessing to the United States, but it is not an unmixed blessing, and the costs of our immigration policies are borne more heavily by some parts of our society than others. Rather than dismiss all immigration critics as xenophobes, supporters of immigrant rights need to deal with the legitimate gripes of their opponents." The "most basic (and perhaps the simplest to deal with) is that immigrants cost local governments money even as they fill federal coffers with income, especially from payroll taxes." A National Academy of Sciences study "found that the average immigrant puts a net lifetime fiscal cost of $25,000 on state and local governments." But "less straightforward but still important are the effects of illegal immigration on the wages and working conditions of our fellow citizens at the bottom of the income structure."

Ivins Says Enforcement Approach To Immigration Reform Is Racist. In her syndicated column, which was run in the Chicago Tribune (5/26), Molly Ivins criticizes immigration reforms aimed at boosting enforcement, saying, "By all means, reform immigration with this deep obeisance to the Republican right-wing nut faction and their open contempt for 'foreigners.' But do not pretend for one minute that it is not a craven political bow to racism (Yes, racism--I am actually calling them racists, although they pretend it hurts their feelings. Try reading their Web sites and see for yourself), and to nativism, to xenophobia and to Know-Nothingism. Just don't forget what you are throwing away in the process."

TAX:

Treasury Ends Phone Tax. USA Today (5/26, Davidson) reports, "The Treasury Department said Thursday that it will no longer collect a 3% federal excise tax on long-distance calls and would refund about $15 billion to taxpayers." The tax "was imposed in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War. It was designed as a tax on wealthy Americans, back when phone service was considered a luxury."

The New York Times (5/26, Belson) says "the abolition of the tax, effective July 31, will cost the Treasury $5 billion annually in lost revenues in the next few years. With budget deficits soaring, the Treasury had been slow to scrap the tax." But "several federal courts ruled in recent years that it was no longer applicable to customers with unlimited long-distance plans." The Internal Revenue Service "has refunded hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes to companies including OfficeMax and the American Bankers Insurance Group based on the court decisions." The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Matthews) and Washington Post (5/26, D2, Crenshaw) also report the story.

Dow Jones (5/26) reports, "Millions of individuals and businesses that paid the tax will be eligible for refunds, plus interest, for taxes paid on long-distance service billed after Feb. 28, 2003. Tax experts said it may be the broadest case involving elimination of a tax through a legal challenge. …

DOJ_NMG_0029518

Snow summed up the government's capitulation: 'The American taxpayers have been right.'"

MarketWatch (5/26, Bartash) reports, "The Treasury also said the Justice Department would cease litigation in support of the tax after a handful of federal appeals courts ruled the fee illegal in decisions rendered within the past year. The most recent loss in federal court occurred earlier this month. … 'The Federal Appeals courts have spoken across the board,' Treasury Secretary John Snow said in a statement. 'It's time to "disconnect" this tax and put it on the permanent "do not call" list.'" MarketWatch adds, "The tax, which generates more than $6 billion annually, has survived repeated efforts to eliminate it, most recently in 2000, when President Bill Clinton vetoed a larger bill that included a repeal of the excise fee. … Bills aimed at ending the tax have circulated every year since. Businesses call the tax unfair and outdated. Phone companies say it's costly and complex to administer. Consumer-advocacy groups say the flat-rate fee put an undue burden on poorer Americans. Virtually no one in Washington supported the tax."

FBI, IRS Seek Florida Water District Land Transaction Records. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/26, Burdi, 249K) reports, "The FBI and Internal Revenue Service on Thursday went after documents regarding a controversial land deal involving Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti and the South Florida Water Management District. A subpoena for the documents was served on the water management district, Chairman Kevin McCarty confirmed." The Sun-Sentinel notes, "In recent months, Masilotti and his ex-wife, Susan, have come under scrutiny for making more than $1.3 million through a series of complex transactions in Martin County, according to court and land records." McCarty said that "the water management district will turn over all the documents, which could take up to 30 days."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Frist Hopeful Hayden Will Get Confirmation Vote Before Recess. The AP (5/26, Shrader) reports CIA director-nominee Michael Hayden "awaited confirmation from the Senate Thursday evening in a vote that would install the four-star general and veteran of intelligence controversies atop the civilian spy agency." Majority Leader Bill Frist said he "remained hopeful the Senate could take up Hayden's nomination before departing for the Memorial Day recess."

Landrieu Agrees To Lift Hold On Kempthorne Nomination. CQ (5/25, Tollefson) reports Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, D-La., "agreed Thursday to lift her hold on President Bush's nomination of Idaho Governor Dirk Kempthorne to be Interior secretary, setting the stage for a confirmation vote on Friday." Landrieu's decision "came a day after Republican leaders filed for cloture. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said a vote is slated for Friday morning." Landrieu used the Kempthorne nomination "to press her case that Louisiana and other Gulf Coast states should be earning a greater share of royalties from offshore energy production. Landrieu cited 'significant progress' in the attempt to gain more of the royalty revenue and said Kempthorne has demonstrated he will be a 'partner' in helping coastal Louisiana pursue hurricane protection, flood control and coastal restoration aid."

Democrats Put Hold On Schwab Nomination. CQ (5/26, Van Dongen) reports the nomination of Susan Schwab to become the next US trade representative "has run into multiple roadblocks, with Democratic Senators blocking a confirmation vote." Democratic Senator Patrick Leahy (VT) "put a hold on the nomination—which he released Thursday—because of a disagreement with the Bush administration over whether it will enforce a provision in a World Trade Organization (WTO) agreement that would permit US companies to sell low-cost generic drugs to needy nations." Meanwhile Sen. Charles Schumer (D-NY), who "blasted her on the administration's approach to opening market access to China," has "not released a second hold" on Schwab's confirmation, CQ notes.

Senate Clears Way For Vote On Kavanaugh Nomination. The AP (5/26, Kellman) reports the Senate "cleared the way Thursday for the confirmation of White House aide Brett Kavanaugh to a federal appeals court judgeship, over Democratic complaints that he is unseasoned and partisan. By 67-30, senators approved a confirmation vote, set for Friday." Democrats, however," complained that Kavanaugh has a long record of loyalty to President Bush and too short a record in the courtroom. They highlighted the American Bar Association's recent downgrading of its rating of Kavanaugh from 'highly qualified' to qualified."

DOJ_NMG_0029519

CQ (5/25, Perine) reports Kavanaugh "is all but certain to be confirmed Friday for a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit." With Kavanaugh's confirmation "now in the bag, conservative activists are clamoring for Frist to pick a fight with Democrats over several of Bush's other, more contentious nominees. So far, Frist is keeping mum about his intentions, other than to say he plans to call up the other appellate court nominees pending on the Senate calendar before the end of the 109th Congress." The nominations "of William G. Myers III to the 9th Circuit and Terrence W. Boyle to the 4th Circuit have both been on the calendar since last year. But Frist declined Thursday to say when he would move on those nominations."

The New York Times (5/26, Stolberg) reports Democrats "said Mr. Kavanaugh, who was on the staff of Kenneth W. Starr, the independent counsel who investigated President Bill Clinton, was too partisan and lacked the experience for the appellate bench. But the senators were unwilling to block the nomination using a filibuster. That tactic could have prompted Republicans to respond with the so-called nuclear option, a rules change permanently barring judicial filibusters."

Tony Snow Seen As Improving Press Relations While Delivering Less Information. Newsweek (5/25, Wolffe, Bailey) reported, "After more than two weeks inside the West Wing," incoming press secretary Tony Snow "has pulled off the unusual coup of improving relations with the press corps while offering, at times, less information than" his predecessor, Scott McClellan. He has also "managed to win widespread forgiveness for a series of foreign-policy fumbles that would have landed McClellan in deep trouble." Indeed, "there's been a lot of smiling and plenty of jokes and laughter during the first two weeks of Snow's tenure as Bush's new press guy. The atmosphere in the briefing room, which only weeks ago seemed poisonous beyond repair, now seems relaxed and different enough to compensate for the fact that reporters don't seem to be getting any more straightforward answers than before." It's "not unreasonable to think that Snow can and should only stick to the facts that he knows. But it's interesting to see how Snow has offered noncomments on issues where he should be fully up to speed. In some cases, Snow has been even less forthcoming than McClellan about what Bush and his advisers are doing."

Snow To Leave Treasury In June. NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 7, 0:20, Brown) reported, "CNBC chief Washington correspondent John Harwood reports tonight that Treasury Secretary John Snow will likely leave his job by the middle of next month. Harwood says the Bush Administration has honed in on a successor to Snow that we don't know who that is yet. And Snow will depart either before or after a G8 finance minister's meeting which begins June 9th."

The Washington Post (5/26, A5, Baker, Blustein) says Snow has already "informed the White House that he will resign in the coming days." Snow "asked the White House to announce his resignation in early June and said he plans to stay in the job no later than July 3 while a replacement is sought, the source said." The Post adds, "Republican insiders said possible candidates to succeed Snow include former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans, a longtime Bush friend; Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, a former Kellogg Co. chief executive; Ambassador David C. Mulford, a former treasury undersecretary who represents the United States in India; and Stephen Friedman, the president's former chief economic adviser and a former Goldman Sachs chief executive. Two Republicans said Evans and his wife will accompany the Bushes to Camp David today, although they cautioned against reading too much into that because the two couples often spend holidays together. One of the Republicans said Evans would be willing to take the job if Bush indicates he needs him."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Harwood, Solomon) reports, "Others believed to be potential choices include Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick, though he has discussed leaving the administration in recent days; Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt, who was tarnished by involvement in overseeing the review of potential US ports management by a firm based in the United Arab Emirates; and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, a former deputy Treasury secretary." The Journal adds, "One reason Mr. Snow is believed to have stayed as long as he has is that the White House has had trouble identifying desired replacements. Some prominent Wall Street executives, such as Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson, have rebuffed overtures."

The New York Times (5/26, Andrews) reports Tony Fratto, the Treasury Department's chief spokesman, "refused to comment, saying, 'We don't comment or speculate on personnel issues.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029520

Rumsfeld Says Cheney Doesn't Try To "Polish" His Image. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) about his relationship with Vice President Dick Cheney. Rumsfeld said, "I used to think of him as a promising young man when I hired him. … I'd just resigned from Congress and went into the cabinet, and I was running the Office of Economic Opportunities. And the thing I found about him when I my made him my deputy, when I was chief of staff of the White House for President Ford, the tougher things got, the better he got. He -- he can take it. And the harder the work got or the more difficult the situation or the more tense something might get, he got stronger and better and more steely with respect to it. He's a very talented fellow." Asked why polls indicate that people have such a negative opinion of him, Rumsfeld said, "He doesn't spend any time trying to make people like him. He really -- he's not running for anything. He's not going to run for president. He is here to advise the President of the United States. He does it. He does it well. The President likes it. The Vice President likes it. And he just doesn't get up every morning and say, 'What can I do to polish my image?' He gets up every morning and says, 'What can we do to make sure there's not another terrorist attack on this country? What can we do today, in the event that that might happen -- how can we prevent it or how can we mitigate it, in the event that it does happen?' And that's his focus, and that's his orientation. And it's to the benefit of the country."

Nicholson Testifies Before Hostile Congress On VA Data Theft. Veterans Administration Secretary Jim Nicholson testified before Congress yesterday about the theft of the financial records of 26.5 million veterans. Nicholson's remarks that he was "outraged" and "mad as hell" were cited in most coverage. The story was covered by CBS and NBC last night and in the major US newspapers Friday morning.

The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 3, 2:25, Orr) reported, "Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson made not one but two trips to the congressional woodshed. First, he apologized before a House committee." Jim Nicholson, Secretary of Veterans Affairs: "I am the person ultimately responsible to our Veterans." Nicholson "repeated the mea culpa in front of senators." Secretary Nicholson: "I can tell you as a 34-year Veteran myself, I am mad as hell. I'm outraged." Orr: But Nicholson's "apology fell flat." Rep. Bob Filner, California: "You said, 'I take responsibility.' Well, the most dramatic thing you could do to take responsibility is resign." Orr: "Nicholson could not explain why it took two weeks for his own deputy secretary to tell him of the security breach, and he's still struggling, he said, to warn all of the veterans." Its "own inspector general has repeatedly warned the VA its computer system is vulnerable and congressional investigators have given the department an F for computer security in four of the last five years."

NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 10, 1:55, Brown) reported, "There is a $50,000 reward being offered tonight by the Department of Veterans Affairs and the FBI for information that leads to the recovery of stolen computer equipment that contained personal data on more than 26 million veterans. And members of Congress today demanded answers from the man in charge of the VA, who admitted the massive security breach was even worse than previously thought." NBC (Costello) added, "The VA conceded information on the spouses of some deceased Veterans had been included on the laptop files of 26.5 million Vets now in the hands of thieves." Government investigators "said the analyst who improperly took the laptop home had been doing so for three years. For the first time, Secretary Nicholson said that some medical diagnostic information on 2.5 million vets was also on the computer and that Deputy Secretary Gordon Mansfield knew immediately the laptop was stolen on May 3rd yet failed to notify anyone."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported, "Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson took considerable heat today from Congress over the theft of the personal information of some 26 million military veterans. During hearings in the Senate and the House, at least one lawmaker urged Nicholson to resign. But Nicholson says he too is outraged about the burglary and the fact that he wasn't told about it until nearly three weeks later. Nicholson says the federal government now is offering a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the computer and the hard drive that contained the stolen data."

The New York Times (5/26, Stout) reports, "Nicholson said he believed computer security had lagged at the agency, which he has headed for just over a year, because of past 'embedded cultural resistance' to change." In contrast to most coverage which highlighted lawmakers' anger with Nicholson, the Times says the senators "greeted him warmly and seemed angry not at him but at the bureaucracy of the 235,000-employee veterans agency, which has been criticized by its own inspector general's office several years in a row for inadequate data security." The Times notes, "It seemed possible from exchanges between Mr. Nicholson and members of the committees that the full dimension of the current data breach…might not yet be known."

DOJ_NMG_0029521

The AP (5/26, Yen) reports lawmakers "were skeptical" about Nicholson's testimony. Sen. Susan Collins said, "The testimony you gave us is absolutely baffling. … You seem to be saying it was just one employee. But it's not just one employee. You have a high-risk vulnerable system that has been identified time and again as vulnerable." Rep. Bob Filner called for Nicholson to resign, but "White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday that wasn't going to happen." Before Nicholson's testimony Snow said, "I'm sure they will have sharp questions for him. But he's not tendering his resignation."

The Washington Post (5/26, A19, Lee) reports that VA IG George Opfer "said his office did not learn of the lost data until May 10, and then only through an offhand remark by a VA employee at a routine meeting. Nicholson was even further out of the loop; he testified yesterday that his subordinates failed to inform him until May 16 -- nearly two weeks after the theft put millions of veterans at risk of identity theft." Meanwhile, Senate Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Larry Craig "said he believes that the VA data analyst was 'a dedicated federal employee who took work home with the hope of improving VA operations." Craig said the VA, "and not veterans themselves, should cover the cost of the increased credit monitoring made necessary by the loss of the personal data. 'There were many lapses in judgment for which many people are going to have to answer,' Craig said. 'This was not an error that a veteran made. This was an error that the system that provides services to them made.'"

USA Today (5/26, Bazar) reports, "It will cost at least $10 million to inform veterans that their personal information may be in the hands of criminals, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson told Congress on Thursday. He warned that the ultimate price tag of the government's response could be tens of millions more." The VA is also "considering providing veterans with a credit monitoring or counseling service at a free or reduced charge. Taxpayers could be hit for much more. When asked for an estimate, Nicholson tossed out the figure of $100 million -- or more."

CQ (5/26, Plummer) notes "the lack of assurances and the time it took for Congress and the public to be notified have left voters -- and lawmakers -- raw." House Veterans' Affairs Chairman Steve Buyer, "read a laundry list of investigations since 2000 by the Government Accountability Office, the news media and others that spotlighted shoddy VA policies on protecting information." Buyer said, "Mr. Secretary, this is a defining moment of your leadership."

Veterans Express Outrage Over VA Response To Data Theft. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Neuman) reports that in addition to congressional anger, "more than 100,000 aggrieved veterans sought answers from 14 call centers set up by the Department of Veterans Affairs. They also took their complaints to the airwaves and the Internet, where one Vietnam vet set up an online petition urging Nicholson to quit." In an e-mail statement VFW national commander James Mueller wrote, "Telling 26.5 million veterans to deal with this as individuals is a totally unacceptable response. … We strongly suggest that the federal government start figuring out a way to deal with this problem computer-to-computer between the VA, national credit bureaus and other national institutions."

Expert Warns Spike In SSN Sales May Show Veteran Information Compromised. Although Secretary Nicholson tried to allay concerns that any veteran's information had been compromised, the CBS Evening News (5/25, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "The Veterans Administration has said from the beginning that it has seen no signs so far that the data has been used to defraud Veterans, but our Trish Regan has been conducting her own investigation and she has turned up some very troubling evidence." CBS (Regan) added, "In secret chat rooms like these, cyber thieves buy and sell stolen Social Security numbers, names, and addresses for as little as $5, $10, or $15 apiece." Mike Brown "is the president of CardCops, a company that uses web crawling technology to prevent clients from identity theft. The Veterans' data was stolen three weeks ago. CBS News asked Brown to determine whether there had been an increase in the amount of Social Security numbers for sale on the Internet so far this month. The results, he says, are alarming." Mike Brown, President, CardCops: "There's a very real possibility that this data, which was compromised, has indeed ended up in the wrong hands." Regan: "Since May 1st, the amount Social Security numbers for sale on the web has jumped 158% over average. It's the largest increase the company has ever seen."

Kerry, Harkin Sponsor Bill To Provide Veterans With Credit Monitoring. The Des Moines Register (5/26) reports Sen. John Kerry and Tom Harkin "are pushing to give free credit monitoring to those affected by the loss of highly personal data on 26.5 million U.S. veterans that was stolen in a home burglary." They "are sponsoring legislation that would provide one year of free credit monitoring as well as one free credit report annually for two years after the end of monitoring." Harkin "said the estimated cost of the credit protection is $1.25 billion though 'we don't think it will cost that much.' He said the bill could be approved by the Senate yet this week." Harkin "said he was not ready to call for Nicholson's resignation. 'I don't want to hang someone before the trial,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0029522

Edwards Calls For Congressional Probe Of VA Data Theft. The AP (5/26) reports, "Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said Thursday that a full congressional investigation into the theft of millions of veterans records is necessary and that Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson should be held responsible. Nicholson's role in the lost records should be investigated because his future "depends on the degree of his involvement," Edwards said." He "said a full congressional investigation is needed because it's unclear what actually happened."

Lawmakers Seek To Provide More Benefits To Veterans. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Knickerbocker) reports that "for the first time in a generation, Memorial Days are coming during prolonged armed conflict. That has strengthened ties between civilians and soldiers, bringing a marked change in the way people will observe the holiday this year." Lawmakers "are pushing for better veterans' services, including healthcare for the living and survivors' benefits for those who've lost loved ones. Many states are now providing free tuition at public colleges and universities for the children of those killed in war zones." And "unlike in the Vietnam era, declining support for the war has not eroded backing for the troops, say many of those taking part in Memorial Day ceremonies." The Monitor notes, "More family men and women in the war zone also means more dependents to care for in the wake of combat casualties. The 2,404 men and 55 women killed in Iraq have left an estimated 1,700 children without their parent." And recently lawmakers "heard testimony on the estimated 200,000 homeless veterans. 'In the battlefield of life, they are wounded, and we cannot leave them behind,' said Rep. Bob Filner."

Families Of Iraq Casualties Cope With Grief On Memorial Day. USA Today (5/26, A1, Hampson) in a front page story describes how the families of Air Force captains Derek Argel and Jeremy Fresques, members of the Air Force's Special Tactics unit, are coping after they were killed when their plane crashed in Iraq reporting that "three years of war have revived the holiday's original meaning. Today, for the families of two young Air Force officers, the gateway to summer will become a portal to grief." And while most Americans celebrate Memorial Day with recreational activities, "for the friends and relatives of Jeremy and Derek, Memorial Day will be no picnic."

Army Chaplain Urges Public To Remember Sacrifices Of Veterans. U.S. Army chaplain Capt. James Key in an op-ed in USA Today (5/26) writes "This year, as we celebrate Memorial Day, we should pause as a nation from talk about high gas prices, what language our national anthem should be sung in and the latest celebrity gossip, and instead think about the men and women who continue to fight and die in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan. It is true: War is hell, freedom is expensive, death is painful and faith still matters -- especially to those in the foxhole."

WSJournal Criticizes Media Portrayal Of Veterans. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, W11) in an op-ed in its "Taste" section writes "It's a sign of some progress that the men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan are not spit upon and shunned as Vietnam vets were. Yet there may be something more pernicious about mouthing 'Support Our Troops' while also asserting that many of them are poor, uneducated dupes who were cannon fodder overseas and have come home as basket cases, plagued by a range of mental, emotional and financial problems. The vast majority of vets don't fit that description." One way to help Veterans is to "give vets and their families the tools to adjust."

GAO Review Criticizes Agency Hiring Practices Under Bush. The Washington Post (5/26, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "An investigation of hiring practices by federal agencies during the first four years of the Bush administration has turned up 18 cases where political appointees apparently schemed to obtain career jobs in the civil service and stay on the public payroll for the long haul. The practice is popularly known as 'burrowing in' and happens in almost every administration." The Post adds, "In addition to political appointees landing jobs over more qualified applicants, investigators said some agencies created jobs for appointees and some agencies allowed appointees to jump ahead of military veterans by ignoring laws that give a hiring preference to veterans. The investigation was conducted by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, between May 2001 and April 2005 at the request of two House Democrats, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Danny K. Davis (Ill.)."

DOJ_NMG_0029523

Congress Has Until June 5 To Decide On Air Traffic Controller Pay. The Washington Times (5/26, McCaslin) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Congress has until June 5 to decide whether to raise compensation for air traffic controllers to $187,000 per year from the current $166,000. The controllers have been demanding $200,000-plus, which has "led to an impasse in negotiations that began eight months ago and shifted the matter to Congress to decide, as law requires."

Official Says Smithsonian Locked Into Deal With Showtime. Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence Small yesterday told a House panel that the Smithsonian Institution is locked into a semi-exclusive TV contract with Showtime Networks Inc. for 30 years. The Washington Post (5/26, C1, Trescott) reports, "Filmmakers, historians and members of Congress have criticized the contract, which has never been made public." The Post adds, "Summoned by the House Administration Committee, chaired by Rep. Vernon J. Ehlers (R-Mich.), Smithsonian officials explained how the deal originated and what the new partnership means to scholars and historians seeking access to the Smithsonian's voluminous collections and its experts."

OTHER NEWS:

GDP Up 5.3% In First Quarter. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 9, :20, Vargas) reported, "Economists were encouraged today by the latest report on the US economy. New figures showed gross domestic product, the broadest measure of the economy, grew at a strong rate of 5.3% from January to March. The analysts say that indicates growth without serious inflation."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Whitehouse) reports the US "was one of the world's fastest-growing advanced economies in the first quarter of 2006. Downbeat data on home sales, however, support economists' expectations that the distinction won't last." The Commerce Department revised its estimate of GDP up to 5.2% "from an initial estimate of 4.8%. The upward revision was smaller than expected, but still made the U.S. the second-fastest-growing economy among advanced members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development that have reported first-quarter data. Greece is in first place, with an annualized growth rate of 8.2%, according to the OECD." But "new data on home sales, however, supported economists' predictions that the economy is likely cooling. The National Association of Realtors reported yesterday that sales of existing, or previously owned, homes fell 2% in April to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.76 million units."

USA Today (5/26, Kirchhoff) reports Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight, said, "The strong first-quarter data may well be the last hurrah of this phase of the current expansion." Behravesh "expects growth to slow to a 3% to 3.5% pace in the second quarter, and 3% in the second half of the year. Behravesh says the report contained some cautionary signs for the Federal Reserve as it debates whether to continue raising its target for short-term interest rates, now at 5%. A measure of core inflation, a gauge of prices that excludes food and energy, rose at a 2% rate. That's at the top of the Fed's comfort level."

Increase In Adjustable Mortgage Rates Linked To Rise In Defaults. NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 8, 2:20, Brown) reported, "NBC News 'In Depth' tonight, housing on the bubble: A new report on existing home sales showed the markets slowed last month. But another number is making news, mortgage rates. The average rate of a 30-year fixed rate mortgage climbed to 6.62% this week, hitting the highest level in nearly 4 years. The overall increase in mortgage rates is hitting some people, especially those with adjustable rate mortgages, very hard." NBC (Mott) added, "An industry organization says mortgage defaults between January and March of this year were up 72% nationwide over the same period last year. Indianapolis leads the nation with 1 out of every 69 homes in foreclosure, followed closely by Atlanta; Dallas…Memphis and Denver complete the top five. And many experts say it's those popular variable rate loans that are actually helping drive the surge in foreclosures around the country, allowing buyers to purchase more expensive houses than they could otherwise afford."

Stock Markets Rally For Second Day. NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 11, 0:10, Williams) reported, "On Wall Street today, a rally: The Dow gained almost 94 points [to close at 11,211.05]. The Nasdaq was up 29 points on the day [to close at 2,198.24]."

DOJ_NMG_0029524

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, McDonald) reports, "Emboldened by just-right readings on the economy, investors gave the Dow Jones Industrial Average a two-day winning streak for its 110th birthday." The "jittery traders cheered a Commerce Department report showing ample economic growth in the first quarter, but not enough to stoke the inflation and interest-rate-increase fears that rattled the markets for two weeks." Still, yesterday's gains "may be a brief respite, with investors scrutinizing each economic data point." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "rose 14.31, or 1.14%, to 1272.88, while the tech-laden Nasdaq Composite Index gained 29.07 or 1.34% to 2198.24. Small stocks posted the biggest gains with the Russell 2000 adding 14.31 points, or 2.01%, to 725.58."

Minority Share Of Second Home Ownership On Increase. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) says in an editorial, "The political left insists that the current economy, however strong, is leaving minorities behind, and that the gains of some have come at the expense of others. But a new study on homeownership by the National Association of Realtors suggests that the benefits of recent economic growth have been more widespread than critics want to admit. We already knew that U.S. homeownership overall is at an all-time high of nearly 70%. The minority homeownership rate of 52% is also unprecedented. Now comes news that minorities are also increasing their share of second-home purchases. According to the Realtor report, minorities accounted 'for 11% of vacation home purchases between 2003 and 2005 in contrast with 6% of purchases in 2002 or earlier. In the investment property segment, minorities accounted for 17% of transactions between 2003 and 2005 compared with 11 percent in 2002 or earlier.'"

Spokane Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Settle Abuse Claims. The New York Times (5/26, Banerjee) reports, "The Roman Catholic Diocese of Spokane, Wash., is selling its headquarters and other property valued at about $11 million as part of its effort to settle claims by victims of sexual abuse by members of the clergy." The Times continues, "The diocese is one of three in the country that have filed for bankruptcy; the others are those in Portland, Ore., and Tucson. … Although the Spokane diocese announced its intention to sell diocesan assets when it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2004, the fact that those assets are now going on the market underscores the financial strain many dioceses face as they address hundreds of millions of dollars in claims by victims of sexual abuse. … 'I think it is symbolically significant,' said the Rev. John J. Coughlin, a Franciscan priest and a law professor at the University of Notre Dame, specializing in civil and canon law. 'The diocese doesn't need the physical building to exist. But the sale shows that the effects of the sex abuse crisis are serious, for this and other dioceses as well.'" The Times notes, "In a report issued in March, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said that in 2005, dioceses in the United States paid $399 million in settlements with victims of sexual abuse and $68 million in legal fees and support programs for victims, a sharp increase from the year before. … The church's total payments resulting from the sexual abuse scandal have surpassed $1 billion, and many dioceses have yet to reach settlements with victims."

Poll Shows Harris Trails Nelson By 32 Points. The AP (5/26, Farrington) reports that FL13 Rep. Katherine Harris (R) "had weak support in a poll released Thursday that includes the three little-known entries in the Republican U.S. Senate primary. Only 37 percent of respondents said they favored Harris, compared to 13 percent for Will McBride, 4 percent for LeRoy Collins Jr. and 2 percent for Peter Monroe. … More respondents -- 43 percent -- didn't choose a candidate." In a head-to-head match-up Florida Sen. Bill Nelson (D), Harris trailed the incumbent 58%-25%. The AP notes, "The poll was conducted by Quinnipiac University May 12-22. It surveyed 1,086 registered voters and had an overall margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The poll surveyed 424 Republican voters about the primary, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4.8 percentage points. 'Given how well known Congresswoman Harris is among Republicans and how well thought of she has been by them, it is somewhat surprising that she would only get 37 percent support,' said Peter Brown, assistant director of the school's polling institute. 'The fact that 63 percent of Republicans say they prefer either the other three or are undecided is remarkable.'"

Poll Finds Schwarzenegger Approval At 36%. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is ditching the "conservative 2005 script and tacks toward center. In campaign, led by former Bush strategists, he criticizes unpopular president on climate change, Medicare and immigration. A new poll by Public Policy Institute of California pegs ex-movie star's approval at 36%, up from 32% six months ago."

DOJ_NMG_0029525

Krugman Says Documentary Shows Gore "Sort Of Person" Who Should Run Country. In his New York Times column (5/26), Paul Krugman says, "I won't join the sudden surge of speculation about whether 'An Inconvenient Truth' will make Mr. Gore a presidential contender. But the film does make a powerful case that Mr. Gore is the sort of person who ought to be running the country." But "can the sort of person who would act on global warming get elected? Are we — by which I mean both the public and the press — ready for political leaders who don't pander, who are willing to talk about complicated issues and call for responsible policies? That's a test of national character. I wonder whether we'll pass."

US Envoy To IAEA Says Iran Unlikely To Give Up Nuclear Program. Ambassador Greg Schulte, U.S. representative to the Vienna, Austria-based International Atomic Energy Agency, said Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is unlikely to give up programs that could lead to the development of a nuclear weapon. The Washington Times (5/26, Sands) reports that Schulte said, "We shouldn't fool ourselves. The president of Iran is not someone who is swayed by normal diplomatic demarches." But Schulte "said that there also were divisions within Iran's ruling Islamic regime over Tehran's nuclear confrontation, and that the United States and its allies must give Iran a clear path to back down."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Peterson) reports that "the UN's permanent five powers and Germany this week worked to hammer out a package of incentives and threats they hope will ensure the Islamic Republic's nuclear program is limited to peaceful purposes. On the table: giving Iran nuclear reactors and providing fuel for energy production, as well as economic and security incentives. In exchange, Iran would have to give up uranium enrichment - a step that can lead to weapons production - or face UN sanctions or even an arms embargo. … Senior diplomats from those nations and the US reported "progress" during talks in London on Wednesday, but no agreement."

Attack On Iran Could Trigger Hizbullah Clash With Israel. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Blanford) reports that an "alarming scenario gaining attention is if Iran's nuclear facilities come under attack by the US or Israel, it could inadvertently trigger a violent confrontation between Lebanon's Hizbullah and the Israeli military. Hizbullah this week aired fresh warnings on the extent of its massive rocket arsenal, reinforcing concerns in Israel that it will be targeted as part of Tehran's retaliation to a strike against its nuclear sites."

Krauthammer Warns Against US-Iran Talks. Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (5/26, A21), "All of a sudden, revolutionary Iran has offered direct talks with the United States. All of a sudden, the usual suspects -- European commentators, American liberals, dissident CIA analysts, Madeleine Albright -- are urging the administration to take the bait. … Mark my words. The momentum for U.S.-Iran negotiations has only begun. The focus of the entire Iranian crisis will begin to shift from the question of whether Tehran will stop its nuclear program to whether Washington will sit down alone at the table with Tehran. To this cynical bait-and-switch, there can be no American response other than No. Absolutely not."

Ignatius Calls For Openness With Iran. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (5/26, A21), "We are in the early stages of what the Centcom commander, Gen. John Abizaid, calls 'the first war of globalization, between openness and closed societies.' One key to winning that war, Abizaid told a small group of reporters at the Pentagon yesterday, is to expand openness and connection." In Iran, "America's best strategy is to play to its strengths -- which are the open exchange of ideas, backed up by unmatched military power. The need for connection is especially clear in the case of Iran, which in isolation has remained frozen in revolutionary zealotry like an exotic fruit in aspic. Yet some in the Bush administration cling to the idea that isolation is a good thing and that connectivity will somehow weaken the West's position. … Openness isn't a concession by America, it's a strategic weapon."

Abbas Threatens Hamas With Referendum On Recognizing Israel. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas issued what Knight Ridder (5/26, Nissenbaum) calls "a surprise ultimatum to his Hamas rivals on Thursday: Break the political stalemate imperiling the Palestinian government within 10 days or he'll ask voters to approve a measure that would implicitly recognize Israel. Hamas officials appeared caught off-guard by Abbas' threat to hold a referendum in July. Some leaders voiced optimism that they would be able to work out their differences, while others criticized Abbas for trying to bully them."

DOJ_NMG_0029526

The Washington Post (5/26, A14, Wilson) reports that Abbas gave Hamas leaders "10 days to accept a two-state solution to the conflict with Israel, something the group has rejected since its founding nearly two decades ago."

The AP (5/26, Daraghmeh) calls Abbas' announcement "a bold initiative," and says the "political gamble that could either help resolve the Palestinians' internal deadlock or lead the Hamas-led government and Fatah into a deeper crisis." USA Today carries the AP story this morning.

The New York Times (5/26, Myre) says Abbas "seems to be gambling that he can force his Fatah party, Hamas and some smaller factions to agree on a broad framework for dealing with Israel, which Hamas now refuses to recognize. But he runs the risk of provoking a political showdown at a moment when the Palestinians are already plagued by infighting and a worsening financial crisis."

The Washington Times (5/26, Mitnick) says that by issuing the "surprise declaration," Abbas has "gambled his little remaining political capital." The Times also notes that Hamas politicians "went on the defensive after Mr. Abbas' challenge. Some predicted a Fatah-Hamas agreement that would make a referendum unnecessary; others said the Islamic militants don't oppose the idea of a national referendum as long as the two sides reach agreement on the ground rules."

WPost Says Bush Has Given De Facto Consent For "Unilateral Realignment" Of Israel's Borders. An editorial in the Washington Post (5/26, A20) says, "Though they paid lip service to continued Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, President Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in effect inaugurated an entirely different process at their White House meeting Tuesday -- one in which Israel will parley with the United States about the new borders it intends to draw for itself. … Mr. Olmert has now won Mr. Bush's de facto consent to pursue a unilateral 'realignment,' in which Israel would draw a border of its own choosing in the West Bank, dismantle some of the settlements that lie beyond it and thereby 'guarantee Israel's security as a Jewish state with the borders it desires,' as the prime minister put it." The Post adds, "Mr. Bush said Tuesday that an Israeli-Palestinian peace 'will only be achieved on the basis of mutually agreed changes, and no party should prejudice the outcome of negotiations.' As his administration plunges into what will probably be months of detailed discussions with Israel about the realignment plan, it will be imperative to defend those principles."

Bush, Canadian PM To Meet In July. Bloomberg (5/26, Argitis) reports that Canada's Ambassador to the US, Michael Wilson, announced yesterday that Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Hayes "will meet with U.S. President George W. Bush on July 6 in a bid to cement improving relations between the two countries. … This would be Harper's first meeting with Bush since March, when he met with the U.S. president and Mexican President Vicente Fox at a trilateral meeting in Cancun."

Harper Refuses To Speak To Canadian National Press. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Farley) reports that Harper "has declared he won't talk to the national media because they are biased against him, his latest move in a spat with the Parliament's press corps. After reporters walked out of a news conference this week when he refused to answer any questions, Harper said no Liberal prime minister had faced such effrontery, and he had decided to deal only with more friendly local press."

Putin Takes Issue With Cheney Comments. The AP (5/26, Isachenkov) reports that President Vladimir Putin yesterday "objected vigorously to Vice President Dick Cheney's recent criticism of democratic backtracking by the Kremlin. 'We see how the United States defends its interests, we see what methods and means they use for this,' Putin said at a news conference following a summit meeting of Russia and the European Union in his most direct criticism of Cheney's remarks." The AP adds, "The growing rift with Washington threatens to mar the summit of the Group of Eight leading industrialized nations in St. Petersburg in July."

Putin's United Russia Party Growing Quickly. The Washington Times (5/26, Mainville) reports that Putin's United Russia Party "is growing twice as quickly as the Communist Party under the Bolsheviks. And like the Communist Party of the past century, it has become the surest path to success in Russian society. … More than two-thirds of the country's federal and regional parliamentarians, and 70 of 89 regional governors are members of United Russia. Thousands of civil servants, celebrities and leading business people have joined in recent years as the party has grown into a dominant force in national and local politics. … Supporters say United Russia's success is proof of democracy in action in Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0029527

Russian Ministry Urges Review Of Foreign Oil Deals. The Financial Times (5/26, Ostrovsky) reports, "Russia's natural resources ministry called on Thursday for a review of the two largest foreign oil projects in the country, even as senior Russian officials sought to assure EU leaders that Russia was a reliable energy partner. … Any review of PSAs would threaten the two largest foreign investments in Russia: the Sakhalin-1 project, on which ExxonMobil and its partners have already spent nearly $5bn; and the Sakhalin-2 project, in which Royal Dutch Shell and its partners are investing $20bn. However, two Russian ministers insisted separately that all Moscow's agreements with foreign energy companies would be honoured, suggesting a rift had opened within the government."

Australian Troops Land In East Timor. Several Australian commandos landed in East Timor yesterday in an effort to quell escalating fighting in an ethnic dispute. The New York Times (5/26, Perlez) reports, "Nine people were killed and 27 others were wounded, including two United Nations police advisers, during an attack on the national police headquarters, the United Nations said." The Times adds, "East Timor's foreign minister, José Ramos-Horta, appealed for the outside help to disarm 'renegade troops and police rebelling against the state.'"

The Washington Post (5/26, A14, Sipress, Lynch) reports, "The violence jeopardized attempts by the government to assert control and represented a major setback for the United Nations, which had cited East Timor's independence in 2002 as one of the organization's greatest achievements of the past decade."

Sudan Agrees To Permit UN To Assess Darfur For Peacekeeping Force. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 7, :20, Vargas) reported, "A new step, today, toward ending the crisis in the Darfur region of Sudan, where fighting has left 200,000 people dead, and 2 million homeless. Sudan has agreed to let a United Nations team visit Darfur to assess what is needed to support a deployment of UN peacekeepers there."

Group Says Sudanese Raiders Killed Over 100 People In Chad. Human Rights Watch yesterday reported that Sudanese raiders have killed more than 100 villagers in Chad and the violence in Darfur may be spreading. The New York Times/AP (5/26) reports, "Survivors told Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group, that the massacre was carried out last month by the janjaweed, an Arab militia that Sudan has been accused of unleashing on African villages where Darfur rebels might find support. … Human Rights Watch, quoting witnesses, said 118 people were killed in four neighboring villages."

Militias Battle In Deadliest Mogadishu Fighting In 14 Years. The Washington Post (5/26, A15, Maliti) reports, "Islamic and secular militias battled in Somalia's capital Thursday, the most widespread and some of the deadliest fighting in Mogadishu in 14 years. Dozens of people were killed and thousands fled their homes on foot." The Post adds, "The fight for control of Mogadishu comes despite a May 14 cease-fire agreement. The alliance says the self-appointed Islamic Court leaders, who have their own militias, have links to al-Qaeda, while the Islamic militia accuses the alliance of working for the CIA. U.S. officials decline to confirm any association with the secular militia."

Chavez Using Venezuelan Oil Wealth To Promote Personal Agenda. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 8, 2:55, Vargas) reported Venezuela "has the largest proven oil reserves in the Western hemisphere. And it's led by one of President Bush's fiercest critics, Hugo Chavez. Chavez has been using Venezuela's oil windfall to pay for his ambitious agenda at home and abroad." ABC (Sciutto) added, "With a billion dollars a month in state oil profits, President Hugo Chavez is converting cash into political clout. The self-appointed champion of anti-Americanism has publicly labeled President Bush as assassin…and donkey. Chavez is giving significant financial support to like-minded Latin American leaders. And he's signing arms deals with Russia. 'In the past we simply exchanged oil wealth for imported cars from the US, fancy fabrics from France,' [Rafael Quiroz, the former director of the state oil company,] said. 'Superficial things with no value.' Venezuela's wealth has missed the vast majority of its population. Here in Caracas, the city's residents live in deep poverty, in slums like this. Today, Chavez is using oil money to win over the poor." Still, "many Venezuelans we spoke with, especially the wealthier ones, criticize Chavez for extending state control over the economy and wasting oil money simply to boost his profile."

Uribe Likely To Be Reelected. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Harman) reports that Colombia's conservative president, Alvaro Uribe "is expected to be reelected here Sunday. Uribe has more than 57 percent support, enough to win elections in the first round, according to the Napoleón Franco Group, a polling firm here. The reason, say observers, is that Colombians feel safer - and better off economically - today."

DOJ_NMG_0029528

NYTimes Says Administration Should Support Colombian Court's Independence. An editorial in the New York Times (5/26) says that Colombian President Álvaro Uribe's administration "has twice written bills that restrict the jurisdiction" of Colombia's Constitutional Court, "which is the most important remaining check on the president's power. Mr. Uribe may try again if he is elected to a second term on Sunday. He enjoys the strong backing of Washington, which considers him a counterweight to Hugo Chávez in Venezuela. … While the Bush administration acknowledges in general that Constitutional Court decisions should be respected, it needs to make a strong statement of support for that court's independence, and for paramilitary demobilization under the court's terms. Mr. Uribe should, too, and should abandon his efforts to meddle with the Constitutional Court."

Bush Said To Have Abandoned Pledge To Spread Democracy. Danielle Pletka and Michael Rubin, who are, respectively, vice president for defense and foreign policy and resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, write in the Los Angeles Times (5/26) that the resumption of full US diplomatic relations with Libya "marks an effective end to the Bush doctrine." Since declaring his support for the expansion of freedom around the world, Bush "has watched Egypt abrogate elections, ignored the collapse of the so-called Cedar Revolution in Lebanon and abandoned imprisoned Chinese dissidents; now Washington is mulling a peace treaty with Stalinist North Korea. The rhetoric of democracy, it turns out, comes more easily than its implementation."

Teacher Says Post-Election Unrest Would Weaken Mexico. Manuel Suarez-Mier, who teaches economics at American University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/26), "On July 2 Mexico will hold the most closely contested presidential election in its history." In recent weeks two of the three main campaigns have jointly pledged to challenge election results in the streets with massive unrest if their candidates don't win. If that happens, Mexico will be thrown into chaos and Mexicans will be the losers." Unrest "could compel the government to annul the poll's results, forcing a new election. This situation would weaken the country's institutions, raise uncertainty and fears of anarchy, with potentially serious financial instability and economic disarray."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Enron's Top Executives Are Convicted Of Fraud."
"Senate Passes Sweeping Bill On Immigration."
"This Gig Is A Real Grind."
"Bush Seals Jefferson's Seized Files."
"Californians See 'Poetic Justice.'"
"Probe Finds Marines Killed Unarmed Iraqi Civilians."

USA Today:

"Financial Firms Attack Child Porn."
"1 War. 2 Deaths. 1 Year Later."
"Feds Cut Off Phone Tax After 108 Years."

New York Times:

"2 Enron Chiefs Are Convicted In Fraud And Conspiracy Trial."
"Military Expected To Report Marines Killed Iraqi Civilians."
"Abbas Says Hamas Must Accept Peace Plan Or Face Referendum."
"To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Files F.BI. Seized In Congress."
"'I Didn't Know' Did Not Sway Houston Jury."
"G.O.P. Draws Line In Border."
"Bush And Blair Concede Errors, But Defend War."

Washington Post:

"Enron Leaders Found Guilty."
"Senate Approves Immigration Bill."
"Bush, Blair Concede Missteps On Iraq."
"Bush Seals Files Seized In FBI Probe Of Jefferson."
"Duncan To Return Abramoff-Tied Funds."
"Head For Beach At Rush Hour? Might Work."

Washington Times:

"Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens."
"Bush, Blair Admit Errors In Iraq War."
"Hastert Slammed For Raid Reaction."
"Gas Costs Don't Slow Memorial Day Travel."
"Abbas Delivers Ultimatum To Hamas."

DOJ_NMG_0029529

"Bonds As "Race Victim' Divides Black Fans."

Detroit Free Press:

"30,000 Take GM, Delphi Buyouts."
"Enron Bosses Nailed In Fraud."
"Alert Escalates On Drug Mix: 'Too Many Dying.'"
"Granholm Ready To Replace Doomed Tax."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Home Depot's Board A No-Show For Shareholders."
"Congress Set For Immigration Duel."
"Guilty."
"Health Care For Illegals Shifts With Medicaid Rules."

Houston Chronicle:

"Bottom Line: Guilty."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Enron Verdicts; Verdicts-Former Enron Employees; Senate-Immigration Bill; Congress-FBI Raid; Hastert-Bribery Probe; Bush-Blair Meeting; UN-Darfur Crisis; Venezuela-Oil Wealth; GDP Report; Asthma Treatment; American Idol-Wrong Number.

CBS: Enron Verdicts; Verdicts-Former Enron Employees; VA Data Theft; VA Data Theft-Analysis; Senate-Immigration Bill; Iraq-Marine Investigations; Congress-FBI Raid; Pope Benedict-Poland; RV Nation.

NBC: Enron Verdicts; Verdicts-Former Enron Employees; Bush-Blair Meeting; Senate-Immigration Bill; Iraq-Marine Investigations; Congress-FBI Raid; Treasury Secretary-Resignation Report; Adjustable Rate Mortgages; Amtrak-Power Outage; VA Data Theft; Stock Markets; Climate-Expanding Deserts; Steve Jobs Interview.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Senate-Immigration Bill; Fox-US Visit; Midwest-Tornadoes; Enron Verdicts.

CBS: Bush, Blair Press Conference; Senate-Immigration Bill; Enron Verdicts.

NPR: Iraq Violence; Bush, Blair Press Conference; New England-Disaster Declarations; Amtrak-Northeast Corridor Shutdown; Foreign Stock Markets; Canada-Kyoto Protocol; KY-Mine Explosion; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Delivers commencement address at US Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRIME MINISTER TONY BLAIR OF THE UNITED KINGDOM. Highlights: 11 a.m. Speaks on the challenges facing the international community. Gaston Hall, 3rd floor, Georgetown University.

MEMORIAL DAY EVENTS _ Memorial Day-related events. Highlights: 9 p.m. Rolling Thunder candlelight vigil. Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

MUSLIM CONVENTION _ The Universal Muslim Association of America holds its 4th annual convention. Location: Sheraton Premiere Hotel at Tysons Corner, 8661 Leesburg Pike, Vienna.

PENTAGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9 a.m. Army Col. Michael F. Beech, commander of 4th Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division, will brief live from Iraq to give an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

TERRORIST HOAX _ 9 a.m. Scheduled sentencing before U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton for Nabil Wasfi Alkharouf of Ashburn, Va., who pleaded guilty to falsely reporting a future terrorist attack as a hoax. Location: U.S. District Court, Alexandria.

TURKMENISTAN _ 9 a.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty holds a briefing on Turkemnistan, with Farid Tuhbatullin of Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights and Vitaly Ponomarev of the Memorial Human Rights Centrer in Moscow. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

PURPLE HEART STAMP _ 10 a.m. US Postal Service reissues Purple Heart stamp. Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson, Postmaster General John Potter will attend. Location: Women in Military Service Memorial, Arlington, Va.

SENSENBRENNER-IMMIGRATION _ 10 a.m. Rep. James Sensenbrenner Jr., R-Wis., House Judiciary Committee chairman, holds a press conference on immigration. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn House Office Building.

IMMIGRATION _ 1 p.m. The National Immigration Forum holds a telephone news conference on immigration from from the perspective of key advocacy organizations for business, labor, ethnic, religious and immigrant constituencies. Contacts: Douglas Rivlin, 202-347-0040 ext 5989. Notes: Dial: 1-800-811-8824, Confirmation Code: 2437631. For international callers: 913-981-4903.

DOJ_NMG_0029530

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MAY 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
FBI Seeks Interviews With Lawmakers About NSA Surveillance Program Leak ... 3
4th Circuit Panel Hears "Virginia Jihad" Appeal ... 4

Homeland Response:
House Bill Would Give DHS $32 Billion In 2007 ... 4
Bush Says US Prepared For Hurricane Season ... 4
Bunning Places Hold On Paulison Confirmation ... 4
Congress Working To Revamp Flood Insurance ... 5

War News:
Bush And Blair Admit Errors In Iraq, But Stand By Decision To Oust Saddam ... 5
Rumsfeld Says Troop Withdrawals Will Be Based On Conditions On Ground ... 7
Probe Expected To Find Marines Committed "Extensive, Unprovoked" Killing Of Civilians ... 7
Karzai Visits Wounded Civilians ... 8
Navy Missile Program Reaches Milestone ... 8

DOJ:
New York Girl Receives DOJ Courage Award ... 8

Corporate Scandals:
Jury Finds Lay, Skilling Guilty In Enron Trial ... 9
Fannie Mae CEO Will Not Head Accounting Probe ... 14
House Committee Holds Hearing On Executive Pay Packages ... 15
Former Wal-Mart Official To Be Sentenced In August For Fraud 15
Top Hedge Fund Managers Average $363 Million In Annual Pay15
Charity Holds "Shareholders" Meetings To Demonstrate Accountability ... 16

Criminal Law:
Bush Orders Documents Seized By FBI Sealed For 45 Days ... 16
Hastert Says FBI Leaked Abramoff Probe Story To Intimidate Him ... 19
Sources Say Novak Told Rove He Would Not Identify Him ... 20
Former Chicago Sanitation Official Testifies About Political Hires20
House Committee Backs Limits On Internet Gambling ... 21
Federal Judge Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend ... 21
Circuits Divided On Lethal Injection ... 21
Gotti Trial Judge Critical Of New Federal Indictment ... 22
Prosecutor Assails Wecht Lawyers' Contentions In Evidence Motion ... 22
FBI Finds Nothing At Barn Site In Search For Hoffa Remains ... 22
FBI Recovers $1.1 Million From Miami Airport Heist ... 22
Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Skills Showing At Maryland Murder Trial ... 22
Attorney Says Fairfax County Gunman Was Denied Psychiatric Care ... 23
Financial Firms Unite To Fight Child Porn ... 23
Canada Fights Surge In Violent Crime ... 24

Civil Rights:
North Carolina Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Cross Burning 24
Black Male Initiatives Said To Promote Racial Stereotypes ... 24

Antitrust:
Former Michigan Schools Official Charged With E-Rate Fraud ... 24
House Judiciary Committee Votes To Ban Internet Content Fees25
Google Seals Software Deal With Dell ... 25
Yahoo, eBay Team Up To Battle Google ... 25

Environment:
GAO Says Bush Greenhouse Gas Programs Not Producing Results ... 26
House Votes To Allow ANWR Drilling ... 26
NYTimes Says Only Disasters Prompted Mine Safety Overhaul Bills ... 26

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Former Prescription Drug Distributor Pleads Guilty To Selling Stolen Drugs ... 27
Reporting Continues On Overdoses Linked To Fentanyl-Laced Drugs ... 27
"Operation Street Sweep" Nets Suspects Facing Drug Charges In Tennessee ... 27
17 People From 3 States Face Charges In Drug Investigation ... 27
Ohio Businessman Accused Of Money Laundering Pleads Guilty28
Researcher Finds "No Association" Between Marijuana And Lung Cancer ... 28
Idaho Man Indicted On Drug-Smuggling Charges ... 28
Judge Refuses To Halt California Gun-Store Closure ... 28
Dallas Gun-Crime Team Wins DOJ Award ... 28

Immigration:

Senate Approves Immigration Reform Bill By 62-36 Margin 29

Tax:

Treasury Ends Phone Tax 31
FBI, IRS Seek Florida Water District Land Transaction Records 32

Congress-Administration:

Frist Hopeful Hayden Will Get Confirmation Vote Before Recess32
Landrieu Agrees To Lift Hold On Kempthorne Nomination 32
Democrats Put Hold On Schwab Nomination..... 32
Senate Clears Way For Vote On Kavanaugh Nomination 32
Tony Snow Seen As Improving Press Relations While Delivering Less Information 33
Snow To Leave Treasury In June..... 33
Rumsfeld Says Cheney Doesn't Try To "Polish" His Image..... 33
Nicholson Testifies Before Hostile Congress On VA Data Theft. 34
Lawmakers Seek To Provide More Benefits To Veterans..... 35
GAO Review Criticizes Agency Hiring Practices Under Bush..... 36
Congress Has Until June 5 To Decide On Air Traffic Controller Pay 36
Official Says Smithsonian Locked Into Deal With Showtime..... 36

Other News:

GDP Up 5.3% In First Quarter 36
Spokane Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Settle Abuse Claims37
Poll Shows Harris Trails Nelson By 32 Points 37
Poll Finds Schwarzenegger Approval At 36% 38
Krugman Says Documentary Shows Gore "Sort Of Person" Who Should Run Country 38
US Envoy To IAEA Says Iran Unlikely To Give Up Nuclear Program 38
Abbas Threatens Hamas With Referendum On Recognizing Israel 38
Bush, Canadian PM To Meet In July 39
Putin Takes Issue With Cheney Comments..... 39
Australian Troops Land In East Timor 40
Sudan Agrees To Permit UN To Assess Darfur For Peacekeeping Force..... 40
Militias Battle In Deadliest Mogadishu Fighting In 14 Years..... 40
Chavez Using Venezuelan Oil Wealth To Promote Personal Agenda..... 40
Uribe Likely To Be Reelected 40
Bush Said To Have Abandoned Pledge To Spread Democracy. 40
Teacher Says Post-Election Unrest Would Weaken Mexico..... 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 42

DOJ_NMG_0029533

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Seeks Interviews With Lawmakers About NSA Surveillance Program Leak. CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported on "new fall-out…in connection with the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program. On top of everything else, CNN now confirms the FBI wants to interview top members of the House and Senate about the disclosure of the program to The New York Times. Two sources with knowledge of the leak investigation say they don't know if any lawmakers have been questioned yet. Only a few House and Senate members were briefed on the NSA program before it became public. Watch this story to explode, as well." CQ (5/26, Stern, Kady) adds, "House members and aides said they have been contacted as part of an FBI probe into the source of a leak about another NSA surveillance program aimed at the content of international telephone calls between people in the United States and people overseas suspected of links to terrorists." Meanwhile, "the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee cautioned against the executive intruding too deeply into legislative branch turf. 'There is no credible claim that anyone in Congress leaked anything,' said Jane Harman, D-Calif. 'I urge the Justice Department to carefully consider separation-of-powers issues and the appearance of intimidation before proceeding any further.'"

Administration May Assert "State Secrets" Privilege In Suits Against Phone Companies. Legal experts expect the Bush Administration to assert the "state secrets" privilege in the lawsuits against phone companies who turned call records over to the NSA. To prove their cases, the plaintiffs in the suits would need to "delve into the depths of the NSA's surveillance program," the Wall Street Journal (5/26, Searcey, 2.11M) reports. The government "considers such information top secret." If judges accept the Administration's claim, "as has been the case in nearly every instance in which it has been asserted since the early 1950s, the suits will dissolve."

Henninger Says Roberts Opinion Summarizes Court's Thinking On Fourth Amendment. Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/26, 2.11M) that the American people "has shown little interest in" the NSA's domestic surveillance program. In "opinion polls about the NSA's surveillance programs, strong majorities essentially say, So what? Something approximating 'So what?' was the Supreme Court's answer this week to the proposition that the police might sometimes enter a home to prevent mayhem without a search warrant. … But it was a Fourth Amendment case. And we have little choice other than to apply the same Constitution to flyspecks and national tragedies, to brawling drunks in a Utah kitchen and al Qaeda agents plotting the next 9/11. Chief Justice John Roberts's opinion in Brigham is in fact a nice summary of the Court's thinking on the exceptions to requiring search warrants, what he called the Fourth Amendment's 'ultimate touchstone' of 'reasonableness.'"

Gonzales Criticized For Threatening Prosecution Of Journalists. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (5/26) editorializes, "The latest evidence of this administration's wary, and often hostile, approach, to the news media is the statement by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that his office is reviewing the possible prosecution of journalists under turn-of-the-20th century espionage laws. He spoke on ABC's 'This Week' about The New York Times' disclosure last year that the National Security Agency was, without warrants, eavesdropping on international phone calls in the pursuit of terrorism suspects. … 'There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility,' Gonzales said regarding the possibility of prosecuting the journalists who won a Pulitzer Prize for the story." The Caller-Times continues, "Whether it is retroactively removing declassified documents from circulation, or seeking to rummage among the papers of deceased muckraking newspaper columnist Jack Anderson, or sending platoons of Justice Department agents bearing subpoenas after reporters, the White House has shown it will play hardball with the press. Bush's penchant for secrecy predates Sept. 11, but the terrorism threat has turned this into obsession. It's a sentiment that would have found favor with President Nixon, who fought the publication of the Pentagon papers in 1971. … Even if Gonzales' statement expresses only the administration's pique over the disclosure, rather than a real intent to prosecute, the effect is nonetheless chilling. And that chill hampers the flow of information, one of those democratic values which the fight against terrorism is supposed to protect."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (5/26) runs an op-ed by Boston Globe columnist Derrick Z. Jackson, who writes, "Journalists. Get the rack ready! Our attorney general is coming for us, snarling like a guard dog at Abu Ghraib." Jackson continues, "It is almost funny to see Gonzales scour the statutes to harass journalists. This is the same administration that cannot spell the word law if you spot it the 'l' and the 'a.' It has already set the presidential record in claiming the authority to circumvent the law in more than 750 cases." Jackson adds, "The actions of Gonzales show how little the Bush administration promotes the rights of the press. With every pronouncement, freedom is disappearing, in incremental steps."

DOJ_NMG_0029534

The Odessa (TX) American (5/26) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales may have simply been launching a trial balloon on one of the Sunday political chat shows when he hinted that certain laws could be interpreted to authorize the prosecution of journalists who receive leaks of classified material. … If so, that trial balloon needs to be punctured. If not, the law needs to be changed. If it's intended as intimidation, Gonzales deserves the scorn all bullies deserve." The American adds, "Unfortunately, government has become so big, so secretive and so inclined to classify material that is embarrassing or scandalous rather than vital to national security that whistle-blowers and leakers are sometimes the only way citizens can learn what government is really doing in their name. … Prosecuting journalists would not be the end of freedom as we know it, but it would be a step on the road to more overbearing government."

The Austin American-Statesman (5/26) editorializes, "When he was nominated to be U.S. attorney general, Alberto Gonzales had a mostly quiet record as a Texas Supreme Court justice, secretary of state and George W. Bush's attorney, both as governor and president. … But now it seems the signs were there all along that he is a lawyer willing to defend executive power to an extreme rarely seen in national politics." The American-Statesman continues, "Since taking over the Justice Department…Gonzales has acted as if he is still the president's general counsel, not the top law officer in the land. … Gonzales began the week by assaulting the First Amendment and threatening to prosecute journalists under an ancient espionage law. The attorney general objects to journalists revealing classified material — even when that information shouldn't be classified and properly informs the public." The American-Statesman concludes, "It's no secret that the president and Gonzales harbor no fondness for a free press. Their loathing is palpable, and they have declared war on journalists. They might prosecute The New York Times for writing about the NSA's no-warrant eavesdropping on U.S. citizens, and they are eager to tap journalists' phones when they think information is being leaked. … It is chilling to consider how far this administration will go to crush dissent and free speech, and how far Gonzales will go to defend it. … What a disappointment he has been."

4th Circuit Panel Hears "Virginia Jihad" Appeal.

The AP (5/26, O'Dell) reports, "Three U.S. Muslims convicted in a conspiracy that began with paintball games to train for a holy war against the United States were improperly denied a jury trial, their lawyers told a federal appeals court Thursday." The AP continues, "A federal prosecutor, however, argued that the three had to live with their 'tactical decision' to entrust their fate to a judge. … 'They got exactly what they wanted,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg told a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals." The AP adds, "Masoud Khan of Gaithersburg, Maryland, Seifullah Chapman of Alexandria and Hammad Abdur-Raheem of Falls Church were part of what prosecutors called a 'Virginia jihad network' that prepared to join the Taliban by playing paintball games in the woods near Fredericksburg in 2000 and 2001. … In all, the government charged 11 men. Six entered plea bargains and two were acquitted. … Khan was convicted of the most serious charges, including conspiracy to levy war against the United States and conspiracy to contribute services to the Taliban. He trained with the militant, anti-American group Lashkar-e-Taiba, which the government later designated a terrorist organization. … Lawyers for Chapman and Abdur-Raheem contend their clients and Khan should have been tried separately. Chapman's attorney, John Zwerling, said his client was essentially forced to choose a bench trial because a jury's post-9/11 passions might be inflamed by the more serious allegations against Khan."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Bill Would Give DHS $32 Billion In 2007.

The House yesterday sought to provide billions of dollars on protecting the nation from terror attacks :without putting too much strain on taxpayers," the AP (5/25, Jordan) reported. The House was working on a spending bill that would give the Homeland Security Department "$32 billion in 2007, $1.8 billion more than this year. The legislation moved toward passage as lawmakers debated dozens of competing proposals to bolster national security." Democrats "accused the Bush administration of not doing enough to protect the nation from terrorists, and lawmakers from both parties noted widespread management problems at Homeland Security."

Bush Says US Prepared For Hurricane Season.

In an article appearing on at least 39 news websites, the AP (5/26, Riechmann) reports speaking at Fort McNair yesterday to mark Adm. Thad Allen's takeover as commandant of the US Coast Guard, "President Bush highlighted US preparedness for the upcoming hurricane season." Bush said that during Hurricane Katrina, "the whole world" watched "Coast Guard rescuers plunging from helicopters, lifting people from rooftops, hoisting them to safety." The AP adds that the overall response to Katrina was "botched" by the federal government, but "Bush said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has taken steps to reform FEMA, improve partnerships with the Red Cross and the Defense Department and expand federal supplies."

Bunning Places Hold On Paulison Confirmation. In an article appearing on no fewer that 87 news websites, the AP (5/25, Jordan) reported the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee approved R. David Paulison's nomination as chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency yesterday "after he pledged to refile three years of tax returns to correct questionable travel deductions." Paulison said in a statement that he was "pleased to have this matter raised and resolved," and Sen. Joe Lieberman said Paulison had "answered the committee's questions…completely" in regard to errors found in Paulison's state and federal returns.

DOJ_NMG_0029535

However, CQ (5/25, Chemnick, Starks) reported that following Paulison's approval, Sen. Jim Bunning "immediately placed a hold on the nomination in an effort to pressure FEMA into developing an appeals process that would help flood victims whose insurance claims are rejected, according to a spokesman for Bunning." Referring to former FEMA director Michael Brown, CQ noted, "In contrast to his predecessor, Paulison has emergency management experience. He was in charge of the US Fire Administration for four years before joining FEMA." A separate AP (5/26, Jordan) article reports, "Angry over FEMA's flood insurance program," Bunning will delay Paulison's confirmation until FEMA "develops a suitable appeals process for property owners whose flood insurance claims are rejected," according to a spokesman for the senator.

Collins, Lieberman Make Case Against Removing FEMA From DHS. Sens. Susan M. Collins and Joseph I. Lieberman, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (5/26), write that their committee report on the response to Hurricane Katrina calls for FEMA to "be strengthened, protected and given a more regional focus to promote faster and better-tailored responses to natural disasters or terror attacks — and be reconstituted as the National Preparedness and Response Authority as a mark of serious change." Collins and Lieberman compare calls to remove FEMA from DHS to taking "an intensive-care patient outdoors," adding that the agency "probably never was capable of responding effectively to a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina — even when it was an independent agency." Its "withdrawal from DHS can only weaken the agency further and transfer its problems elsewhere."

Congress Working To Revamp Flood Insurance. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Schroeder) reports, "As hurricane season approaches, Congress will speed action on a bill to shore up the National Flood Insurance Program by raising policy premiums for the most vulnerable coastal properties. … The Senate Banking Committee unanimously approved a flood-insurance bill yesterday that is similar to a measure passed in March by the House Financial Services Committee." Both "would require policyholders with vacation homes in risky areas to pay fair-market rates for their premiums. The Senate measure also would end subsidies for structures that have received claims from repeated flood damage."

CQ (5/25, Freedman) reported that the Senate measure, sponsored by Sen. Richard C. Shelby, "takes into account the concerns of panel members from flood-prone states, such as Robert Menendez, D-N.J., who said he would resist efforts to eliminate subsidies on primary residences." Meanwhile, "Shelby made it clear that this legislation will not end his examination of the flood program, which is administered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and will be up for reauthorization in 2007."

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Blair Admit Errors In Iraq, But Stand By Decision To Oust Saddam. In a press conference last night, President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair admitted mistakes in the way they handled the Iraq war, but continued to stand by their decision to launch the invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein. The AP (5/26, Hunt, Raum) the two leaders also "vowed to keep troops there until the new Iraqi government takes control. 'Despite setbacks and missteps, I strongly believe we did and are doing the right thing,' Bush said." Blair, meanwhile, "declared that after a meeting earlier this week with Iraq's new prime minister, 'I came away thinking the challenge is still immense, but I also came away thinking more certain than ever that we should rise to it.'" They "refused to discuss withdrawing troops from Iraq."

Media coverage this morning almost universally depicts the too leaders as weakened by the Iraq war. For example, The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Kessler, Fletcher) reports the news conference "came at a moment of acute political weakness for both men." In an analysis piece, the Washington Post (5/26, A4, Kessler) says that "dragged down by popular discontent over their adventure in Iraq," both Bush and Blair "have reached the lowest point of their careers." Blair is "desperate to hang on for at least another year." The Post adds, "As the Economist magazine put it earlier this month, the Bush-Blair partnership has become the 'axis of feeble.'"

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/26, Sanger, Rutenberg) called them "badly weakened by the continuing violence in Iraq," and says they spoke "in subdued, almost chastened, tones." In "an unusual admission of a personal mistake," adds the Times, Bush "said he regretted challenging insurgents in Iraq to 'bring it on' in 2003, and said the same about his statement that he wanted Osama bin Laden 'dead or alive.' … Mr. Blair, whose approval levels have sunk even lower than Mr. Bush's, said he particularly regretted the broad decision to strip most members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party of their positions in government and civic life in 2003, leaving most institutions in Iraq shorn of expertise and leadership." USA Today (5/26, Jackson, Benedetto) notes Bush also "identified the abuse scandal at the US-operated Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad as the biggest mistake of the war."

DOJ_NMG_0029536

With Blair "described as stiff and defensive," a story in the New York Times (5/26, Stanley) argues there has been as "role reversal" in the Bush-Blair Friendship – another sign of the leaders' "diminished standing." The Times says Blair "has always served as the world's Bush-whisperer, but at their joint news conference last night, it was almost the reverse. Mr. Blair, the normally silver-tongued prime minister, seemed stiff and defensive, and it was Mr. Bush who tried to smooth things over and help Mr. Blair out." When "a British reporter actually suggested that this was his last official Washington visit," Blair "looked dismayed and tongue-tied." Bush "jumped in, saying with a laugh, 'Don't count him out, let me tell it to you that way.'" The Times adds, "That role reversal was as good a sign as any of how the two friends' political standing has eroded since they made the case together for war in Iraq." Blair "came to Washington to help the president, but this time, perhaps for the first time, he looked like he needed the president's help."

The Financial Times (5/26, Daniel) says Bush and Blair struck "a sombre note," and adds the leaders' "political obituaries will be dictated by the fate of Iraq." In a similar report, the AFP (5/26) reports that "as the death toll rises, both Blair and Bush have seen their popularity ratings drop. Both need to show their constituencies that there is some movement forward in Iraq, observers say."

The Washington Times (5/26, Curl, Dinan), however, emphasizes that Bush and Blair voiced "optimism that a new unity government will be best able to end insurgent violence and establish stability." The White House, adds the Times, "spent much of yesterday downplaying expectations that the two leaders would make a major announcement about troop withdrawals. But that was the subject of most of the questions, from both the US and British press, and Mr. Bush said he does not plan to keep U.S. troops in Iraq any longer than necessary." The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Richter), under the headline "Bush Says Early Iraq Troop Cuts Unlikely," reporting the Bush-Blair meeting "had given rise to hope that they might signal the beginning of a troop drawdown long sought on both sides of the Atlantic."

Bush and Blair met last night before and after their 7:30 PM EST news conference. ABC and NBC both briefly noted their meeting before the press conference. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 6, :20, Vargas) reported, "The President welcomed his closest ally in the war, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, to the White House. The war's unpopularity has helped drive both men's public approval ratings to stunning lows. Tonight, they are expected to reaffirm their policies but offer no timetable for the withdrawal of soldiers from Iraq." And NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 3, 0:30, Brown) reported, "A White House spokesman says Iraq will be topic A at tonight's news conference, but neither Mr. Bush nor Mr. Blair are about to announce troop withdrawals."

Hume Says Bush Was More Forthcoming Than Blair About Mistakes. Brit Hume said on Fox News (5/26) that Bush "seemed a bit more forthcoming than Prime Minister Blair, it seemed to me anyway, in his answer about the mistakes that were made. The President mentioned several things, things he said himself in the course of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. Prime Minister Blair indicated that some things they thought were going to be a problem proved not to be and some things they did not anticipate would be problems turned out to be and that the commitment of the enemy to the fight is something he felt they should have understood."

Kondracke Sees "New Twist" In Leaders' Argument. Morton Kondracke said on Fox News (5/26) that Blair "is a much more eloquent, traditionally much more eloquent spokesman for the policy than the President is. And I think he was a bit more tonight, although I don't think he rose to the heights that Tony Blair has in the past." Kondracke noted that the leaders made "a kind of a new argument, that we should be resolved here in Iraq because the enemy is resolved. The enemy knows that if democracy succeeds in Iraq, it will -- it can succeed anywhere in the world and that they have lost a decisive battle. That is a new twist on the argument that I hadn't heard before and it's something that Blair brought with him."

Barnes Says It Was A "Buck Up" Press Conference. Fred Barnes said on Fox News (5/26), "I thought this was a buck up press conference, trying to buck up America, buck up England and showing once again when you had these two powerful countries, Britain and the U.S., and this cause in Iraq, that the leaders of the two countries are unflinching. And despite setbacks and missteps as President Bush admitted, they are optimistic about the outcome there, while not promising any specific things that they're going to do."

Crowley Says Press Conference Showed "What History Will Record." Candy Crowley said on CNN (5/26), "What you saw here tonight is precisely what history will record, that these are two men who started this war together, basically, and who stuck with it, and are sticking with it now, saying, 'We cannot leave.' They have -- you know, they have had every opportunity to walk back from this, and they can't. It is -- they are tied to this war, and that's what we saw in question after question."

Galloway Says Blair Assassination Would Be "Morally Justified." The Washington Times (5/26, Harper) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "British leftist George Galloway has taken his opposition to the Iraq war to the point of saying that the assassination of British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be 'morally justified.' In an interview with GQ, the men's fashion magazine asked him: 'Would the assassination of, say, Tony Blair by a suicide bomber — if there were no other casualties — be justified as revenge for the war on Iraq?' Mr. Galloway, a member of Parliament for the Respect Party, responded, 'Yes, it would be morally justified. I am not calling for it — but if it happened, it would be of a wholly different moral order to the events of 7/7,' referring to the deadly al Qaeda attacks on the London mass-transit system last year."

DOJ_NMG_0029537

Rumsfeld Says Troop Withdrawals Will Be Based On Conditions On Ground. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) how close the US is to bringing troops back from Iraq. Rumsfeld said, We had hit a high of 160,000, and we're now down to 130,000. We have gone back up from time to time when there was an event, for example, the elections in December. We beefed up some of the forces. But the Iraqi security forces are now over 263,000, you know. They've passed a quarter of a million security forces. And they're gaining more experience all the time. They're better equipped all the time." When asked if troops will be coming back by mid-2007, Rumsfeld said, "You know, once you start doing that, then you're stuck with a number, a date, and it just doesn't do any good. It's based on conditions on the ground."

Rumsfeld Denies He Sent Fewer Troops To Iraq Than Were Requested. Rumsfeld was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) if more troops should have been sent into Iraq initially. Rumsfeld said, "You know, it's an interesting question, and I suppose history will decide that. The fact of the matter is that we sent the number of troops that every single general in the chain of command wanted. Now, could you have overridden them and sent more? You know, people run around saying, well, you sent less than the generals wanted. That's just utter nonsense. It's not true."

Rumsfeld Surprised By Absence Of WMD In Iraq. Rumsfeld was also asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) if the strength of the insurgency is the thing that has surprised him most about Iraq. Rumsfeld said, "No, I would think the absence of -- not finding weapons of mass destruction would be the biggest surprise. I mean the intelligence everyone saw it. Everyone believed it. And, goodness knows, the President did, the United Nations, the Congress, people all saw it there, the other countries in the world."

Rumsfeld Says He Did Not Offer To Resign. Asked about calls from six retired generals for his resignation, Rumsfeld said on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26), "It's reassuring to know that there are 7,500 generals and admirals on active duty and retired and six -- does it surprise you? They tried to fire George Washington. General McClelland called Abraham Lincoln a gorilla and an ape. There is nothing new about this." Asked if he offered to resign, Rumsfeld said, "No. Before I even could think about it, the President came out and said 'You're not going to resign.'"

Friedman Urges US To "Move Into The Background." In the New York Times (5/26), Thomas Friedman urges continued American involvement in Iraq. He writes, "The reason that the violence in Iraq is so intense — mass executions, mosques blown up — is in part because of all these pent-up grievances [of 50 years]. But in part it is also because two very entrenched forces in that part of the world — the theocrats and the autocrats; that is, the Qaedas and the Arab regimes surrounding Iraq, even the 'pro-America' ones — are deeply worried that we might succeed." He draws on the advice of Egyptian activist Saad Eddin Ibrahim; Friedman concludes that "the best thing the Americans could do now to help this process is to move into the background in Iraq … Let the Iraqis invite our help, but let's get out of their faces wherever possible. Also, Mr. Ibrahim said, 'We need America to get back on the moral high ground that it has slid down from since 9/11.'"

Probe Expected To Find Marines Committed "Extensive, Unprovoked" Killing Of Civilians. The New York Times (5/26, Shanker, Schmitt, and Oppel) reports, "A military investigation into the deaths of two dozen Iraqis last November is expected to find that a small number of marines in western Iraq carried out extensive, unprovoked killings of civilians, Congressional, military and Pentagon officials said Thursday." The New York Times mentions the possibility that the Marines could face "capital" charges and that this incident could be the "the gravest case involving misconduct by American ground forces in Iraq." It quotes Minnesota Rep. John Kline, a retired Marine, who said, "This would be an atrocity."

A more assertively phrased article by the Los Angeles Times (5/25, Perry) reports, "Marines from Camp Pendleton wantonly killed unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, and then tried to cover up the slayings in the insurgent stronghold of Haditha, Iraq, military investigations have found. Officials who have seen the findings of the investigations said criminal charges, including murder, were expected, which would make the Nov. 19 incident the most serious case of alleged U.S. war crimes in Iraq." An inquiry overseen by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell attributes "as many as 24" Iraqi deaths to the alleged perpetrators, who were conducting a sweep after the bombing death of a fellow Marine.

NBC and CBS last night both reported the story. The NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 5, 2:05, Brown) reported the military is "investigating two separate incidents in which Marines are accused of killing innocent, unarmed Iraqi civilians." Commandant Hagee "today issued a strong message to the entire Corps to have the 'moral courage to do the 'right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines.' Hagee reportedly told members of Congress that Marines killed as many as 24 innocent Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha last November, not the 15 first reported." A second incident "occurred only last month in the town of Hamandiyah. A senior military official tells NBC News seven Marines were accused of dragging an innocent Iraqi from his home at night, shooting him, then planting an AK-47 and a shovel next to his body to make it appear he had been bearing an IED, a roadside bomb."

DOJ_NMG_0029538

The Washington Times (5/26, Scarborough) reports, "The Corps is bracing for the worst, congressional sources say, and [is] regularly briefing members of Congress. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) will likely complete its investigation this summer." It includes a passage sympathetic to the Marines in Anbar province: "In the fog of combat, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish Iraqi civilians from hardened al Qaeda terrorists."

Marine Commandant Flies To Iraq. The AP (5/25, Burns) reports, "The top Marine general said Thursday that he feared, based on two recent cases of alleged killings of civilians in Iraq, that some Marines could become 'indifferent to the loss of a human life.' His office announced that he was enroute to Iraq to reinforce the Corps' standards of behavior in combat." The New York Times (5/26, Shanker, Schmitt, and Oppel) writes that "the commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, flew from Washington to Iraq on Thursday to give a series of speeches to his forces re-emphasizing compliance with international laws of armed conflict, the Geneva Conventions and the American military's own rules of engagement."

Knight-Ridder (5/25, Brown) writes that Gen. Hagee briefed Sens. John Warner and Carl Levin, chair and ranking Democrat, respectively, of the Armed Services Committee, before flying to Iraq. The Washington Post (5/26, Ricks) reports that retired Marine Gen. David Brahms predicts a coming "firestorm" that will be "worse than Abu Ghraib." It adds that "if [predictions of murder charges prove valid], the case is likely to make it more difficult for the Bush administration to bolster support for the war."

The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 6, 2:25, Schieffer) reported Gen. Hagee is "taking an unprecedented action tonight. He's flying to Iraq to personally tell Marines they are accountable for their personal conduct, even under the pressure of combat." CBS (Martin) added, "The investigations are not over yet, but a lawyer for one of the Marines tells CBS News there's a strong possibility some of them will be charged with murder." In "a separate incident last month in Hamandiyah, another squad of Marines killed one Iraqi civilian."

Karzai Visits Wounded Civilians. The New York Times (5/25, Gall) describes a surprise visit by Afghan President Hamid Karzai "to his hometown of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan today to visit civilians wounded in an American bombing raid." One Afghan official says of the president's brief visit: "People were telling him we really need security, but that we do not need foreign troops, and helicopters and tanks anymore, we Afghans should take care of it." The Times quotes an increased figure for civilian deaths: "The numbers of civilian casualties in the bombing continued to rise. At least 35 civilians were killed and 15 wounded when United States planes bombed Taliban fighters in a village of Tolokan, west of Kandahar, on Sunday night, said Abdul Qadar Noorzai, the head of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission in Kandahar."

Navy Missile Program Reaches Milestone. The Washington Times (5/26, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The U.S. Navy this week reached a milestone in its sea-based missile defense program. A modified SM-2 interceptor missile launched from the Hawaii-based Aegis cruiser USS Lake Erie successfully shot down an incoming short-range test missile in the final few seconds before impact. It was the first sea-based intercept of a ballistic missile in the terminal, or last stage, of flight."

DOJ:

New York Girl Receives DOJ Courage Award. WTEN-TV, Albany, NY (5/26) reports, "A local hero receives a national award; and if anybody deserved one, 15-year-old Stephanie Quackenbush does. … She is the Albany girl who fought off an armed attacker and then helped send him to prison. Today she received 'The Courage' award. … And courage is something Stephanie has plenty of. So much, she was honored at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day awards ceremony. She shares the credit with her mom." WTEN-TV adds, "There were words of praise from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'Today we honor all who work for our children, because they are our dreams and our future,' says Gonzales." WTEN-TV adds, "Stephanie almost never lived to see her future. On June of last year, on the way to school she was attacked by a man armed with a butcher knife. Quackenbush fought and screamed, even after the man told her he was going to stab her. … Her screams got the attention of two men, as her attacker ran. He turned out to be 24-year-old Darius Ashley, who is serving 25 years in prison for the assault on Quackenbush, and the rapes of two other girls."

DOJ_NMG_0029539

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Finds Lay, Skilling Guilty In Enron Trial. Former Enron CEOs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were found guilty of a total of 25 counts of fraud and conspiracy in the financial scandals that ultimately led to the collapse of the company. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Koppel, Lattman) reports, "For former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, overturning yesterday's guilty verdicts will be a long shot, legal specialists say." Their chances are weak because "the two are expected to seek reversals in the Fifth US Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which lawyers say is one of the more pro-government benches in the nation." Houston attorney Christopher Bebel says that the trial judge, Simeon Lake, "is on solid ground."

The convictions are being universally portrayed as a clear win for the prosecution, and as a vindication of the government's strategy in the case. USA Today (5/26, Farrell), for example, describes the verdict as "a resounding victory for federal prosecutors." Prosecutors "said the trial should send a message to executives who manipulate their companies' earnings. 'No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules,' said Sean Berkowitz, director of the Enron Task Force. 'You will be held accountable for your actions.'" The Financial Times (5/26, McNulty, Ben White) calls the verdict "the federal government with its most important victory in a five-year crackdown." CNN's The Situation Room (5/26) refers to "a huge victory for prosecutors," and the Washington Times/AP (5/26, Hays) to "a major victory for the government."

The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Mulligan) quotes Berkowitz saying, "The jury has spoken, and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country: You can't lie to shareholders. You can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interest." The Times adds, "Fellow Enron task force member and Orange County federal prosecutor John C. Hueston said that the verdicts will make it harder for top executives to blame their company's problems on their underlings to avoid legal responsibility. 'CEO's cannot hide behind accountants. They cannot hide behind lawyers. They cannot hide behind claims of ignorance when they have been paid tens of millions of dollars to be the faithful stewards of shareholders and investors,' Hueston said."

The story was the lead on each of the networks last night, which also ran follow-up stories on the reaction of former Enron employees and others, devoting a total of about 15 minutes of coverage to the story. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, lead story, 3:05, Vargas) reported, "Lay and Skilling could be locked up for up to 30 years." ABC (Cuomo) added, "Enron has become the poster child for corporate greed and deception. The question was whether the system could hold those at the top accountable. And today, the jury sent a clear message -- justice can reach her hand into the board rooms of the rich and the powerful." NBC Nightly News (5/25, lead story, 3:10, Brown) showed Paul McNulty, Deputy Attorney General, saying, "The message of today's verdict is simple. Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals." The CBS Evening News (5/25, lead story, 2:50, Cowan) called the verdict "a resounding approval of the government's case against Enron's former giants."

The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Johnson) reports, "The Enron investigation has been the most sophisticated and painstaking white-collar criminal probe in history, Justice Department officials said, producing convictions of 18 people. … 'This was the most important corporate scandal of our lifetimes,' said securities-law historian Joel S. Seligman. 'It was one of the immediate causes of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the governance reforms of the New York Stock Exchange and NASD, and the most consequential reorientation of corporate behavior in living memory.'"

The New York Times (5/26, Barrionuevo) reports, "The 12 jurors and 3 alternates, who all agreed to talk to about 100 reporters at a news conference after the verdict, said they were persuaded -- by the volume of evidence the government presented and by Mr. Skilling's and Mr. Lay's own appearances on the stand -- that the men had perpetuated a far-reaching fraud by lying to investors and employees about Enron's performance." The panel "rejected the former chief executives' insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few underlings who stole millions in secret side deals. And the jurors said they did not believe that negative press and failing market confidence combined to sink the company." A second New York Times (5/26, Bajaj, Whitmire) story notes jurors said they "simply could not believe…that Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling were telling the truth when they claimed they didn't realize that something was rotten at Enron. How, they repeatedly wondered, could Enron's former chief executives not have known what was going on?" The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Rust) runs a similar report on the jurors' comments under the headline "Defendants Sunk By Their Testimony."

USA Today (5/26, Iwata) reports Lay and Skilling "could face prison terms of anywhere from 10 years to life, some legal experts say. … Skilling's counts carry a maximum prison sentence of 185 years; Lay's, a maximum of 45 years, not including his separate convictions in a bank fraud case." US District Judge Sim Lake "will base their prison terms on several factors, including total dollar loss to investors, the number of people hurt by the fraud and whether Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, obstructed justice by lying on the witness stand."

Analyzing the case's long-term impact, the Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Scherer, Axtman) says that "today, CEOs can no longer use the excuse that they can't be responsible for other people robbing the company. They can't reward friends with a seat on the board of directors - today, the board must consist of knowledgeable people who will challenge company procedures when it's necessary. And, CEOs, if they choose to ignore the changes, could well be out of their jobs." In a similar piece, the New York Times (5/26, Eichenwald) writes, "The Enron case will forever stand as the ultimate reflection of an era of near madness in finance, a time in the late 1990's when self-certitude and spin became a substitute for financial analysis and coherent business models. Controls broke down and management deteriorated as arrogance overrode careful judgment, allowing senior executives to blithely push aside their critics. "

DOJ_NMG_0029540

The AP (5/26, Hays) reports, "Skilling's $5 million bond, which restricts him to the continental U.S., remains in effect. Lay, who surrendered his passport, posted a $5 million bond secured with family-owned properties at a hearing following the verdict. … The Enron founder was also ordered to stay in the Southern District of Texas or Colorado, avoid contact with any victim of the offense charged, report to pre-trial services regularly and must not own a gun or use alcohol excessively or drugs."

The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Babineck, Flood, Roper) reports, "The jury panel spent 16 weeks listening to often diametrically opposed testimony, with the government calling 25 witnesses plus three more on rebuttal. Several had struck cooperation agreements with the government and acknowledged crimes, and most claimed Lay and Skilling were part of a conspiracy to profit personally by duping the world about Enron. … 'We stole. We all benefited financially at the expense of others,' said former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, who is expected to serve a 10-year prison sentence after admitting he masterminded fraudulent bookkeeping schemes and bled Enron to the tune of $45 million in the process. … The defense impugned Fastow's character and told jurors he was a liar then and he's a liar now, implying he fabricated evidence and testimony that Skilling approved of 'bear hug' deals with Fastow's LJM partnerships to hide Enron debt and guarantee Fastow wouldn't lose money."

The New York Post (5/26, Geller) reports, "The prosecution was jubilant. … 'The government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it,' said lead prosecutor Sean Berkowitz. … 'You can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interests. No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules.'"

Bloomberg (5/26) reports, "In the wake of Enron's meltdown, government prosecutors cracked down on corporate crime. CEOs of WorldCom Inc., HealthSouth Corp., Adelphia Communications Corp. and Rite Aid Corp. were prosecuted for accounting fraud or looting company treasuries. All were convicted of fraud except HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy, who now is on trial on unrelated bribery charges in Alabama." Bloomberg adds, "The eight-woman, four-man jury convicted Skilling on 19 of the 28 charges against him while finding Lay guilty of all of the six counts against him. The government presented a total of 25 witnesses against the men, including a parade of former Enron executives. … 'It's safe to say each of them is facing north of 20 years real jail time,' said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and co-author of Federal Sentencing for Business Crimes. The calculation of the size of the fraud will play a part in determining the exact sentence. 'There's going to be a mini- trial on sentencing issues.' … Prosecutors should feel vindicated as well, said Behre, now a partner at Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker in Washington. 'This case epitomizes a new paradigm of corporate criminal prosecutions. We now hold the highest-level executives responsible for the misconduct of the company. These two guys are as high as they get.'"

CNN/Money (5/26, Pasha, Seid) reports, "Both Lay and Skilling could face 20 to 30 years in prison, legal experts say. And Lay will also face an additional hefty term in prison for his conviction in the bank fraud case. … 'I think absent a successful appeal, they will both die in prison,' said Jamie Wareham, global chairman of litigation at the international law firm Paul Hastings. 'When you're a judge that's concluded that two men have lied to you for hours and hours and hours, light sentences aren't going to flow.'"

Prosecutors Said To Have Learned Lessons From Scrushy Trial. USA Today (5/26, Farrell) says "the only significant failure in the Justice Department's campaign against corporate fraud occurred in Alabama last year, when a federal jury acquitted former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy of masterminding a $2.7 billion fraud, even though five former CFOs testified against Scrushy. In discussing that case after the verdict, several jurors seemed confused about what the government was trying to prove against Scrushy. In the Enron trial, government prosecutors wanted to avoid the same mistakes." USA Today adds that "to win criminal convictions in federal court, prosecutors needed actual proof of guilt against the two men. And, because there were no e-mails tying Lay and Skilling directly to the fraud, prosecutors made a strategic decision to focus the trial on whether Lay and Skilling told the truth in public, not if Enron's accounting was illegal. To that end, perhaps the biggest single break for the prosecutors occurred in December, a month before the trial was to begin, when Richard Causey, the former chief accounting officer of Enron, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud. … With Causey out of the picture in a plea deal, prosecutors could focus their case against Lay and Skilling exclusively on whether the two men were honest in statements to employees, analysts and investors."

Many Questions About Enron's Demise Said To Remain Unanswered. Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal

DOJ_NMG_0029541

(5/26, Smith) says that "because a third defendant, former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey12, pleaded guilty just before the trial began, the case against Messrs. Skilling and Lay became simpler and less focused on the nitty-gritty of how Enron operated." As a result, "while the defendants insisted Enron was a healthy energy-trading company that fell victim to a 'run on the bank,' there was little detailed exploration of the roots of Enron's problems -- including how it became so dependent on paper trading gains that had little real cash attached to them and so vulnerable to credit calls that made it incapable of riding out a crisis." The Journal adds, "Indeed, more than four years after the Enron scandal began, it is still impossible to say what was real at Enron and what was smoke and mirrors."

The Washington Post (5/26, D1, Masters, Johnson), however, reports the Enron "tale" was "complicated, with labyrinthine partnerships and intricate accounting entries, and no documents directly tying the guys at the top to the decisions carried out by others. It was a tough case to be a must win. When the jury returned its verdicts -- guilty on 25 of a combined 34 counts -- it was a clear win."

Lay, Skilling Hurt Defense With Their Testimony. The AP (5/26, Hays) reports, "Kenneth Lay may have paved his way to prison when he testified in his own defense against fraud and conspiracy charges, snarling at a prosecutor and telling a jury of middle-class men and women that he couldn't turn off his rich lifestyle 'like a spigot,' despite $100 million in personal debt. … Jeffrey Skilling may have guaranteed himself a string of convictions when he couldn't counter incriminating testimony from prosecution witnesses with more than, 'It's not true.'" The AP continues, "The epic undoing of the founder and former chief executive of what was once the seventh-largest company in the country and his hand-picked successor came in telling moments throughout the trial of more than four months. … Lay and Skilling entered the trial with a claim that shocked many: Not only were they innocent of wrongdoing, no fraud at all occurred at Enron. Skilling boiled it down with a statement at the end of his 7 1/2 days of grueling testimony: … Prosecutors knew going in that both defendants would seek to exonerate not only themselves, but the company as well. Lay forecast that approach in a speech to Houston business and academic leaders in mid-December, while Skilling's legal team used a court filing to signal their intent. … But Enron fell so precipitously into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 from being the nation's seventh-largest company the year before that something had to be rotten, whether Lay and Skilling knew about it or not."

Knight Ridder (5/26, Burns) reports, "So much for the bold defense of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. … The pair was convicted Thursday by federal jurors who listened to both former Enron Corp. executives spin a tale from the witness stand about a truly great company that was sadly misunderstood." Knight Ridder continues, "From the start, legal observers questioned the strategy of promoting Enron as a 'shining star,' since the rest of the world concluded long ago it had been misled about the one-time Houston energy giant. … Former insiders cooperating with the government swore under oath that the company had lost its moral bearings and manipulated its financial results to deceive a gullible public. … The outcome of the case, with Skilling and Lay facing long prison terms, is likely to encourage future corporate executives targeted in criminal investigations to adopt a lower-risk approach, some legal experts predict."

Skilling Says Holding Trial In Houston Hurt His Chances. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Emshwiller, McWilliams, Davis) reports, "In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Skilling said that when he was pronounced guilty on the first count of conspiracy, 'that floored me. God, there was no conspiracy.' He said that the relatively short jury deliberations had raised his hopes. But 'we were just on a tilted football field,' he said, referring to going on trial in Enron's headquarters city."

The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Babineck, Flood, Roper) notes that "in Houston…thousands of employees lost their jobs -- 4,000 at once the day after Enron filed for bankruptcy on Dec. 2, 2001. Many lost their retirement savings, which was invested in near-worthless Enron shares."

Successful Appeal Seen As Unlikely. The Times (UK) (5/26, Doran) reports, "Legal experts said, however, that the likelihood of a successful appeal was slim because the jury had obviously considered each count in turn, rather than returning a blanket decision."

Texas Lawyer (5/26, Jeffreys) reports, "Joel Androphy, a partner in Berg & Androphy in Houston who has watched most of the trial, says he gives Skilling -- unlike Lay -- reasonable odds at a successful appeal. … Androphy says Lake's instructions to the jurors will help Skilling's appeal. Androphy believes the evidence was not sufficient against Skilling to justify the judge's instructions that the jurors should consider 'willful blindness.' The government had laid out a case against Lay that he specifically avoided learning details but not so against Skilling." Texas Lawyer adds, "Androphy says two government witnesses were extremely important to the prosecutors' case: Ben Glisan, the former Enron treasurer who pleaded guilty in 2003 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison term, and Mark Koenig, the former head of investor relations at Enron who has pleaded guilty to aiding securities fraud at Enron. … Androphy's assessment is the jurors put little stock in the defense's arguments that the government's witnesses were tainted by deals they cut with prosecutors to avoid jail time."

McNulty Calls Verdict Triumph For DOJ. The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Hedges) reports, "In Washington, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty called the verdict a triumph for the Justice Department, and the federal Enron task force that was created in late 2001. … 'Lay, Skilling and their numerous coconspirators perpetrated an elaborate scheme to mislead analysts and investors about Enron's true financial picture. Their efforts to mislead the markets were protracted, deliberate and dishonest,' McNulty said. 'At a time when the company was foundering, these defendants perpetrated a lie that Enron was a robust and growing company in the strongest financial condition it had ever been in. And as they knew, the truth was something very different.' … He added, 'The message of today's verdict is simple: Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals.'" The Chronicle adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who had recused himself from the Enron investigation because of corporate donations he received as a Texas judge, did not comment. … But McNulty lauded the work of a task force he said, 'worked thousands and thousands of hours. They've gone over millions of pages of documents. They have devoted years of their professional life, sacrificing time from families, all in the effort to try to hold individuals accountable for corruption.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029542

Some Say Verdict Will Embolden Federal Prosecutors. The Financial Times (5/26, Kirchgaessner, Waldmeir) reports, "The conviction of Ken Lay and Jeffrey Skilling is the successful culmination of a legal strategy Department of Justice prosecutors have been fine tuning since the day, in 2001, when Enron, one of America's most respected companies, collapsed under the weight of a massive fraud." The Times continues, "That strategy called on law enforcement officials to indict and seek the conviction of chief executives of companies on fraud charges – often involving complex accounting schemes – even if there was little or no solid evidence that the executives intended to commit a crime or even knew the fraud existed." The Times adds, "In the case of Enron, says Michael Missal, a former attorney at the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart, the verdict will further embolden prosecutors to "go after the people at the very top", holding them responsible for wrongdoing at the companies they ran. … Dan Small, a litigation strategy expert at the law firm of Duane Morris, also believes the victory will rejuvenate the justice department at a time when, he says, the legal community has been wondering whether momentum of prosecuting corporate fraud has slowed down. … But one former senior counsel at the justice department disagrees. Timothy Coleman, an attorney at Dewey Ballantine, says the guilty verdict represents the end of an era that began and ends with Enron and that the political forces that put aggressive prosecution of white collar crime at the top of law enforcement's agenda will now subside."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Davies, Scannell) reports, "The convictions of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling culminate a crackdown on turn-of-the-century corporate malfeasance. They also will likely embolden the government to continue its campaign." Among the targets are "two dozen or so companies under federal investigation into whether they improperly backdated stock-option grants to enrich executives."

Task Force Navigated Tough Road To Conviction. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Emshwiller) reports, "The Enron Task Force's uneven record looks sharply improved after it scored big wins in its defining case yesterday with the convictions of former Chief Executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling." The task force suffered a major reversal when "a conviction of … Arthur Andersen LLP was overturned" by the Supreme Court. It was criticized for allegedly unfairly penalizing "thousands of innocent Andersen employees." The Journal notes that its prosecutors "have won convictions against seven individuals, while one person has been acquitted. A trial of several former executives of Enron's high-speed telecommunications unit ended with no convictions and acquittals on numerous counts." In addition, the task force suffered from "communication problems, bureaucratic infighting and disagreements over tactics."

Convictions Solidify Corporate Reform Movement. Knight Ridder (5/26, Greising) reports, "Enron. The very word encapsulates an era. … It conjures images of too-cozy board rooms, all-powerful CEOs, compliant accountants, greed-struck employees and, ultimately, out-of-luck investors. … And now, thanks to the convictions of former chief executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, Enron finally can stand for something else. … It stands for justice, thanks to the jury's unequivocal verdict." Knight Ridder add,s "The convictions also likely will embolden the sheriffs in town - federal prosecutors, the Securities and Exchange Commission, ambitious district attorneys and even a few private investors - to forge ahead in the challenging, ongoing effort to battle business corruption. … Some argue that a guilty verdict was not needed to exact justice. A flurry of post-Enron reforms, highlighted by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, had done that, they say. … 'Even if there had been an acquittal, that would have been OK,[said Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. 'The changes that this case has brought are a victory in their own right.' … But Andrew Weissmann disagrees. Weissmann laid the investigative foundation for Thursday's verdict as head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. Before he stepped down nearly a year ago, he sifted through the grubby entrails of the corrupt Enron enterprise. … Weissmann also led the prosecution of Arthur Andersen. And since the Supreme Court threw out the Andersen guilty verdict because of the judge's flawed jury instruction, he has seen how a final verdict can muddle the public's perceptions of right and wrong."

Former Employees Praise Guilty Verdicts. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 2, 1:55, von Fremd)

DOJ_NMG_0029543

reported, "Many former Enron employees said they've waited more than four years for this moment." Deborah DeForge, former Enron employee: "Just hearing that they found them guilty, kind of renewed my sense of fairness in the justice system." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (5/25, story 2, 1:55, Mason) reported, "For Enron's former employees, the guilty verdicts ended five years of misery," while NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 2, 2:00, Brown) asked, "So was justice served? Many of the people who bet their life savings on Enron say yes." The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Burns) reports Sherri Saunders, "who lost her job and $1 million in retirement savings, said the verdict 'gives me a little comfort.'" The Houston Chronicle (5/26, Patel) runs a story about former workers, titled "For Ex-Enron Employees, Verdict Is Personal," and the Washington Post (5/26, D1, Ahrens) and USA Today (5/26, Appleby), among other newspapers, run similar reports.

Political Impact From Enron Verdicts Seen As Unlikely. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Both parties doubt Enron verdicts will have large political impact. 'The public verdict is already in on CEO greed at the expense of the company's own employees,' says ex-Clinton strategist Stan Greenberg. Adds Republican pollster Neil Newhouse, 'There could have been a public backlash had the verdicts not come in guilty.'"

Verdict Said To Mark "Beginning Of The End Of The Bush Era." Under the headline "Kenny Boy, Meet Brownie," Howard Fineman writes on Newsweek's website (5/26), "If you want a date to mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era in American life, you may as well make it this one: May 25, 2006. The Enron jury in Houston didn't just put the wood to Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling. The jurors took a chainsaw to the moral claims of the Texas-based corporate culture that had helped fuel the rise to power of President George W. Bush. … Ultimately, Bush's Justice Department pressed the case against Enron -- and won. Still, when the history books are written, the debit side of the Bush-era ledger will include a line labeled 'Kenny Boy.' That's the nickname Bush gave the guy he later claimed he barely knew. "

Under the headline "Once A Friend And Ally, Now A Distant Memory," the Washington Post (5/26, A10, Goldfarb) reports, "In the 1980s, when Bush was working in the Texas oil industry, his firm invested in a drilling partnership with Lay's company, a predecessor to Enron. In 1992, Lay was co-chairman of the Republican National Convention in Houston that re-nominated President George H.W. Bush. Later, Lay was a major fundraiser for George W. Bush's political career." Vice President Cheney "invited Lay to take part in his secret energy task force meetings. Cheney also talked to the Indian government about a debt it owed Enron for the rebuilding of a power plant."

British Banker Fighting Extradition Calls Enron Verdict "Terrifying." Bloomberg (5/26, Murphy) reports, "A British banker fighting extradition to the U.S. on Enron Corp.-related charges said he was 'terrified' by today's convictions of the company's former Chairman Kenneth Lay and ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling and questioned why the men chose to fight the case. … 'It was either an incredibly brave or foolhardy thing that they did, and I guess they're paying the consequences now,' David Bermingham said in a telephone interview from his home outside London. 'They had both hands tied behind their back, and they were up against the 400-pound gorilla. The deck was completely stacked against them.'" Bloomberg adds, "Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew, all former employees of Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, are wanted in Texas for allegedly pocketing millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership. … They are among the 33 individuals, including Lay and Skilling, the U.S. government has prosecuted in connection with the energy trader's implosion, which wiped out thousands of jobs and more than $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight. … Bermingham said today that while he didn't have any opinion on whether Lay or Skilling were guilty of the fraud and conspiracy charges against them, the fact that both men may spend the rest of their lives in prison only reinforced the importance of the bankers' ongoing battle against extradition."

Defendants' Wives Faced Their Own Kind Of Pressure. USA Today (5/26, O'Donnell, Fetterman) reports, "In courtroom wrangling over white-collar crimes, the way family support is perceived can be important. In the Enron trial, it was often about the wives." USA continues, "Linda Lay, the former secretary turned second wife to Enron ex-chairman Ken Lay, stood by her man every day of the four-month trial that ended in her husband's conviction Thursday. … Usually, she sat in the first row of the spectator gallery, about 20 feet from her husband. But as the clock approached 11 a.m. in Houston Thursday, the hour of judgment for Ken Lay, she moved into the front part of the courtroom to be beside him." USA adds, "Linda Lay maintained the same tight grasp on her husband's hand that she's had in all the trips to and from the courtroom. … That wasn't the case with Rebecca Carter, former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling's second wife and former corporate board secretary. She did not attend every day of the trial and was not in the courtroom when it was time for a verdict. Outside the courthouse, after being convicted on all counts, Skilling thanked his family, especially his three children, but didn't mention his wife. … Beth Bonora, a jury consultant in San Francisco, says it's important for those on trial to have family members in the courtroom to 'convey that other people care about you and believe in you. … People are curious about relationships, the dynamics' of family members in the courtroom."

Public Not Keen On Enron-Related Books, Film, Memorabilia. USA Today (5/26, Lieberman, Howard, Petrecca) reports, "Enron's legacy includes several well-regarded books, an Oscar-nominated documentary, a mountain of memorabilia and — based on sales of those items — lots of yawns." USA continues, "Publishers, who made the biggest bets on public interest in Enron, hope for a few more sales off the verdict, but don't expect much. … 'There were a lot of (Enron) books and relatively few readers,' says Michael Cader, editor of industry newsletter Publishers Lunch. 'It was a complex case and the extent to which it meant anything to general readers was elusive.'" USA adds, "Meanwhile, auctioneers don't expect a surge of Enron-mania for souvenirs. 'Some of the wind is out of the sails because of the length of time of the trial,' says Dennis Kruse, president of the National Auctioneers Association. … This week, 66 Enron items have sold on eBay, says eBay spokesman Dean Jutilla, while bidders snapped up 1,285 items tied to American Idol winner Taylor Hicks."

DOJ_NMG_0029544

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) editorializes, "If anyone still thinks corporate chieftains are above the law, yesterday's 29 guilty verdicts against former Enron CEOs Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay should put that myth to rest." The Enron verdicts "are proof, if more were needed, that lying to employees, shareholders and the public about corporate finances is a serious crime that will be punished.

The New York Times (5/26) editorializes, "We hope the jury's verdict deters other corporate kingpins from breaking the rules. As Paul McNulty, deputy attorney general, put it in a news conference shortly after the verdict was announced, 'No one, including the heads of Fortune 500 companies, is above the law.' At the same time, white-collar criminal cases can be difficult, paper intensive and hard to explain to juries. We expect the verdict in the Enron case to encourage prosecutors to pursue them."

The Washington Post (5/26, A20) writes in an editorial, "There is a danger in this verdict, however. In the wake of Enron's bankruptcy, some argued that the problems of corporate America were the work of a few bad apples." Yet, adds the Post, "this decade's business scandals were not just about bad apples, and putting those apples in jail is not going to change that."

USA Today (5/26) editorializes that Enron was a case "that epitomized an era, the one that the federal prosecutors absolutely had to win. Now that they did…public attention to issues of corporate fraud and governance might wane. That would be a shame because much more remains to be done before shareholders and employees can be confident that senior managers are acting in their company's best interest, not their own."

Steven Perlstein writes in the Washington Post (5/26), "Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling are right about one thing: The games they played at Enron were no different than the games being played at hundreds of other big public companies during the late 1990s. So in that respect, it is unfair that Lay and Skilling (and their partner in crime, Andy Fastow) have been singled out for criminal prosecution. Unfair -- and totally necessary. … For all the nuance and sophistication of our legal system, the convictions of Lay, Skilling, Bernard Ebbers, Dennis Kozlowski, the Rigases and the Arthur Andersen accounting firm amount to nothing more than old-fashioned hangings in the public square. They are the way by which a capitalist society gets its most powerful economic actors to abide by the rules that make free markets work."

Novelist James P. Othmer writes in the New York Times (5/26, Othmer) that "this is about much more than the fate of Kenny Boy Lay and Jeff Skilling. This is about us. The Masters of the Universe. The all-knowing, type-A power mongers in crimson suspenders with bottomless expense accounts. This is about the fate of the prickly, unapologetic, rule-averse tough guys like you and me who run this country, not because we're particularly talented or charming, but because we have the gift of arrogance."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (5/26) editorializes, "The convictions of former Enron execs Lay and Skilling provide some justice for Washingtonians bilked by the Western energy crisis. Even within perhaps the worst-led Justice Department in U.S. history, enough capable, dedicated, honest prosecutors remain to win difficult convictions. Jurors saw through the defense's attempts at explanations, evasions and excuses."

Fannie Mae CEO Will Not Head Accounting Probe. Dow Jones (5/26) reports, "Reversing course Thursday, Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen B. Ashley said chief executive officer Daniel H. Mudd won't lead the company's investigation into who should be fired or punished because of the housing giant's $10.6 billion accounting scandal." Dow Jones continues, 'Instead, Ashley said that four independent board members who have joined Fannie Mae (FNM) in the last 18 months would spearhead the probe. … 'The board and myself have developed our thinking further for how a review of the personnel mentioned in the OFHEO report would be handled,' Ashley said in an interview." Dow Jones adds, "Ashley said the board decided to change its plans on Wednesday, one day after he said on an analyst call that Mudd would lead the review. … He said the decision was 'internal' and didn't come from pressure by regulators or lawmakers. … The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight and the Securities and Exchange Commission fined Fannie Mae $400 million Tuesday for 'deliberately and systematically' creating earnings 'illusions' to hit targets from 1998 through 2004. … The SEC and Justice Department are both looking into the roles individuals played in the accounting scandal. Tuesday's agreement only settled allegations against the company."

DOJ_NMG_0029545

WSJournal Says Fannie Mae Scandal Is Political. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) says in an editorial that Fannie Mae's "regulator issued its long-awaited, 340-page report on the company's $10.8 billion accounting woes this week, and the news is that the internal rot is even worse than we ever imagined. This is the Beltway's Enron, yet the political class still hasn't fixed the core problem, which is Fannie's political protection." The Ofheo (Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight) report "makes clear that Fannie's core expertise was manipulating its earnings and rigging the politics. The management of credit risk that was supposed to be its stock-in-trade was way down the list." The "larger story here is that Fannie Mae is less a corporate outrage than a political one. It is the tale of a company that has grown rich off an implicit taxpayer subsidy and then plowed those profits back into buying political protection in Congress and feckless regulation from the executive."

House Committee Holds Hearing On Executive Pay Packages. The AP (5/26, Gordon) reports, "Lawmakers on Thursday addressed an issue that rankles company shareholders and the public -- executive pay packages and perks -- at a time when revelations of excess surface almost daily." The AP continues, "A senior Democrat, Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, wants Congress to give shareholders a greater say over executive compensation. … 'There have clearly been abuses,' Frank said at the start of a hearing by the House Financial Services Committee. The session became an impassioned debate between Democrats and Republicans over the morality of lavish compensation, an argument portrayed by panel members as a clash between faith in capitalism and advocacy of socialism." The AP adds, 'Frank had earlier used a parliamentary rule to force the majority Republican leaders of the committee to convene the hearing. … The partisan rhetoric flew, as befits an election year. Countering Frank's legislative proposal, Republicans disclosed that they have a bill of their own in the works: one that would rein in trial lawyers, a group that is a perennial ally of Democrats and generous contributor to their campaigns. … The subject clearly hits a nerve with Americans, who hear reports almost daily of excessive pay and perks for executives while their companies stumble, lay off employees or renege on billions of dollars in pension obligations for workers' retirement. The chasm between executives' salaries and the pay of rank-and-file employees continues to widen."

Former Wal-Mart Official To Be Sentenced In August For Fraud. The AP (5/26, Kabel) reports, "A federal judge has set a sentencing hearing Aug. 11 for Thomas Coughlin, the former No. 2 executive at Wal-Mart Stores Inc., who pleaded guilty in January to fraud and tax charges for stealing money, gift cards and merchandise from the world's largest retailer." The AP continues, "Coughlin, 57, faces a maximum of 28 years in prison after pleading guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of filing a false tax return. He also could be fined $1.35 million." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson, who accepted Coughlin's guilty plea in January, set the sentencing hearing for Aug. 11 in his courtroom in Fort Smith, Arkansas. … Prosecutors have recommended a sentence but Dawson sealed the plea agreement pending a presentencing report. … Wal-Mart referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin allegedly had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary cocktail mix. Wal-Mart estimated losses at up to $500,000."

Top Hedge Fund Managers Average $363 Million In Annual Pay. USA Today (5/26, Shell) reports, "James Simons, a mathematician turned money manager who prefers hiring Ph.D.s over MBAs, inched out oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens Jr. as the world's best-paid hedge fund manager in 2005, collecting an estimated $1.5 billion, according to rankings released today by Institutional Investor's Alpha magazine." USA continues, "In rising to the top of what amounts to a who's who list of the secretive hedge fund world, Simons, of Renaissance Technologies, unseated 2004's top earner and first-ever billion-dollar man, Edward Lampert of ESL Investments, who is best known for buying Kmart and masterminding the blockbuster deal to buy Sears. Lampert's earnings dipped to an estimated $425 million last year, down from $1.0 billion in 2004. … Pickens also topped $1 billion, earning an estimated $1.4 billion. The average pay of the 26 (there was a tie for 25th place) on the list was $363 million, up 45% from $251 million in 2004." USA Adds, "Other big-name managers with big-time reputations in the top 10 included: financier George Soros, who was named 'the man who broke the Bank of England' in 1992 after a winning bet against the British pound netted him more than $1 billion; Steven Cohen of SAC Capital Advisors, whom BusinessWeek called 'the most powerful trader on Wall Street you've never heard of' in a July 2003 cover story; and legendary trader Paul Tudor Jones II. … The surge in pay comes amid an explosive growth in the industry, which now has roughly 8,000 funds and $1.2 trillion in assets. A lucrative business model for hedge fund managers, which, on average, entitles them to 2% of assets under management and 20% of the profit, makes these large paydays possible, Peltz says. A $10 billion fund would earn $200 million from the 2% management fee alone. Super-successful managers charge even more."

DOJ_NMG_0029546

Charity Holds "Shareholders" Meetings To Demonstrate Accountability. The New York Times (5/26, Strom) reports that for the last four years, Direct Relief, a charity which provides "donated medicine and medical supplies to communities around the world, has held a 'shareholders' meeting' for contributors to demonstrate its accountability and to burnish its relationship with its donors. … The charity began holding the shareholders' meetings to expand its appeal to donors locally and beyond." Direct Relief "invites representatives of the organizations it has supported to attend the meetings and explain how the charity has assisted them, as well as to offer primers on the challenges they face in providing health services in impoverished and conflict-ravaged countries."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Orders Documents Seized By FBI Sealed For 45 Days. Amid the rising tension between the Administration and Congress over the FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, President Bush yesterday ordered the Justice Department to seal the documents seized by the FBI. The Office of the Solicitor General will hold the documents for 45 days, which Bush said in a statement released yesterday, "will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government." Press reports characterize Bush's order as "a highly unusual intervention," an "extraordinary" and "remarkable."

ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 4, :20, Vargas) reported, "Congressional leaders sharply criticized the FBI for raiding the offices of Democratic Congressman William Jefferson in a search for evidence. … Today, President Bush ordered everything the FBI seized to be sealed for 45 days. He said he wants to give both sides time to resolve their dispute." The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "When FBI agents searched the office of Democratic Congressman William Jefferson, it marked a dubious first. … Today, the President got into the act." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Mr. Bush's order was welcomed by the House Speaker, who says important principles are at stake. … A senior law enforcement official said the cooling off period would not affect the investigation of Congressman Jefferson. 'There is videotape of the congressman putting cash in the trunk of his car,' the official tells CBS News. There's 'two plea agreements and more than enough evidence to finish the case.'" NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 6, 0:30, Brown) noted, "Congressional leaders of both parties are calling the raid a violation of the Constitution's guarantee of separation of powers."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported that President Bush has "stepped directly into the escalating battle between the executive branch and Congress," by ordering "all materials seized in a raid on a Congressman's office, sealed for 45 days." CNN (Bash) added that "this really was not an easy move for this president to make. He often errs on the side of expanding executive powers. But clearly, President Bush right in the middle of this constitutional confrontation between members of Congress and the Justice Department." CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (5/25, Bash) noted, "The constitutional showdown between Republicans in Congress and the Republican administration was escalating by the minute, and President Bush blinked."

FOX News' Special Report with Brit Hume (5/25, Wilson) reported that Bush "noted the nation had never faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," but "what is not clear...is exactly how far the FBI had gotten in its five-day review of the records. The decision came on a day when some in Congress publicly disagreed with their Hill leaders." Sen. David Vitter: "We've had raids before on legislators' homes, federal judges' chambers, member of a different branch, their professional offices, their chambers -- and those led to criminal convictions which were upheld." Sen. Jeff Sessions: "This was a search based upon a court order -- an FBI agent went to a federal judge with a sworn affidavit in which he alleged there was probable cause."

The AP (5/26, Kellman) reports, "Republican officials who spoke on condition of anonymity said Vice President Dick Cheney had become involved as the administration worked to ease the anger of the speaker, who has enormous control over the president's legislative agenda. … Within minutes, the heads of the battling institutions stood down and began talking about solutions. Hastert said the order would 'give us some time to step back and try to negotiate with the Department of Justice.' Gonzales said the move provides 'time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress.' The FBI said it would comply with Bush's order." The Los Angels Times (5/26, Reynolds, Schmitt) adds, "White House officials would not say whether Bush had spoken personally to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the Jefferson raid," but "Gonzales, who approved the search of Jefferson's office, issued a statement saying he was satisfied with the president's decision. … A government official…said Justice Department negotiators were adamant that the department not relinquish the seized materials, because it could compromise the investigation. The official said some senior department officials had been prepared to submit their resignations if Bush had ordered them returned."

DOJ_NMG_0029547

In a front-page story, The Washington Post (5/26, Eggen VandeHei) reports that Bush's order is "a remarkable intervention by the nation's chief executive into an ongoing criminal probe of alleged corruption. … Bush hoped to mollify Hastert…at a time of increasingly sour relations with the GOP-controlled Congress, according to White House sources." The Post adds that "the agreement…marked a setback for the FBI and Justice Department," and "the negotiations angered many federal prosecutors and FBI agents, who believed that the search warrant for Jefferson's office…was lawful and necessary because of Jefferson's refusal to comply with a subpoena issued in August." However, "one law enforcement official" said, "If we can bring down the rhetoric and cool off, it may be better for everyone in the end." Under the headline "To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Seized Files," The New York Times (5/26, Hulse, Johnston) notes, "Before Mr. Bush's decision to step in, what law enforcement officials described as a tense drama had played out," and Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty "at one point…told Scott Palmer, chief of staff to Mr. Hastert, that he would quit rather than give up the materials to Mr. Jefferson. … At the F.B.I., officials said they would comply with the deal but complained privately that it would bar them from examining the materials discovered in the search for more than a month. Senior F.B.I. officials were not consulted in negotiations and regarded any effort to keep them from evidence as an unfair intrusion that could compromise their investigation."

The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Neikirk) calls the order an "extraordinary step" and adds, "A Justice Department official familiar with the negotiations with Congress said House leaders put the agency in an untenable position by demanding return of the Jefferson documents. 'Do you think there's any way the Justice Department would give incriminating documents back to an entity that the target is connected to? No way,' said the source." Knight Ridder (5/26, Kuhnhenn) says Bush's decision is "a highly unusual intervention" and reports, "In a joint statement following the president's announcement, Hastert and Pelosi said they had directed House lawyers to negotiate with the Justice Department to establish procedures for obtaining 'evidence of criminal conduct that might exist in the offices of members.' ... According to lawmakers who were briefed by the Justice Department, the agents carted away one box of records from Jefferson's office. The FBI-House confrontation has roiled Washington politics."

Meanwhile, The Washington Times (5/26, Dinan, Fagan) reports, "Not all lawmakers, however, are opposed to the FBI's actions." Sen. David Vitter "was briefed yesterday by high-level Justice Department officials and said, 'I feel more strongly than ever that that search was legal and constitutional.' … Some House Republicans also said it's politically bad for Republicans to be feuding. 'I don't think we should be fighting with the FBI going into an election,' said Rep. Joe Pitts, Pennsylvania Republican." AFP (5/26, Lozano) also reports on Bush's order.

MarketWatch (5/26, Watts) reports, "ABC News, citing unidentified law-enforcement sources, reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating a letter Hastert wrote three years ago to then-Interior Secretary Gale Norton to block an Indian casino -- which would have competed with casinos operated by tribes represented by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and is cooperating with an ongoing investigation. … The Justice Department twice issued denials of the story, saying that Hastert wasn't the subject of an investigation. Such denials are rare; the agency usually refuses to confirm or deny the existence of a probe. … ABC News late Wednesday posted an update on its Web site, saying that despite the department's statement, federal law-enforcement sources said the network had accurately reported that Hastert was 'in the mix' of the FBI probe of congressional corruption."

Bloomberg (5/26, Runningen) reports, "Hastert has expressed frustration that the White House didn't consult him before the FBI searched Jefferson's offices on May 20. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, was videotaped accepting a leather briefcase containing $100,000 in cash from a government witness, according to an FBI affidavit filed in connection with the search warrant. He has denied wrongdoing and hasn't been charged with a crime. … Hastert discussed his constitutional concerns directly with Bush this week, said Ron Bonjean, the congressman's spokesman."

Fallout From FBI Raid Could Threaten Bush Legislative Agenda. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, A4, Cummings, Mullins) reports that the "FBI raid…is fueling a power struggle between Congress and the administration that could hobble President Bush in his efforts to move his legislative agenda." Speaker Dennis Hastert "has been one of the White House's best friends on Capitol Hill," ensuring "a succession of legislative victories over the years to President Bush even when it meant bending the will of his own moderate or conservative wings." However, if the rift with Congress widens, "more administration officials could find themselves being hauled before skeptical -- if not hostile -- oversight committees." Furthermore, "the battle could…embolden the Senate to pass a tougher version of legislation limiting the administration's ability to conduct domestic spying programs," and "there could be more fights over spending bills, even as the spat could scuttle any hope of passing a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, which the White House views as a key prong of its election strategy."

Hastert Faces Ire Of Rank-And-File Republicans In Closed-Door Meeting. CQ (5/26, Ferrechio) reports

DOJ_NMG_0029548

Speaker Dennis Hastert "found himself facing pushback from his own party Thursday." He "spent two hours behind closed doors with the rank and file, listening to their complaints about Hastert's defense of institutional prerogative — a concept that is not the easiest to explain to an angry constituent. Most House Republicans emerged from the meeting grim-faced and closed-mouthed, but one member characterized sentiment as 'mostly opposed' to Hastert's high-profile fight against the raid. Some members believe the Justice Department acted lawfully when it executed a court-approved search warrant on Jefferson's office."

Conservatives Criticize Hastert. The Washington Times (5/26, Hallow) reports, "Conservatives yesterday expressed confusion and outrage over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's defense of a Democratic congressman whose Capitol Hill office was raided last weekend by the FBI. 'Only thing I can figure is that Denny got up one morning and said, "Our approval with the public is at 27 percent -- how can I drive that down further?"' said former Rep. Bob Barr, Georgia Republican. … Radio host Rush Limbaugh yesterday told his millions of listeners that the Hastert-Pelosi alliance shows the GOP has become 'politically tone-deaf,'" and "veteran conservative activist Richard Viguerie said Mr. Hastert 'is clueless -- he just doesn't get it, doesn't understand he has to make changes, the same in the Senate.'"

Dispute Seen As Political Threat For Both Parties. The AP (5/26, Raum) reports that the "FBI raid…has triggered an exceptional display of congressional bipartisan unity. But there are pitfalls for both parties. Additional prosecutions loom in the investigation surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and calling more attention to corruption — and congressional privilege — could further drive down election-year approval ratings for all of Congress. … Furthermore, the flap comes at a time when the Bush administration faces criticism for pushing the envelope of its executive powers in warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency and in other surveillance and detention programs. For Democrats, the more they blast FBI tactics against one of their own, the harder it will be to make their 'culture of corruption' label stick against Republicans."

Meanwhile, USA Today (5/26, 4A Konigsmark) reports, "Louisiana has always borne a reputation for corrupt politicians. Jefferson's alleged misdoings may cause more than just red faces, however. Louisiana is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina, and billions in federal dollars await congressional approval. … Not only could it be bad for Louisiana, but also for Democrats nationally, who are trying to win mid-term elections by painting Republicans as corrupt. This week, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi asked Jefferson to give up his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He refused."

Hastert Praises Bush Order, Says Constitutional Concerns Can Be Resolved. In a USA Today (5/26) op-ed, Speaker Dennis Hastert writes, "The issue that has concerned me…since Saturday night is not if the FBI should be able to search a member of Congress' office, but rather how to do it within the boundaries of the Constitution. On Thursday, President Bush recognized that serious constitutional issues needed to be resolved" and "wisely" ordered the records sealed. Hastert adds, "Justice Department officials now insist that this specific case required them, for the first time, to conduct a search. I regret that when they reached this conclusion, they did not work with us to figure out a way to do it consistently with the Constitution. But that is behind us now. I am confident that in the next 45 days, the lawyers will figure out how to do it right."

New Orleans Abuzz Over Jefferson Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Simmons, 958K) reports Rep William Jefferson "has long provided one of Louisiana's favorite success stories: the sometime-sharecropper's son who rose from rural roots to attend Harvard Law School, become a Democratic Party power player and reach the halls of Congress. So when the FBI revealed that it had videotape of Jefferson accepting $100,000 in cash that the bureau said was intended to bribe a Nigerian official — and that $90,000 of it had been found in the freezer of Jefferson's home — constituents…reacted with shock, disappointment and a touch of amusement hardened by experience. … Now that the city's mayoral elections are over and incumbent C. Ray Nagin is in office for four more years, Jefferson's travails are the buzz around many quarters of this city." The Times notes that "the general sentiments among friends and supporters have been disbelief and denial."

LATimes Calls Bush Order "More Indefensible" Than Hastert, Pelosi Complaints. The Los Angeles Times (5/26) editorializes, "It is outrageous enough that both the speaker and the minority leader have complained about a lawful FBI search of the offices of a fellow House member. It's even more outrageous that the president is now trying to placate them by announcing that records seized in the search will be off-limits to investigators for 45 days." The Times notes that "the FBI searched Jefferson's offices because that's where he kept his records. This wasn't a case of jackbooted thugs from the executive branch rifling willy-nilly through congressional files in search of embarrassing information," and "the agents who searched Jefferson's office were acting lawfully and within the requirements of the 4th Amendment." The Times adds that "President Bush's actions on Thursday even more indefensible than Hastert's and Pelosi's. … Although the president is the head of the executive branch, he shouldn't second-guess the conduct of a criminal investigation because of meritless complaints from Capitol Hill. The sooner this 'seal' is broken, the better."

DOJ_NMG_0029549

NYTimes Calls Congressional Claims "Overblown." The New York Times (5/26) editorializes, "The F.B.I. is going to have to show some very good reasons for having precipitated this showdown," but "the constitutional claims made by the Congressional leadership on the Jefferson case seem overblown. House and Senate members are protected from arrest while going about their official business to shield them from intimidation and meddling by the executive branch in the affairs of state, not to deter law enforcement officials from doing their lawful duty to investigate possible felonies." The Times adds that "members of Congress who have been politically comatose or complicit as the Bush administration built itself an imperial presidency, immune from the historical powers of the legislative branch, are up in arms. … It seems like a phony approach to a real problem."

More Commentary. USA Today (5/26) editorializes, "Now we know what it takes to make Congress mad enough to stand up for constitutional rights. When the government snoops on your phone calls and records without warrants, lawmakers barely kick up a fuss. But when the target is a fellow congressman — one under investigation for taking a bribe, no less — they're ready to rumble. … If only those leaders were as profoundly disturbed about executive branch incursions on the rights of average citizens. You certainly have to wonder where they've been for the past several years while the Bush administration ran roughshod over the legislative branch and launched anti-terror programs of questionable legality."

In an editorial, The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/26) criticizes the "unprecedented" FBI raid as "the wrong thing for the FBI or any other body of the federal government to do. At the very least, representatives of the legislative branch of government should have been present for the search, to assure that the FBI limited itself to collecting evidence of crime. Given the Bush administration's general approach to the rule of law…there is otherwise no guarantee of respect of separation of powers," which "was crossed so sharply Saturday night and Sunday."

In an editorial distributed by Scripps Howard (5/26), Dale McFeatters writes, "From the standpoint of public sympathy, the House couldn't have chosen a worse time to stand on constitutional principle. The voters surely do not share the House members' outrage at a weekend FBI raid of a congressional office in connection with a spreading influence-peddling investigation that has tarred the whole institution. … Indeed, after ABC reported that GOP House Speaker Dennis Hastert might get caught up in that probe, Hastert accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him because he so vehemently objected to the raid. This was fine irony coming from a legislator who couldn't do enough to broaden the department's powers through the Patriot Act and its renewal." McFeatters adds, "It says something about the state of relations between the administration and Congress that the Justice Department and White House seemed stunned by the strenuous reaction. After all, they had trampled over Congress' prerogatives before with no discernible reaction. … The two leaders are on shaky constitutional ground, legal scholars say. The Constitution makes an exception to lawmakers' legal immunity for felonies and nothing in that document says Capitol Hill should be a sanctuary for committing them. However, historians could find no precedent for a warrant and search of a congressional office. … Still, there is a serious issue of government to be addressed. The potential for Soviet-style intimidation is clear. Members of Congress must be confident that they are free from politically motivated reprisals from the executive branch and, at the same time, the Justice Department must be free to conduct legitimate investigations into unlawful conduct."

The Texarkana (TX) Gazette (5/26) editorializes, "Basically, the august members of Congress figure they are entitled to the equivalent of diplomatic immunity while on Capitol Hill. … This imperial attitude has no real foundation. Lawmakers may be used to deferential treatment and exceptional courtesy—and even expect law enforcement to look the other way from time to time—but they are not above the law and their offices are not akin to church sanctuary. … In fact, their offices are not even theirs. They belong to the people of the United States, many of whom are getting fed up with the pervasive attitude of near-royal entitlement among Washington insiders." The Gazette adds, "This was not political intimidation, which is what the Constitution was guarding against with the separation of powers, but a valid criminal investigation. … Hastert has complained to the president, and the White House says it is taking the Legislative Branch's complaints most seriously. … But the dispute between these two branches of government will almost certainly be decided down the road by the third, the Judicial Branch and the Supreme Court."

Hastert Says FBI Leaked Abramoff Probe Story To Intimidate Him. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 5, 2:40, Vargas) noted, "We reported last night that sources tell us that House Speaker Dennis Hastert was among those whose dealings with Abramoff the FBI has been looking into. We have new details to report, tonight." ABC (Ross) added, "The Department of Justice issued two separate denials of our report. The Speaker demanded a retraction. And his colleagues suggested the FBI was out to get him with a bogus story. … On WGN radio in Chicago, Hastert says the story was a leak planted by the FBI to intimidate him." Hastert: "It's just not true. You know, the Justice Department said there is no investigation. And, you know, this is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people. And we're just not going to be intimidated on it." Ross: "As we reported last night, the investigation is still in its early stages. And our sources say it could well turn out that Hastert did nothing unlawful. But Federal law enforcement sources say the FBI in its next step will soon seek documents and e-mails from a number of members of Congress, who have been linked in the investigation to Abramoff."

DOJ_NMG_0029550

The AP (Kellman) reports, "Asked later Thursday whether he thought he Justice Department retaliated against him with the leak, Hastert replied: 'All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect any dots they want to.' 'I thought it was an interesting sequence of events,' he added." DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, "We are not going to dignify or speculate about the motives of anonymous sources providing inaccurate information," but "Correspondent Brian Ross stood by his report, saying he has checked with his sources who say the story accurately represents the facts 'as they know them.' 'There's enough there for them (the FBI) to take a look at the speaker' and other members of Congress, Ross said in an interview." In its story about Bush's order to seal the Jefferson raid documents, The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Neikirk) notes, "White House spokesman Tony Snow said the government did not leak information to undermine Hastert. 'I got pretty categorical denials,' Snow said." In its story on Bush's order, The New York Times (5/26, Hulse, Johnston) adds that Snow "said senior officials at the Justice Department had assured the White House there had been no effort to embarrass Mr. Hastert. 'Just false, false, false,' Mr. Snow said.

CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported Hastert was "downright livid" about the ABC report, and Fox News' Special Report (5/25, Hume) noted that Hastert said the ABC story "could be a political retaliation for his criticism of the FBI's raid."

Other Networks, Cable News Passed On Story. The Washington Post (5/26, A6, Kurtz) reports, "Reporters for NBC, CBS, CNN, Fox News and other news organizations checked out ABC's report but were waved off by law enforcement officials. 'Within 15 minutes, we had three or four basic denials saying in effect this was a complete overreach, and we chose not to run it,' said John Reiss, executive producer of 'NBC Nightly News.'"

Sources Say Novak Told Rove He Would Not Identify Him. Bloomberg (5/26, Keil) reports, "Syndicated columnist Robert Novak assured presidential adviser Karl Rove that he wouldn't identify him to prosecutors investigating the disclosure of a CIA agent's name, a person familiar with the matter said." Bloomberg continues, "Rove told a grand jury that Novak called him shortly after the Central Intelligence Agency asked the Justice Department to investigate who leaked the name of operative Valerie Plame to Novak and other reporters, the person, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said. Novak revealed Plame's name in a July 14, 2003, column, citing unnamed administration officials. … The National Journal, which reported earlier today on the Sept. 29, 2003, conversation between Rove and Novak, said Justice Department prosecutors were concerned that Rove and Novak may have been working on a cover story to protect Rove. The report, citing people familiar with the grand jury testimony of both men, said then-Attorney General John Ashcroft was briefed on the matter." Bloomberg notes, "Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, said the White House deputy chief of staff didn't conspire to hide information. … 'Karl has never urged anyone to testify falsely or withhold information from the grand jury, and no one has ever suggested to him that they would, or that they intended to,' Luskin said in a telephone interview. 'The special counsel has never suggested there is any evidence to support such an allegation.'"

Former Chicago Sanitation Official Testifies About Political Hires. The Chicago Tribune (5/26, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "Applicants for city jobs waited by the hundreds in a South Side auditorium for meaningless interviews that had no bearing on who ultimately was hired, a former Streets and Sanitation Department official testified Thursday" at the corruption trial of former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three codefendants. Jack Drumgould "told jurors that Mayor Richard Daley's office dictated who would be hired for 95 percent of blue-collar, union jobs in Streets and Sanitation." He "said he took orders from defendants Robert Sorich and Timothy McCarthy in a secret effort to circumvent a federal court order prohibiting political-based hiring for such jobs." The Tribune adds that defense lawyer Cynthia Giacchetti "challenged Drumgould's credibility on cross-examination," suggesting that he "agreed to cooperate with authorities to spare himself from indictment and retain his $6,000-a-month pension."

Sorich Lawyer May Seek Daley Testimony At Trial. The Chicago Sun-Times (5/25, Warmbir, Korecki) reported, "Mayor Daley could be called as a witness in the ongoing trial of four former city employees accused of routinely ordering the hiring or promotion of people based on politics, a lawyer for one of the defendants indicated Wednesday. The attorney for Robert Sorich opened the door to that possibility during a sidebar in the federal court trial, a transcript released late Wednesday revealed. … 'One of my assumptions is the mayor's testimony that he didn't believe that there was anything improper at the time, and he was not aware that there was anything improper going on. He's already testified under oath to that,'" Sorich defense lawyer Tom Durkin told U.S. District Judge David Coar on Wednesday in a private discussion." The Sun-Times adds, "When Coar asked whether the mayor would come in and testify, Durkin left the door open."

DOJ_NMG_0029551

House Committee Backs Limits On Internet Gambling. The AP (5/25, Werner) reports, "A House panel approved legislation Thursday to crack down on the $12 billion Internet gambling industry by applying federal prohibitions to games like online poker, blackjack and roulette." The AP continues, "The bill by Rep. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., would update the 1961 Federal Wire Wager Act to apply to online gambling. It also would outlaw electronic transmission of funds to pay for gambling bets and give law enforcement agencies authority to block such money transfers." The AP adds, "Internet gambling already is mostly illegal in the United States, and most of as many as 2,300 gambling sites in existence are overseas. … The bill approved by the Judiciary Committee would 'prevent offshore fly-by-night gambling businesses from violating the laws of all states,' Goodlatte said. … But half of the $12 billion spent on online gambling is thought to come from U.S. bettors and some companies in this country want to get in on the action. The American Gaming Association, the industry's largest lobby, has opposed online gambling in the past but last month backed a study of the feasibility of legalizing it."

Bloomberg (5/26) reports, "The Bush administration Justice Department supports the proposed legislation. Online gambling's legal status in the U.S. is unclear. The Justice Department interprets a 1961 law against using telephone lines to place interstate bets as banning online gambling. Goodlatte said his bill would make that explicit." Bloomberg adds, "Gambling on the Internet is a $12 billion-a-year business that is growing rapidly offshore. Internet-based casinos such as PartyGaming Plc and 888 Holdings Plc, operating in locations such as Gibraltar and Antigua, rake in billions from U.S. gamblers. … The Goodlatte measure would force U.S. financial institutions to cooperate with federal law enforcement authorities in shutting down illegal gambling sites based outside the U.S. The measure exempts horse racing, fantasy-sports betting and state lotteries in the U.S. … By carving out an exception for horse racing, the bill hurts dog racing and jalai, Representative Robert Wexler, a Florida Democrat, said. The Judiciary Committee, controlled by Republicans, rejected proposed amendments calling for specific state regulation and for adopting criminal penalties for bettors of fines and up to two years in prison."

Federal Judge Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend. The Buffalo News (5/26, Herbeck) reports, "When U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin sentenced a suspended Lewiston attorney in a criminal tax case last year, the judge called the man a longtime friend and added, 'It hurts me as much as it does you, Tim.' … The words spoken by the judge in his courtroom last August have caused an appeals court to remove him from the case of Timothy J. Toohey." The News continues, "Toohey, 59, pleaded guilty in February 2003 to underreporting his income by $1 million. Elfvin already has sentenced him three times - twice to probation, and then to 15 months in prison. … But every time, the Second Circuit Appeals Court found legal problems with Elfvin's handling of the case and ordered a resentencing. … Now, the appeals court has removed Elfvin from the case altogether, saying he should have recused himself because of his friendship with Toohey. … 'As is obvious, it's quite a mess,' Elfvin, 88, said in an interview with The Buffalo News on Wednesday. 'It's probably a good idea to have another judge handle it.'" The News notes, "A panel of appeals judges said remarks made by Elfvin in court last August revealed that his friendship with Toohey had caused him to be lenient on two previous occasions. … 'Those first two sentences really go back to a lot of the relationship that you and I had when I was practicing law,' Elfvin told Toohey, according to court records. 'You were a great friend, a good guy. . . . I really bent over backwards on your behalf in that regard. That explains those two sentences.' … After saying those words last August, Elfvin sentenced Toohey to 15 months in prison. Toohey's attorneys then appealed that sentencing, and Toohey has been out of prison while the appeal is pending. … The Toohey case has not yet been reassigned. The chief federal judge of Western New York, Richard J. Arcara, is expected to determine who will handle the case."

Circuits Divided On Lethal Injection. The National Law Journal (5/26, Maclean) reports, "A frustrated five-judge minority on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decried the 'dysfunctional patchwork of stays and executions' in capital cases since January, when the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to explore a procedural attack on lethal injection." The Journal continues, "Some 38 states use lethal injection out of the 39 that permit capital punishment. In all, courts around the country have granted nine stays of execution, but 15 condemned inmates have been executed during the same period that the lethal injection issue has been pending. … 'In some instances stays are granted, while others they are not, and the defendants are executed with no principled distinction to justify such a result,' wrote Judge Boyce Martin Jr. last week. He dissented after the full 6th Circuit refused, by a 7-5 vote, to reconsider the request to stay the Tennessee execution of Sedley Alley in Alley v. Little, No. 06-6550." The Journal adds, "Alley faced execution on May 17 for the 1985 rape and murder of a 19-year-old Marine corporal, Suzanne M. Collins, at Millington Naval Air Station near Memphis. Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen last week granted a 15-day stay of execution. Alley's case is the second to challenge the Tennessee chemical protocol used in executions. The other, Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen, No. 05-1036, was set for the high court's conference meeting one day after Alley's scheduled execution. Rahman's case raises a frontal attack on lethal injection. … Critics claim that the chemicals used in lethal injections do not properly anesthetize the subject, and thus cause unnecessary suffering before death. … The situation around the country is unnerving for defense lawyers where stays may be handed out in one circuit but denied in the circuit next door."

DOJ_NMG_0029552

Gotti Trial Judge Critical Of New Federal Indictment. The AP (5/26, Neumeister) reports, "The third racketeering trial of John 'Junior' Gotti was postponed Thursday by a federal judge who suggested the government was trying to sneak references to murders into a rewritten indictment." The AP continues, "The judge said it seemed the government was trying to reword the indictment until it could find a combination that would result in a conviction." The AP adds, "Two cases against Gotti in the last year ended with hung juries after defense attorneys argued that the mob scion had quit the crime mob life in 1999. … 'I'm really troubled,' U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin said of the new Gotti indictment, which includes an allegation that Gotti promoted people within the Gambino crime family if they committed murders. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou said there was no specific new evidence he could immediately point to that would support the murder references in Gotti's racketeering indictment. … Scheindlin reset opening statements in the next trial by seven weeks, from July 5 to Aug. 28, so lawyers would have enough time to argue the issues."

Prosecutor Assails Wecht Lawyers' Contentions In Evidence Motion. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (5/26, Conti) reports, "Federal prosecutors responded Thursday to allegations made by former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht's defense team that the district attorney and an FBI agent built a case against the renowned forensic pathologist based on politics and lies. Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings asked U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab to dismiss Wecht's request to have evidence tossed out, calling the defense team's previous court filings a 'journey down a road to a tangle of conspiracy theories.'" The Tribune-Review adds, "Also irrelevant to the charges against Wecht, Stallings wrote, are allegations that FBI Special Agent Brad Orsini…has a bad reputation and once asked a witness to lie. According to a ruling by Schwab last month, prosecutors have two reports outlining Orsini's history of departmental reprimands."

FBI Finds Nothing At Barn Site In Search For Hoffa Remains. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/26, Krisher) reports, "After tearing apart a barn, FBI agents began digging up the ground where it stood Thursday, taking photos and video and sifting through dirt by hand as they searched for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a suburban Detroit farm. After a backhoe dug a hole at the site, FBI agents and crime-scene investigators jumped in to take pictures and comb through the soil. At one point, two dogs were sent into the hole. But after seven hours of digging, FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said nothing significant was found," calling it "Much ado about nothing." She added that "the search was expected to continue through the Memorial Day holiday weekend."

FBI Recovers $1.1 Million From Miami Airport Heist. The Miami Herald (5/26, Weaver, 323K) reports, "FBI agents have dug up $1.1 million in vacuum-packed cash stashed at two southwest Miami-Dade houses, recovering some of the loot stolen in a Goodfellas-style heist at Miami International Airport. Agents unearthed $300,000 of the sealed cash under brick pavers at the home of Karls and Cinnamon Monzon, who were indicted along with two others in last fall's $7.4 million warehouse ripoff at MIA. They also found an additional $800,000 at the residence of another person who has not been charged in the federal case. 'We're still searching for the rest of the money and for other suspects,' FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said Thursday. The FBI found the stolen cash in mid-May." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/26, Johnson, 249K) notes, "A total of $1.26 million has been recovered so far, but it is only a small chunk of the $7.4 million taken from the cash shipment that arrived at the airport," bound for the Miami Federal Reserve Bank. Orhuela said, "We're still looking. We're going to follow all the logical leads we can until we find it all."

Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Skills Showing At Maryland Murder Trial. The Baltimore Sun (5/26, Scharper) reports, "John Allen Muhammad, who aggressively hammered his former accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo with questions and shouted at prosecutors yesterday, appeared deflated today, as three witnesses whom he had called added little or nothing to his defense." The Sun continues, "Muhammad, who is representing himself, meekly ceded to most of the prosecution's objections that his questions were leading, inappropriate or irrelevant. … The state rested its case against Muhammad, 45, yesterday after unveiling an enormous amount of evidence over three weeks, including ballistics reports, fingerprints, DNA and Malvo's firsthand account of the pair's murderous rampage. Muhammad is on trial in Montgomery County for six counts of murder in the October 2002 sniper shootings." The Sun adds, "One of the defense witnesses, Heidi Mansen of Silver Spring, said outside the courtroom that she believes Muhammad is guilty of the slayings, and she hopes her testimony won't sway the jury. … 'I'm hoping that my testimony amounts to nothing compared to the other evidence against him,' Mansen said. She testified that she saw a red car feet away from the scene of one of the sniper shootings. Police later said that the car was not involved in that crime. … 'I felt bad because I had testified against the wrong person,' Mansen said. 'Just because I saw something doesn't mean that's what really happened.'" The Sun notes, "Muhammad's lack of legal finesse hampered his efforts in questioning other witnesses. … He doggedly tried to ask a Secret Service agent about a report that could not be entered into evidence as prosecutors successfully blocked nearly every question."

DOJ_NMG_0029553

The Washington Times (5/26, Ward) reports, "Muhammad had little luck yesterday with witnesses he called in his defense, so today he might testify himself. … 'I reserve the right to answer that [later],' Muhammad told Montgomery County Circuit Judge James L. Ryan, when asked whether he planned to put himself on the stand." The Times adds, "Muhammad is representing himself, even though he has no legal training, and prosecutors objected to more than half of his hundreds of questions to witnesses yesterday, often successfully. … If he does take the stand, Muhammad's testimony would take the form of a 'presentation,' his standby attorney, J. Wyndal Gordon, said."

Potential Witnesses Hesitant To Testify For Muhammad. The Washington Post (5/26, B1, Londoño, Rich) reports, "Sniper John Allen Muhammad, who submitted a list of nearly 180 potential witnesses and has closely guarded his defense strategy at his trial in Montgomery County, intends to call no witnesses after today. … 'The difficulty we're having is witnesses don't want to be a part of Mr. Muhammad's defense,' J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's standby attorneys, told the judge. 'I've actually been told: "I don't care what you do. If the judge wants to send the sheriff after me, so be it. I'm not coming."' … Closing arguments could come as soon as Tuesday, and a verdict on six first-degree murder charges in the October 2002 shootings is likely before the end of next week."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (5/26, A20) editorializes, "Whatever Lee Boyd Malvo's reasons were for testifying against fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad this week -- whether to curry favor with prosecutors, or to redeem himself with the victims and their families, or to confront and defy his former mentor at last -- his appearance shed some light on the motive and method behind the pair's murderous binge in October 2002." The Post continues, "Malvo….laid out the older man's sinister purpose in undertaking the series of killings that paralyzed this region for weeks. Mr. Muhammad's intent, Mr. Malvo suggested, was to induce a wave of mayhem in the Washington area that would somehow allow him to take back his three children, whom he had lost to their mother in a custody dispute and who were living in Clinton. The wave of shootings was just the first phase of Mr. Muhammad's plan, Mr. Malvo said; after that he intended to plant bombs that specifically targeted children." The Post adds, "We don't know whether Mr. Malvo's appearance provided any psychological comfort or closure for the surviving victims and their loved ones. For the most part, the face-off between two killers was a sickening spectacle. But it did fill in the blanks of what is publicly known about an event that traumatized this region and left lasting psychological scars, and that has its own value."

Attorney Says Fairfax County Gunman Was Denied Psychiatric Care. The Washington Post (5/26, B1, Jackman) reports, "In the three months before he fatally shot two Fairfax County police officers, Michael W. Kennedy and his parents tried numerous times to get him immediate psychiatric help, their attorney said. Four times, Kennedy was sent home without getting help, and two mental health facilities told them not to bother coming in at all." The Post continues, "On one occasion, Kennedy, 18, who by this time claimed he was talking to God and was threatening suicide, was voluntarily admitted to a mental health facility in Rockville. But after several hours, he left of his own accord and carjacked a vehicle to return home to Fairfax. … 'This young man was crying out for help,' said Richard F. MacDowell Jr., the attorney for Brian and Margaret Kennedy, Michael Kennedy's parents. 'On at least five occasions, they sought mental health services and were turned away. I can't think of another case that would be this compelling as to how ineffective our mental health system has become.'" The Post adds, "Michael Kennedy's last contact with mental health professionals occurred May 4, four days before he carried seven loaded guns to the Sully District police station and opened fire, MacDowell said. Kennedy fatally shot Detective Vicky O. Armel and Officer Michael E. Garbarino before being shot to death by other officers. … MacDowell spoke on behalf of Kennedy's parents to express their frustration at a system that seemed unable or unwilling to help their son. MacDowell said Kennedy's mental condition was never diagnosed, except for "a generalized diagnosis of depression and then anxiety at the end. This was somebody who was obviously deeply troubled.""

Financial Firms Unite To Fight Child Porn. USA Today (5/26, Koch) reports, "The nation's leading banks and credit card companies will soon team with law enforcement in a groundbreaking coalition to catch people who sell child pornography online." USA continues, "The financial institutions will report child porn sites they discover on the Web to a central tip line, slated to expand next month to receive the information. The companies will block transactions for online child porn or, if law enforcement opens an investigation, help track sellers and buyers." USA adds, "The Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography represents a new phase in the war against what has become a multibillion-dollar, international business. Internet service providers, including AOL, already report child porn sites they find. … 'The scope of the problem is much greater than we ever thought. It's mind-boggling,' says Ernie Allen of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, a private group that runs the tip line. Allen says one website can attract tens of thousands of customers, mostly men, who use credit cards to buy $29 monthly subscriptions. 'People are getting into this because they see children as a commodity. There's no question organized crime is involved. … 'I haven't seen anything like it,' adds Drew Oosterbaan, chief of the Justice Department's child exploitation section. 'We're here to support the effort.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029554

Canada Fights Surge In Violent Crime. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Newman) reports from Toronto, "The predawn sting operation last week that resulted in more than 100 arrests of individuals associated with Toronto's Jamestown gang, is being hailed as the city's largest anti-gang sweep ever. The raid netted a substantial cache of guns, cocaine, marijuana, and stolen cars, and more than 1,000 criminal charges were levied." The Monitor continues, "Both the sting operation and the recent legislation are part of a larger crackdown on handguns and gang violence in Canada, particularly in Toronto where handgun murders and injuries doubled between 2004 and 2005. … But while police and the public applaud the hard-line approach, social pundits and criminology professors are skeptical that the approach is getting at the roots of the problem: poverty, illiteracy, dysfunctional families, and racism in a diverse ethnic population. They cite US cities such as Boston, where a similar initiative led to an 80 percent drop in homicide rates by 1999 - a success dubbed the 'Boston miracle.' But fatal shootings have more than doubled since." The Monitor adds, "In Canada, guns and gangs are a relatively new phenomenon, particularly in Toronto, known as 'Toronto the Good' for its traditionally safe streets and low homicide rates. There were 52 deadly handgun shootings in the city in 2005, compared with 12 in 1995. Police and social workers alike attribute the acts largely to young black males - many of whom are the children of West Indian immigrants - who feel marginalized and drop out of school early to join the 'gangsta' culture where they make quick money through drugs, guns, or prostitution."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

North Carolina Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Cross Burning. The Charlotte Observer (5/26, Aronoff) reports, "A former Morganton (NC) resident who admitted building and burning a cross has been sentenced to 20 months in federal prison, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Thursday." The Observer continues, "In 2004, a federal grand jury accused Grady Allan Carswell, 36, now of Lenoir (NC), of putting a burning cross in front of a black couple's home in the Bristol Creek community. … Carswell pled guilty in January 2005 to a one-count indictment related to the incident but said he burned the cross because of a land dispute with another neighbor, not out of racism." The Observer adds, "At a sentencing hearing Monday, U.S. District Judge Lacy Thornburg rejected that argument and ordered Carswell serve the prison time followed by three years' probation. He will also have to pay the victims about $2,200 in restitution. … 'Cross burning remains a vicious symbol of hatred and cannot be tolerated,' Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said in a news release. 'All American families have the right to live where they choose, undisturbed by racist threats.'"

Black Male Initiatives Said To Promote Racial Stereotypes. In a Washington Post op-ed (5/26, A21), Michael Meyers of the New York Civil Rights Coalition says, "I'm sorry to report that 52 years after Brown v. Board of Education, separate but equal is all the rage in certain parts of the education world -- especially on college campuses where special programs are offered that target minority students for 'special' and separate attention, counseling, mentoring, tutoring, residences and instruction. The latest of these race fads are the Black Male Initiatives (BMIs), government-funded and university-sponsored, and underway on campuses in states including Georgia, Kansas, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York." More "and more they are being shown to feature new variants of an old prejudice. This has included stereotyping all black male students as 'at risk,' and, for example, running special classes only for black men at CUNY's Medgar Evers College. This special instruction focused on black men's alleged deficiencies and their need to act more responsibly in order to reclaim their traditional patriarchal roles as leaders in the black community and of the so-called black race."

ANTITRUST:

Former Michigan Schools Official Charged With E-Rate Fraud. The Ann Arbor News (MI) (5/25, Kauth-Karjala) reports, "Former Willow Run schools superintendent Douglas A. Benit and his wife face federal criminal charges that they defrauded another school district and a federal program out of millions of dollars by steering contracts to companies they owned." The News continues, "Benit and his wife, Mary Ann Elam Benit, were arrested Wednesday, a day after a federal grand jury in Detroit returned the indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0029555

Both were released on $10,000 personal bonds and are scheduled to be arraigned May 31 in federal District Court in Detroit." The News adds, "Benit was fired from Willow Run last fall after a district investigation concluded that Benit had a conflict of interest with two companies that did business with the district and that he may have benefited from the connection. There have been no charges stemming from the Willow Run investigation, although Justice Department officials said the probe is continuing. … The federal indictment includes charges of fraud against the Ecorse Public School district and a federal program called E-Rate, which was intended to help school districts gain better Internet access. Benit was subpoenaed to testify before Congress concerning the E-Rate investigation in 2004. He appeared but declined to testify, citing the protections of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution."

The Detroit Free Press (5/26, Higgins) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice says Benit used his position in the district, which he left in 2003, to steer contracts -- sometimes at inflated prices -- to Coral Technology Inc., an Ohio company he controlled. It allegedly occurred from March 1998 to October 2003. … The money came from the federal E-Rate program, which provides funding for Internet access and other telecommunications services to poor schools and libraries. The indictments bring to 13 the number of individuals charged as part of the Justice Department's ongoing investigation into fraud in the E-Rate program. Twelve companies have been charged. … The department 'will continue to vigorously pursue those who cheat the competitive process and who violate the public's trust ... by stealing from federal programs and taking advantage of lending institutions,' Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said in a news release."

House Judiciary Committee Votes To Ban Internet Content Fees. Dow Jones (5/26, Hughes) reports, "The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday voted to ban the nation's phone and cable companies from charging extra fees to companies such as Amazon.com Inc. and Google Inc. for speedier delivery of their content." Dow Jones continues, "By 20-13 the panel approved legislation being pushed by more than 100 consumer groups and businesses. The vote was, at least on the surface, a blow to Verizon Communications and AT&T Inc., which have said that new regulations may undercut their ability to invest in high-capacity networks." Dow Jones adds, "House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., is speeding ahead with the bill to assert court jurisdiction over a matter that some would prefer left to regulators. In so doing, he is also seeking to counter efforts by phone companies to keep open the option of building business plans organized around additional fees. … 'While the technological dynamics of the marketplace have changed over time, the threat of dominant firms abusing their market power to restrain competition has not,' Sensenbrenner said."

Google Seals Software Deal With Dell. The New York Times (5/26, Flynn) reports, "Google and Dell have reached an agreement to install Google software on millions of new Dell computers over the next few years, Google's chief executive said on Thursday." The Times continues, "The executive, Eric E. Schmidt, said the arrangement meant that Google's search toolbar would appear on the screens of new Dell systems, and that Dell users would be directed to a Web page branded by the two companies. … Mr. Schmidt, speaking at a Goldman Sachs Internet conference in Las Vegas, said the companies would share revenue from the deal." The Times adds, "While financial terms were not disclosed, many analysts assumed that Google would pay Dell a fee for the arrangement. If that is the case, said Safa Rashtchy, an analyst with Piper Jaffray, this will be the beginning of a era in which Google pays for alliances in order to maintain its growth rate. … Mr. Schmidt said that this would be first of several agreements with Dell. The time period of the deal was not disclosed. … The software, Dell said, would be put only on machines sold to consumers and to small and medium-size businesses. While the consumer market accounted for roughly 14 percent of Dell's revenue last quarter, the deal would nonetheless involve millions of new computers over time."

The Seattle Times/Bloomberg (5/26, Guglielmo, Thaw) reports, "The deal curbs Microsoft's ability to close the gap with Google. Microsoft is putting search in the new Vista version of Windows, scheduled to hit stores in January, in an effort to encourage more customers to use it. … While Microsoft dominates desktop software, Google has four times more users for its Internet search and Google leads in advertising revenue. Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer escalated spending on the company's MSN Internet unit to challenge Google and reclaim share of Internet search."

Yahoo, eBay Team Up To Battle Google. USA Today (5/26, Graham) reports, "In a bid to challenge Google's growing domination of the Internet, auctioneer eBay joined forces with Google rival Yahoo on Thursday. The alliance brings text-based advertising to eBay from Yahoo and eBay's PayPal payment program to Yahoo. … Yahoo is the most visited website, with more than 100 million monthly visitors. But it has been losing market share in online searches to Google, which dominates the hot search advertising business — those little text ads that appear near search results. According to measurement firm ComScore Media Metrix, Google's search share rose 6.6% in April over the same time a year ago, while Yahoo's fell 2.7%." USA adds, "EBay, the Internet's fifth-most-visited site, according to ComScore, is also the Internet's largest purchaser of search ads, says John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website. 'It was inevitable that Yahoo and eBay would do this deal, because eBay needed to counterbalance its dependence on Google for traffic,' he says."

DOJ_NMG_0029556

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Delaney, Mangalindan, Guth) reports, "The land rush over the Internet entered a new phase yesterday as four tech titans -- Yahoo Inc., eBay Inc., Google Inc. and Dell Inc. -- announced alliances that signal more jockeying ahead over access to online consumers and the advertising they view on the Web. The high-profile deals also raise fresh questions about Microsoft Corp.'s efforts to keep step in the race." The Journal continues, 'Yahoo and eBay unveiled a broad partnership under which eBay will display ads brokered by Yahoo on its U.S. online auction site and marketplace. Yahoo will promote eBay's PayPal electronic-payment system as a way for consumers to pay for Yahoo services." The Journal notes, "Separately, Google and Dell confirmed an agreement to install Google software on Dell PCs before they are shipped to users. The deal, which Dell says could include as many as 20 million computers a year, will get Google's search services and ads in front of more users. … The agreements are the result of behind-the-scenes efforts by tech companies big and small to form alliances that strengthen their efforts to own a bigger piece of the Web landscape. At stake are huge future profits from Internet users and advertisers, whose buying and spending habits are still in flux."

The Washington Post (5/26, D4, Noguchi) reports, "The partnership spans some of the most critical areas of both companies' businesses, adding eBay's Paypal online payment system throughout Yahoo's operations and giving Yahoo an exclusive deal to sell display ads for eBay.com. … That two of the Internet's top brands decided to cooperate so closely highlights how powerful Google is becoming as it roves across the online business world, competing with eBay in online classifieds and payment systems and with Yahoo in search and content. It also leaves Microsoft in increasing need of a partner of its own, as its online service trails the others in search and advertising."

The New York Times (5/26, Hansell) reports, "The deal will expand Yahoo's share of Internet advertising, a market where it lost leadership to Google. Investors have been worried that eBay's highly profitable shopping site is being undercut as consumers increasingly find products through search engines or through free listing services like Craigslist. Google and Yahoo have introduced similar free services. … At the same time, eBay is spending $260 million a year to advertise its auctions on search engines, with 60 percent of that on Google, according to estimates by Jordan Rohan, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets."

ENVIRONMENT:

GAO Says Bush Greenhouse Gas Programs Not Producing Results. The Washington Post (5/26, A3, Eilperin) reports the Government Accountability Office says the "Bush administration's voluntary programs to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by industry have yet to deliver promised results." The "51-page report, which was requested by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), highlights shortcomings in two projects aimed at encouraging the private sector to cut emissions linked to global warming. The Environmental Protection Agency sponsors 'Climate Leaders,' while the Energy Department oversees 'Climate VISION.'" Both programs "encourage polluters to cut their greenhouse-gas releases, but in each case, according to the study, the administration has failed to ensure that participating firms set firm reduction targets or meet their stated goals."

House Votes To Allow ANWR Drilling. USA Today (5/26) reports, "The House of Representatives voted Thursday to allow oil exploration on a small portion of Alaska's 19 million-acre Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The vote was 225-201 to allow drilling on 1.5 million acres that federal geologists estimate hold 5.4 billion to 16 billion barrels of recoverable oil." The AP (5/26, Hebert) says the House action "may be little more than symbolic. Arctic refuge development, while approved by the House five times, repeatedly has been blocked in the Senate where drilling proponents have been unable to muster the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster." The AP adds, "Access to ANWR's oil has been a key part of President Bush's energy agenda, although over the last five years he's been unable to convince Congress of its merits. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Thursday urged the Senate to pass a drilling measure 'so we can strengthen our nation's energy security.'"

The Washington Post (5/26, A5, Eilperin) notes the measure "marks the 12th time since 1995 that the House has voted in favor of opening the refuge to oil and gas development." The New York Times (5/26, Janofsky) runs a similar report.

The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Simon) reports "jittery" House Republicans "wanted to return to their districts for Memorial Day able to say that they had acted on energy legislation before the summer vacation season begins."

NYTimes Says Only Disasters Prompted Mine Safety Overhaul Bills. The New York Times (5/26) says in an editorial, "Another mine disaster is finally spurring Congress to pass long overdue repairs to the nation's threadbare safety laws. Mandates for such obvious necessities as extra oxygen supplies for trapped miners languished after an initial burst of concern over the disaster in January that killed 12 miners in Sago, W.Va. But the explosion last weekend in Kentucky that killed five miners has been followed by quick Senate approval of a bill ordering extra oxygen, more responsive rescue teams, and stronger underground barriers to seal off danger zones from workers. The Republican leaders in the House, lagging behind the Senate, hurried to catch up. But the sad truth is that safety equipment and rescue procedures have been scandalously neglected for years under company-friendly regulations that have been laxly enforced by government agencies stocked with political appointees who have come from the coal industry."

DOJ_NMG_0029557

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former Prescription Drug Distributor Pleads Guilty To Selling Stolen Drugs. The AP (5/26) reports former drug distributor Gregory Broccoli "admitted Thursday that he sold $7.3 million worth of prescription drugs that he knew were stolen from warehouses and trucks." Broccoli "pleaded guilty to five conspiracy charges, acknowledging wrongdoing from 2002 through 2004 at a company he operated in Jersey City and Elizabeth called Providers Plus. Broccoli, 39, of Staten Island, N.Y., is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with a federal investigation that began in 2003." The "FBI investigation and guilty pleas from the defendants exposed a network of thieves and crooked wholesalers who obtained prescription drugs through illegal means, created fraudulent documents, and then reintroduced the prescription drugs into the marketplace, federal prosecutors in New Jersey said."

Reporting Continues On Overdoses Linked To Fentanyl-Laced Drugs. The AP (5/25) reports a mixture of heroin and a powerful painkiller "has been killing unsuspecting users who believe they are taking pure heroin. Officials from Philadelphia to Chicago have reported deaths from the drug, called fentanyl and considered 80 times more powerful than morphine. In the Detroit area - the apparent hub of the problem with more than 100 confirmed cases since last fall and about two dozen suspected ones in the last week - officials from the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are investigating, and community organizations are scrambling to get the word out to users."

In a sidebar, the AP (5/25) outlines reported deaths associated with the fentanyl-laced drugs.

The Detroit Free Press (5/25, Ben Schmitt, Hunt, Norris) reports local toxicologists "say they've seen a steady increase in fentanyl-related deaths since last fall, but nothing prepared them for the jump that began last week: At least 23 people have died in Wayne County since May 18 from what investigators believe was a lethal combination of heroin or cocaine and fentanyl. Now, as Michiganders gear up for the long holiday weekend and outdoor activities, county and Detroit officials are scrambling to get the word out about the drug's dangers." The Free Press adds, "Deaths linked to fentanyl-laced drugs have been reported in smaller numbers in cities across the country, including Chicago and Philadelphia, and investigated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency since last fall."

In a separate story, the Detroit Free Press (5/25, Hunt) reports, "Law enforcement officials investigating fentanyl-related deaths in Wayne County say drug dealers could be crystallizing prescription fentanyl to use as a cutting agent for heroin and cocaine, but they doubt it. They believe someone is manufacturing the drug in an illegal lab."

The Detroit News (5/26) reports, "The Wayne County death toll attributed to fentanyl-laced drugs has reached 33 people in one week, putting Metro Detroit at the epicenter of a national health concern that reaches into several other states. There have been at least 200 confirmed deaths in five states attributed to the painkiller mixed with heroin or cocaine, with 130 of them in Wayne County since January 2005."

"Operation Street Sweep" Nets Suspects Facing Drug Charges In Tennessee. Memphis, Tennessee's, Commercial Appeal (5/26) reports, "Just two hours into Thursday's roundup, two teams of officers supervised by Memphis Police Lt. Charles 'Bubba' Cox had picked up four of 10 suspects on his list of those wanted on state or federal warrants. By late afternoon, 48 of 67 people indicted on drug and gun charges were behind bars in Operation Street Sweep. … Thirty of the suspects were being sought on federal indictments returned this week, and 24 are wanted for state crimes, mainly drug offenses. … At their first stop, one team, led by Joe Hoing, a 32-year Memphis police veteran assigned to the DEA drug task force, caught up with Nicholas Hull, 28, named in six counts of crack possession."

17 People From 3 States Face Charges In Drug Investigation. The AP (5/25) reports, "Seventeen people from Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts have been arrested on drug charges after a seven-month undercover investigation. Edward Arias and Jose Ortiz, both of Lawrence, Mass., were indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine by a federal grand jury in New Hampshire. They supplied more than 150 pounds of cocaine to southern Maine, said Kittery, Maine, Police Chief Edward Strong. Up to 15 more people could be arrested as the investigation continues, he said." The AP notes DEA involvement in the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0029558

The Portsmouth (NH) Herald News (5/25) reports, "News this week that 17 people are facing federal and state cocaine and marijuana distribution charges has 'definitely put a dent' in the local drug trade - from significant suppliers right down to street dealers," according to Strong.

Ohio Businessman Accused Of Money Laundering Pleads Guilty. The Dayton (OH) Daily News (5/26) reports a businessman "admitted Thursday to a federal felony charge of money laundering. … Glen Hurst, 55, of Butler Twp. pleaded guilty as part of a plea agreement." Hurst was "indicted in a wide-ranging case that focused on drug kingpin Earl Marshall, who pleaded guilty April 18 to five felonies and faces at least 18 years in prison. In 2004, federal officials called the case one of the largest trafficking operations in Dayton. It was investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and Drug Enforcement Administration."

Researcher Finds "No Association" Between Marijuana And Lung Cancer. Reporting continues on a marijuana study done in California. The Washington Post (5/26, Kaufman) today reports, "The largest study of its kind has unexpectedly concluded that smoking marijuana, even regularly and heavily, does not lead to lung cancer. The new findings 'were against our expectations,' said Donald Tashkin of the University of California at Los Angeles, a pulmonologist who has studied marijuana for 30 years. … Federal health and drug enforcement officials have widely used Tashkin's previous work on marijuana to make the case that the drug is dangerous. Tashkin said that while he still believes marijuana is potentially harmful, its cancer-causing effects appear to be of less concern than previously thought."

Idaho Man Indicted On Drug-Smuggling Charges. The AP (5/26) reports, "A federal grand jury has indicted a Sandpoint, Idaho, man on charges he attempted to smuggle marijuana, methamphetamine and the designer drug Ecstacy into the United States from Canada. Joseph A. Roberts, 43, was arrested by U.S. Border Patrol agents May 7…just south of the Canadian border in Okanogan County. … Federal prosecutors allege Roberts had nearly 170 pounds of 'B.C. Bud' marijuana, 143 pounds of methamphetamine and 16 pounds of Ecstasy when arrested."

Judge Refuses To Halt California Gun-Store Closure. The Chico (CA) Enterprise Record (5/26, Richman) reports, "A federal judge refused (Thursday) to postpone the government-imposed closing date for Northern California's largest gun dealer, Trader Sports of San Leandro, due to extensive violations of federal law." The Record continues, "Chief U.S. District Court Judge Vaughn Walker found that although Trader Sports likely will be hurt more by the closure than the public would be by allowing the store to remain open, the gun dealer hasn't substantially disputed the claims against it and isn't likely enough to succeed in its claims of an unfair administrative hearing to deserve a court-ordered stay. … Vaughn gave the store until June 2 - one day past the government's previously imposed deadline - to take the case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and seek a stay there. The store's attorney, Malcolm Segal of Sacramento, said he'll have to ask store owner Anthony Cucchiara whether to appeal." The Record adds, "The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms served Cucchiara months ago with notice that he'd have to surrender his license and close his store effective June 1. This followed a 13-month administrative hearing in which the ATF used evidence from a September 2003 inspection, along with earlier information, to argue Trader Sports has flouted federal firearms sale reporting requirements for years."

The San Francisco Chronicle (5/26, Bulwa) reports, "Those who have been watching the fight between Cucchiara and the firearms bureau said it carries implications beyond the plight of a San Leandro gun shop. Trader Sports has a history of run-ins with regulators and is a high-profile target of gun-control groups. … 'Trader Sports is one of the worst of the worst,' Daniel Vice, a staff attorney for the pro-gun-control Brady Campaign in Washington, D.C., said Wednesday. He said license revocations are significant because the government issues them so rarely. … The U.S. attorney's office, which is defending the firearms bureau in the lawsuit, said the inspection of Trader Sports in September 2003 found 3,659 firearms on hand, even though store records showed 9,100 guns in inventory. … Cucchiara and the federal inspectors had tried to reconcile the discrepancy and found that an additional 2,036 guns could not be accounted for, bringing the total to 7,477, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lee wrote in a legal filing."

Dallas Gun-Crime Team Wins DOJ Award. The Dallas Business Journal (5/26) reports, "The city of Dallas' criminal prosecution team has received federal laurels for a program that has helped to reduce gun crime involving repeat offenders." The Journal continues, "Gun crimes committed by parolees in Dallas between October 2003 and September 2005 fell by about 45 percent, according to a recent crime study." The Journal adds, "The prosecution team -- which helped plan and implement the program -- was honored with a U. S. Department of Justice Project Safe Neighborhoods Achievement Award for exemplary local training, according to a Justice Department news release. … The community prosecutors, who have offices in seven Dallas neighborhoods, and others in law enforcement created a program that requires probationers and parolees to attend workshops that inform them of the consequences of violating terms of their release, which include not using or possessing firearms. … The Dallas team was nominated for the award by U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper of the Northern District of Texas. The award was presented by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul J. McNulty during a national conference earlier this month."

DOJ_NMG_0029559

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Approves Immigration Reform Bill By 62-36 Margin. The Senate yesterday approved an immigration reform bill supported by the White House that includes a path to citizenship. The margin of victory for the measure was 62-36. Most reports this morning, however, see little chance that a bill with get to President Bush's desk. Instead, many observers predict the upcoming negotiations with the House to come up with a compromise bill will end in failure. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Havemann), for example, says the task of reconciling the House and Senate bills "may prove impossible." Similarly, the New York Times (5/26, Swarns) says "Republican leaders acknowledged that delivering a final bill to President Bush's desk would be enormously difficult." Another New York Times story (5/26, Rutenberg) also concludes that "all indications are that once the negotiators…will hit a wall." The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer), meanwhile, reported Senate and House negotiators "will now try to work out the differences between their two versions, and it's not at all clear that they will succeed."

Still, says the Los Angeles Times (5/26, Gauette), "passage of the Senate bill represents a victory for Bush, who began a push for a broad overhaul of immigration policy with a speech in January 2004. His proposals sparked an extended debate about border security, the role of immigrants in American life and how best to deal with the estimated 12 million people who are in the country illegally."

Bush's continued involvement in the process is seen as crucial to any chances for a House-Senate deal. The Washington Post (5/26, A1, Babington) reports "Democrats and Republicans alike said a House-Senate accord will be nearly impossible without the vigorous involvement of President Bush, who favors an approach similar to the Senate's." The White House "has already begun lobbying efforts, but it faces resistance from more than 200 House Republicans seeking reelection this fall, many in districts where the sentiment against illegal immigrants runs high." Knight Ridder (5/26, Montgomery) says "backers of the bipartisan Senate plan…acknowledge that the president is weakened by declining polls and his growing lame-duck status." Knight Ridder also runs a statement by Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer urging Bush to push for compromise, "After tonight, whether this bipartisan balance still survives or not really rests in the hands of the man at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue." USA Today (5/26, Kiely) runs a similar Schumer statement, "The ball is in the president's court."

ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 3, 2:10, Stephanopoulos) reported, "It's a rare sight in this Senate. Republicans and Democrats, together, declaring victory." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "This is a success for the American people. It is success for people who hope and participate -- hope to participate someday in that American dream." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid: "I am so proud of the Senate. This is the way that we should legislate: In a bipartisan basis." Stephanopoulos: "Now comes the hard part. The immigration proposals passed by the Senate today and the house last December are at odds on matters of core principle and hard politics," and "House leaders insist they won't budge on any measure that makes illegal immigrants citizens." The Senate "does have the White House on its side." White House press secretary Tony Snow: "The people who, at the end of this process, stand up and take the oath, will have spent more money and waited longer than any group in American history for the right to become American citizens."

NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 4, 2:10, Brown) reported, "The Senate bill includes beefed-up border security, including 6,000 National Guard troops, a guest worker program requested by the President, and, most controversial of all, a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the US supporters call that earned citizenship, noting that illegal immigrants would have to pay backs taxes and a fine, work for at least six years and learn US history and English, which the bill declares the national language." But "many House Republicans vigorously oppose both the guest worker program and citizenship for illegal immigrants, which they call amnesty."

The Washington Times (5/26, Dinan) reports the White House "yesterday predicted that the chamber's Republicans will give in." White House press secretary Tony Snow "said House Republicans will want to pass border security badly enough to back down from the fight against what many consider amnesty for illegal aliens, knowing there is a 'heavier political price for failing to act, than for acting.'" Said Snow, "If you are a Republican member of Congress and you're concerned about illegal immigration, do you really want to say to your constituents: You know, I'm going to wait a couple of years before I take up the issue of people knowingly hiring illegal aliens, I want to wait a couple of years before I go ahead and try to identify who the illegal aliens are, I want to wait a couple of years before I start grappling with what to do with these 11 or 12 million people who are here illegally.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029560

Also offering a hopeful outlook for the upcoming talks, the Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Chaddock) says "GOP leaders are hopeful that threshold can be met, he adds. 'This will be a difficult conference, but the Speaker believes we can get to a balanced bill that will put border security first.'" This week, Bush's "top political adviser, Karl Rove, made his second trip to Capitol Hill to boost prospects for a compromise. While several Republicans who spoke with the press after the closed meeting said they were not convinced, others are signaling they may be interested in helping to broker a deal."

The AP (5/26, Espo) reports the House bill, "which passed on a largely party-line vote last year, is generally limited to border enforcement. It would make all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and it contains no provision for either a new temporary worker program or citizenship for men, women and children in the country unlawfully." In contrast, the Senate bill "would mark the most far-reaching changes in immigration law in two decades."

Fox News' Special Report (5/25, Hume) reported, "The stage is set tonight for a crucial and potentially contentious negotiation over immigration reform." Fox (Garrett) called the measure is "the most ambitious and politically perilous reform of immigration laws in at least 20 years."

The Chicago Tribune (5/26, James) calls the legislation's future "uncertain, especially in an election year. … House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) issued a non-committal statement that didn't even acknowledge that the Senate bill had any acceptable provisions and instead espoused the immigration priorities sought by the House majority in passing its measure in December." Boehner also "urged House Democrats to stop advocating 'troubling policies that encourage open borders and invite more illegal immigrants into our country' and to join House Republicans in making US borders more secure."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Kronholz, Lueck) reports, "Business lobbyists also hope to use the conference to boost the guest-worker program to 325,000 workers yearly from the 200,000 the bill now allows, and permit the number to rise further to meet labor-market demands." But "the House and Senate bills are so vastly different that there may be little room for compromise, and even less for measures that could be seen as improving the prospects of immigrants."

The Washington Times (5/26, Hurt) headlines its story "Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens," and describes the bill as one that "allows 10 million illegal aliens to become citizens, doubles the flow of legal immigration each year and will cost U.S. taxpayers an estimated $54 billion over the next 10 years." On the other hand, the Washington Post (5/26, A8, Goldstein) says "advocates of expanded immigration rights complain that 'hidden traps' woven through the bill's 300 pages erode significant due-process protections for all foreign-born people living in the United States. A coalition of civil rights, religious and legal groups says the legislation would make it easier for the government to detain or deport immigrants -- whether in the country legally or not -- while making it more difficult for them to prove they deserve asylum or naturalization." The Post adds, "One provision would add to the list of acts considered 'aggravated felonies' under immigration law -- automatic grounds for removal from the country. The rewritten list would include carrying fraudulent documents."

Ombudsman Says CIS Could Handle Guest Worker Program With Enough Funding, Time. The AP (5/26) reports CIS Ombudsman Prakash I. Khatri said yesterday that the agency could "definitely" handle a guest worker program that would provide illegal immigrants with a path to citizenship, as called for under the Senate's immigration bill, but that the "key" would be "funding and time allocated under the law." If such a program emerges from the Senate's compromise talks with the House, it "would greatly increase the workload of an agency already facing a backlog that has left some immigrants waiting years for citizenship or the 'green cards' that provide permanent residence status. US Citizenship and Immigration Services would need to hire and train more staff and require facilities to process the millions of applications expected, Khatri said."

Border Patrol Poised For "Unprecedented" Expansion. USA Today (5/26, Hall) reports the "482 students on this remote campus" at Artesia, New Mexico "are Border Patrol agents-in-training undergoing a rigorous, 19-week course. The Border Patrol Academy prepares men and women to join the rapidly swelling ranks of the agency that polices the nation's porous borders." The number of Border Patrol agents "has been growing since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and the grounds here reflect that. A new academic building with nine 50-seat classrooms has just been completed; a $14 million, 50,000-square-foot addition to the gym is under construction; and new dorms are on the way." The academy's "going to need the extra space. After three years of steady growth, the Border Patrol is about to embark on an unprecedented expansion. If Congress approves President Bush's request for 6,000 new agents over the next 21/2 years, the patrol will have 18,000 agents on the nation's 5,000 miles of border with Mexico and Canada. That would double the number of agents since 9/11 raised new concerns about terrorists' ability to slip into the country across land borders."

Border Patrol Warns Desert Crossing Death Toll To Rise. The Washington Times (5/26, Seper) reports the US Border Patrol "says an increase in the number of people who die trying to cross the desert to enter the United States illegally is expected as summer temperatures rise, and efforts are being made to ask the Mexican media to warn would-be crossers of the dangers involved." Last year, "473 persons died on the Southwest border -- a record number of deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0029561

Since Oct. 1, the Border Patrol reported 210 deaths -- 43 more than the same period a year ago. The western desert of Arizona accounted for more than 56 percent of the total number of deaths."

Fox Gets Mixed Reception At California Legislature. The New York Times (5/26, Broder) reports that in an "echo of the debate on immigration under way in Washington, the California Legislature gave visiting President Vicente Fox of Mexico a two-edged welcome on Thursday." Democratic and Latino members, "including the Assembly speaker, Fabian Núñez, embraced Mr. Fox, while some Republicans boycotted his evening address to a joint session of the Legislature. Other Republicans attended the speech, but wore yellow buttons reading 'No mas!' to protest Mr. Fox's support for liberalizing American policies on immigration."

US To Deport 15 Undocumented Aliens Captured In Hanover County. The Washington Times (5/26, McLaughlin) reports the US Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency "is preparing to deport 15 illegal aliens from Mexico and Guatemala who were arrested Tuesday in Hanover County after the speeding van they were in was stopped by police." ICE spokeswoman Ernestine Fobbs said, "They were issued notices to appear before an immigration judge and more than likely will be removed from the United States."

Mexico's Failure To Improve Its Economy Criticized. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (5/26), Joel Kurtzman and Glenn Yago of the Milken Institute say, "The problem with the debate on immigration is that it has so far looked at just one side -- ours. Somehow, for political or other reasons, Mexico has escaped scrutiny. And yet we are suffering for Mexico's myriad of economic sins. Our part in creating the immigration mess is that we built a society filled with opportunities but surrounded it with a porous border. Mexico's part is that it has failed to produce enough growth, despite massive wealth. The solution is to open the borders even wider -- but open up Mexico, too. If Mexicans can come here, let our capital and ingenuity invest there freely. President Fox, tear down that investment-restriction wall!" The "only way for Mexico to reduce the number of workers it sends to the U.S. is to transform itself into a jobs-producing, high-opportunity economy. The way to begin would be to allow unfettered U.S. investment."

Dionne Says Proponents Of "Liberal" Immigration Policy Need To Address Costs. In his Washington Post column (5/26, A21), EJ Dionne says, "But advocates of a more liberal policy toward illegal immigrants need to take seriously the discontent that the anti-immigration movement has tapped into. Immigration has been a blessing to the United States, but it is not an unmixed blessing, and the costs of our immigration policies are borne more heavily by some parts of our society than others. Rather than dismiss all immigration critics as xenophobes, supporters of immigrant rights need to deal with the legitimate gripes of their opponents." The "most basic (and perhaps the simplest to deal with) is that immigrants cost local governments money even as they fill federal coffers with income, especially from payroll taxes." A National Academy of Sciences study "found that the average immigrant puts a net lifetime fiscal cost of $25,000 on state and local governments." But "less straightforward but still important are the effects of illegal immigration on the wages and working conditions of our fellow citizens at the bottom of the income structure."

Ivins Says Enforcement Approach To Immigration Reform Is Racist. In her syndicated column, which was run in the Chicago Tribune (5/26), Molly Ivins criticizes immigration reforms aimed at boosting enforcement, saying, "By all means, reform immigration with this deep obeisance to the Republican right-wing nut faction and their open contempt for 'foreigners.' But do not pretend for one minute that it is not a craven political bow to racism (Yes, racism--I am actually calling them racists, although they pretend it hurts their feelings. Try reading their Web sites and see for yourself), and to nativism, to xenophobia and to Know-Nothingism. Just don't forget what you are throwing away in the process."

TAX:

Treasury Ends Phone Tax. USA Today (5/26, Davidson) reports, "The Treasury Department said Thursday that it will no longer collect a 3% federal excise tax on long-distance calls and would refund about $15 billion to taxpayers." The tax "was imposed in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War. It was designed as a tax on wealthy Americans, back when phone service was considered a luxury."

The New York Times (5/26, Belson) says "the abolition of the tax, effective July 31, will cost the Treasury $5 billion annually in lost revenues in the next few years. With budget deficits soaring, the Treasury had been slow to scrap the tax." But "several federal courts ruled in recent years that it was no longer applicable to customers with unlimited long-distance plans." The Internal Revenue Service "has refunded hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes to companies including OfficeMax and the American Bankers Insurance Group based on the court decisions." The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Matthews) and Washington Post (5/26, D2, Crenshaw) also report the story.

Dow Jones (5/26) reports, "Millions of individuals and businesses that paid the tax will be eligible for refunds, plus interest, for taxes paid on long-distance service billed after Feb. 28, 2003. Tax experts said it may be the broadest case involving elimination of a tax through a legal challenge. …

DOJ_NMG_0029562

Snow summed up the government's capitulation: 'The American taxpayers have been right.'"

MarketWatch (5/26, Bartash) reports, "The Treasury also said the Justice Department would cease litigation in support of the tax after a handful of federal appeals courts ruled the fee illegal in decisions rendered within the past year. The most recent loss in federal court occurred earlier this month. … 'The Federal Appeals courts have spoken across the board,' Treasury Secretary John Snow said in a statement. 'It's time to "disconnect" this tax and put it on the permanent "do not call" list.'" MarketWatch adds, "The tax, which generates more than $6 billion annually, has survived repeated efforts to eliminate it, most recently in 2000, when President Bill Clinton vetoed a larger bill that included a repeal of the excise fee. … Bills aimed at ending the tax have circulated every year since. Businesses call the tax unfair and outdated. Phone companies say it's costly and complex to administer. Consumer-advocacy groups say the flat-rate fee put an undue burden on poorer Americans. Virtually no one in Washington supported the tax."

FBI, IRS Seek Florida Water District Land Transaction Records. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/26, Burdi, 249K) reports, "The FBI and Internal Revenue Service on Thursday went after documents regarding a controversial land deal involving Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti and the South Florida Water Management District. A subpoena for the documents was served on the water management district, Chairman Kevin McCarty confirmed." The Sun-Sentinel notes, "In recent months, Masilotti and his ex-wife, Susan, have come under scrutiny for making more than $1.3 million through a series of complex transactions in Martin County, according to court and land records." McCarty said that "the water management district will turn over all the documents, which could take up to 30 days."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Frist Hopeful Hayden Will Get Confirmation Vote Before Recess. The AP (5/26, Shrader) reports CIA director-nominee Michael Hayden "awaited confirmation from the Senate Thursday evening in a vote that would install the four-star general and veteran of intelligence controversies atop the civilian spy agency." Majority Leader Bill Frist said he "remained hopeful the Senate could take up Hayden's nomination before departing for the Memorial Day recess."

Landrieu Agrees To Lift Hold On Kempthorne Nomination. CQ (5/25, Tollefson) reports Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, D-La., "agreed Thursday to lift her hold on President Bush's nomination of Idaho Governor Dirk Kempthorne to be Interior secretary, setting the stage for a confirmation vote on Friday." Landrieu's decision "came a day after Republican leaders filed for cloture. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said a vote is slated for Friday morning." Landrieu used the Kempthorne nomination "to press her case that Louisiana and other Gulf Coast states should be earning a greater share of royalties from offshore energy production. Landrieu cited 'significant progress' in the attempt to gain more of the royalty revenue and said Kempthorne has demonstrated he will be a 'partner' in helping coastal Louisiana pursue hurricane protection, flood control and coastal restoration aid."

Democrats Put Hold On Schwab Nomination. CQ (5/26, Van Dongen) reports the nomination of Susan Schwab to become the next US trade representative "has run into multiple roadblocks, with Democratic Senators blocking a confirmation vote." Democratic Senator Patrick Leahy (VT) "put a hold on the nomination—which he released Thursday—because of a disagreement with the Bush administration over whether it will enforce a provision in a World Trade Organization (WTO) agreement that would permit US companies to sell low-cost generic drugs to needy nations." Meanwhile Sen. Charles Schumer (D-NY), who "blasted her on the administration's approach to opening market access to China," has "not released a second hold" on Schwab's confirmation, CQ notes.

Senate Clears Way For Vote On Kavanaugh Nomination. The AP (5/26, Kellman) reports the Senate "cleared the way Thursday for the confirmation of White House aide Brett Kavanaugh to a federal appeals court judgeship, over Democratic complaints that he is unseasoned and partisan. By 67-30, senators approved a confirmation vote, set for Friday." Democrats, however," complained that Kavanaugh has a long record of loyalty to President Bush and too short a record in the courtroom. They highlighted the American Bar Association's recent downgrading of its rating of Kavanaugh from 'highly qualified' to qualified."

CQ (5/25, Perine) reports Kavanaugh "is all but certain to be confirmed Friday for a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit." With Kavanaugh's confirmation "now in the bag, conservative activists are clamoring for Frist to pick a fight with Democrats over several of Bush's other, more contentious nominees. So far, Frist is keeping mum about his intentions, other than to say he plans to call up the other appellate court nominees pending on the Senate calendar before the end of the 109th Congress." The nominations "of William G. Myers III to the 9th Circuit and Terrence W. Boyle to the 4th Circuit have both been on the calendar since last year. But Frist declined Thursday to say when he would move on those nominations."

DOJ_NMG_0029563

The New York Times (5/26, Stolberg) reports Democrats "said Mr. Kavanaugh, who was on the staff of Kenneth W. Starr, the independent counsel who investigated President Bill Clinton, was too partisan and lacked the experience for the appellate bench. But the senators were unwilling to block the nomination using a filibuster. That tactic could have prompted Republicans to respond with the so-called nuclear option, a rules change permanently barring judicial filibusters."

Tony Snow Seen As Improving Press Relations While Delivering Less Information. Newsweek (5/25, Wolffe, Bailey) reported, "After more than two weeks inside the West Wing," incoming press secretary Tony Snow "has pulled off the unusual coup of improving relations with the press corps while offering, at times, less information than" his predecessor, Scott McClellan. He has also "managed to win widespread forgiveness for a series of foreign-policy fumbles that would have landed McClellan in deep trouble." Indeed, "there's been a lot of smiling and plenty of jokes and laughter during the first two weeks of Snow's tenure as Bush's new press guy. The atmosphere in the briefing room, which only weeks ago seemed poisonous beyond repair, now seems relaxed and different enough to compensate for the fact that reporters don't seem to be getting any more straightforward answers than before." It's "not unreasonable to think that Snow can and should only stick to the facts that he knows. But it's interesting to see how Snow has offered noncomments on issues where he should be fully up to speed. In some cases, Snow has been even less forthcoming than McClellan about what Bush and his advisers are doing."

Snow To Leave Treasury In June. NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 7, 0:20, Brown) reported, "CNBC chief Washington correspondent John Harwood reports tonight that Treasury Secretary John Snow will likely leave his job by the middle of next month. Harwood says the Bush Administration has honed in on a successor to Snow that we don't know who that is yet. And Snow will depart either before or after a G8 finance minister's meeting which begins June 9th."

The Washington Post (5/26, A5, Baker, Blustein) says Snow has already "informed the White House that he will resign in the coming days." Snow "asked the White House to announce his resignation in early June and said he plans to stay in the job no later than July 3 while a replacement is sought, the source said." The Post adds, "Republican insiders said possible candidates to succeed Snow include former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans, a longtime Bush friend; Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, a former Kellogg Co. chief executive; Ambassador David C. Mulford, a former treasury undersecretary who represents the United States in India; and Stephen Friedman, the president's former chief economic adviser and a former Goldman Sachs chief executive. Two Republicans said Evans and his wife will accompany the Bushes to Camp David today, although they cautioned against reading too much into that because the two couples often spend holidays together. One of the Republicans said Evans would be willing to take the job if Bush indicates he needs him."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Harwood, Solomon) reports, "Others believed to be potential choices include Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick, though he has discussed leaving the administration in recent days; Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt, who was tarnished by involvement in overseeing the review of potential US ports management by a firm based in the United Arab Emirates; and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, a former deputy Treasury secretary." The Journal adds, "One reason Mr. Snow is believed to have stayed as long as he has is that the White House has had trouble identifying desired replacements. Some prominent Wall Street executives, such as Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson, have rebuffed overtures."

The New York Times (5/26, Andrews) reports Tony Fratto, the Treasury Department's chief spokesman, "refused to comment, saying, 'We don't comment or speculate on personnel issues.'"

Rumsfeld Says Cheney Doesn't Try To "Polish" His Image. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/26) about his relationship with Vice President Dick Cheney. Rumsfeld said, "I used to think of him as a promising young man when I hired him. … I'd just resigned from Congress and went into the cabinet, and I was running the Office of Economic Opportunities. And the thing I found about him when I my made him my deputy, when I was chief of staff of the White House for President Ford, the tougher things got, the better he got. He -- he can take it. And the harder the work got or the more difficult the situation or the more tense something might get, he got stronger and better and more steely with respect to it. He's a very talented fellow." Asked why polls indicate that people have such a negative opinion of him, Rumsfeld said, "He doesn't spend any time trying to make people like him. He really -- he's not running for anything. He's not going to run for president. He is here to advise the President of the United States. He does it. He does it well. The President likes it. The Vice President likes it. And he just doesn't get up every morning and say, 'What can I do to polish my image?' He gets up every morning and says, 'What can we do to make sure there's not another terrorist attack on this country? What can we do today, in the event that that might happen -- how can we prevent it or how can we mitigate it, in the event that it does happen?' And that's his focus, and that's his orientation. And it's to the benefit of the country."

DOJ_NMG_0029564

Nicholson Testifies Before Hostile Congress On VA Data Theft. Veterans Administration Secretary Jim Nicholson testified before Congress yesterday about the theft of the financial records of 26.5 million veterans. Nicholson's remarks that he was "outraged" and "mad as hell" were cited in most coverage. The story was covered by CBS and NBC last night and in the major US newspapers Friday morning.

The CBS Evening News (5/25, story 3, 2:25, Orr) reported, "Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson made not one but two trips to the congressional woodshed. First, he apologized before a House committee." Jim Nicholson, Secretary of Veterans Affairs: "I am the person ultimately responsible to our Veterans." Nicholson "repeated the mea culpa in front of senators." Secretary Nicholson: "I can tell you as a 34-year Veteran myself, I am mad as hell. I'm outraged." Orr: But Nicholson's "apology fell flat." Rep. Bob Filner, California: "You said, 'I take responsibility.' Well, the most dramatic thing you could do to take responsibility is resign." Orr: "Nicholson could not explain why it took two weeks for his own deputy secretary to tell him of the security breach, and he's still struggling, he said, to warn all of the veterans." Its "own inspector general has repeatedly warned the VA its computer system is vulnerable and congressional investigators have given the department an F for computer security in four of the last five years."

NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 10, 1:55, Brown) reported, "There is a $50,000 reward being offered tonight by the Department of Veterans Affairs and the FBI for information that leads to the recovery of stolen computer equipment that contained personal data on more than 26 million veterans. And members of Congress today demanded answers from the man in charge of the VA, who admitted the massive security breach was even worse than previously thought." NBC (Costello) added, "The VA conceded information on the spouses of some deceased Veterans had been included on the laptop files of 26.5 million Vets now in the hands of thieves." Government investigators "said the analyst who improperly took the laptop home had been doing so for three years. For the first time, Secretary Nicholson said that some medical diagnostic information on 2.5 million vets was also on the computer and that Deputy Secretary Gordon Mansfield knew immediately the laptop was stolen on May 3rd yet failed to notify anyone."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/25, Blitzer) reported, "Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson took considerable heat today from Congress over the theft of the personal information of some 26 million military veterans. During hearings in the Senate and the House, at least one lawmaker urged Nicholson to resign. But Nicholson says he too is outraged about the burglary and the fact that he wasn't told about it until nearly three weeks later. Nicholson says the federal government now is offering a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the computer and the hard drive that contained the stolen data."

The New York Times (5/26, Stout) reports, "Nicholson said he believed computer security had lagged at the agency, which he has headed for just over a year, because of past 'embedded cultural resistance' to change." In contrast to most coverage which highlighted lawmakers' anger with Nicholson, the Times says the senators "greeted him warmly and seemed angry not at him but at the bureaucracy of the 235,000-employee veterans agency, which has been criticized by its own inspector general's office several years in a row for inadequate data security." The Times notes, "It seemed possible from exchanges between Mr. Nicholson and members of the committees that the full dimension of the current data breach…might not yet be known."

The AP (5/26, Yen) reports lawmakers "were skeptical" about Nicholson's testimony. Sen. Susan Collins said, "The testimony you gave us is absolutely baffling. … You seem to be saying it was just one employee. But it's not just one employee. You have a high-risk vulnerable system that has been identified time and again as vulnerable." Rep. Bob Filner called for Nicholson to resign, but "White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday that wasn't going to happen." Before Nicholson's testimony Snow said, "I'm sure they will have sharp questions for him. But he's not tendering his resignation."

The Washington Post (5/26, A19, Lee) reports that VA IG George Opfer "said his office did not learn of the lost data until May 10, and then only through an offhand remark by a VA employee at a routine meeting. Nicholson was even further out of the loop; he testified yesterday that his subordinates failed to inform him until May 16 -- nearly two weeks after the theft put millions of veterans at risk of identity theft." Meanwhile, Senate Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Larry Craig "said he believes that the VA data analyst was 'a dedicated federal employee who took work home with the hope of improving VA operations." Craig said the VA, "and not veterans themselves, should cover the cost of the increased credit monitoring made necessary by the loss of the personal data. 'There were many lapses in judgment for which many people are going to have to answer,' Craig said. 'This was not an error that a veteran made. This was an error that the system that provides services to them made.'"

USA Today (5/26, Bazar) reports, "It will cost at least $10 million to inform veterans that their personal information may be in the hands of criminals, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson told Congress on Thursday. He warned that the ultimate price tag of the government's response could be tens of millions more." The VA is also "considering providing veterans with a credit monitoring or counseling service at a free or reduced charge. Taxpayers could be hit for much more. When asked for an estimate, Nicholson tossed out the figure of $100 million -- or more."

DOJ_NMG_0029565

CQ (5/26, Plummer) notes "the lack of assurances and the time it took for Congress and the public to be notified have left voters -- and lawmakers -- raw." House Veterans' Affairs Chairman Steve Buyer, "read a laundry list of investigations since 2000 by the Government Accountability Office, the news media and others that spotlighted shoddy VA policies on protecting information." Buyer said, "Mr. Secretary, this is a defining moment of your leadership."

Veterans Express Outrage Over VA Response To Data Theft. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Neuman) reports that in addition to congressional anger, "more than 100,000 aggrieved veterans sought answers from 14 call centers set up by the Department of Veterans Affairs. They also took their complaints to the airwaves and the Internet, where one Vietnam vet set up an online petition urging Nicholson to quit." In an e-mail statement VFW national commander James Mueller wrote, "Telling 26.5 million veterans to deal with this as individuals is a totally unacceptable response. … We strongly suggest that the federal government start figuring out a way to deal with this problem computer-to-computer between the VA, national credit bureaus and other national institutions."

Expert Warns Spike In SSN Sales May Show Veteran Information Compromised. Although Secretary Nicholson tried to allay concerns that any veteran's information had been compromised, the CBS Evening News (5/25, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "The Veterans Administration has said from the beginning that it has seen no signs so far that the data has been used to defraud Veterans, but our Trish Regan has been conducting her own investigation and she has turned up some very troubling evidence." CBS (Regan) added, "In secret chat rooms like these, cyber thieves buy and sell stolen Social Security numbers, names, and addresses for as little as $5, $10, or $15 apiece." Mike Brown "is the president of CardCops, a company that uses web crawling technology to prevent clients from identity theft. The Veterans' data was stolen three weeks ago. CBS News asked Brown to determine whether there had been an increase in the amount of Social Security numbers for sale on the Internet so far this month. The results, he says, are alarming." Mike Brown, President, CardCops: "There's a very real possibility that this data, which was compromised, has indeed ended up in the wrong hands." Regan: "Since May 1st, the amount Social Security numbers for sale on the web has jumped 158% over average. It's the largest increase the company has ever seen."

Kerry, Harkin Sponsor Bill To Provide Veterans With Credit Monitoring. The Des Moines Register (5/26) reports Sen. John Kerry and Tom Harkin "are pushing to give free credit monitoring to those affected by the loss of highly personal data on 26.5 million U.S. veterans that was stolen in a home burglary." They "are sponsoring legislation that would provide one year of free credit monitoring as well as one free credit report annually for two years after the end of monitoring." Harkin "said the estimated cost of the credit protection is $1.25 billion though 'we don't think it will cost that much.' He said the bill could be approved by the Senate yet this week." Harkin "said he was not ready to call for Nicholson's resignation. 'I don't want to hang someone before the trial,' he said."

Edwards Calls For Congressional Probe Of VA Data Theft. The AP (5/26) reports, "Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said Thursday that a full congressional investigation into the theft of millions of veterans records is necessary and that Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson should be held responsible. Nicholson's role in the lost records should be investigated because his future "depends on the degree of his involvement," Edwards said." He "said a full congressional investigation is needed because it's unclear what actually happened."

Lawmakers Seek To Provide More Benefits To Veterans. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Knickerbocker) reports that "for the first time in a generation, Memorial Days are coming during prolonged armed conflict. That has strengthened ties between civilians and soldiers, bringing a marked change in the way people will observe the holiday this year." Lawmakers "are pushing for better veterans' services, including healthcare for the living and survivors' benefits for those who've lost loved ones. Many states are now providing free tuition at public colleges and universities for the children of those killed in war zones." And "unlike in the Vietnam era, declining support for the war has not eroded backing for the troops, say many of those taking part in Memorial Day ceremonies." The Monitor notes, "More family men and women in the war zone also means more dependents to care for in the wake of combat casualties. The 2,404 men and 55 women killed in Iraq have left an estimated 1,700 children without their parent." And recently lawmakers "heard testimony on the estimated 200,000 homeless veterans. 'In the battlefield of life, they are wounded, and we cannot leave them behind,' said Rep. Bob Filner."

Families Of Iraq Casualties Cope With Grief On Memorial Day. USA Today (5/26, A1, Hampson) in a front page story describes how the families of Air Force captains Derek Argel and Jeremy Fresques, members of the Air Force's Special Tactics unit, are coping after they were killed when their plane crashed in Iraq reporting that "three years of war have revived the holiday's original meaning. Today, for the families of two young Air Force officers, the gateway to summer will become a portal to grief." And while most Americans celebrate Memorial Day with recreational activities, "for the friends and relatives of Jeremy and Derek, Memorial Day will be no picnic."

DOJ_NMG_0029566

Army Chaplain Urges Public To Remember Sacrifices Of Veterans. U.S. Army chaplain Capt. James Key in an op-ed in USA Today (5/26) writes "This year, as we celebrate Memorial Day, we should pause as a nation from talk about high gas prices, what language our national anthem should be sung in and the latest celebrity gossip, and instead think about the men and women who continue to fight and die in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan. It is true: War is hell, freedom is expensive, death is painful and faith still matters -- especially to those in the foxhole."

WSJournal Criticizes Media Portrayal Of Veterans. The Wall Street Journal (5/26, W11) in an op-ed in its "Taste" section writes "It's a sign of some progress that the men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan are not spit upon and shunned as Vietnam vets were. Yet there may be something more pernicious about mouthing 'Support Our Troops' while also asserting that many of them are poor, uneducated dupes who were cannon fodder overseas and have come home as basket cases, plagued by a range of mental, emotional and financial problems. The vast majority of vets don't fit that description." One way to help Veterans is to "give vets and their families the tools to adjust."

GAO Review Criticizes Agency Hiring Practices Under Bush. The Washington Post (5/26, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "An investigation of hiring practices by federal agencies during the first four years of the Bush administration has turned up 18 cases where political appointees apparently schemed to obtain career jobs in the civil service and stay on the public payroll for the long haul. The practice is popularly known as 'burrowing in' and happens in almost every administration." The Post adds, "In addition to political appointees landing jobs over more qualified applicants, investigators said some agencies created jobs for appointees and some agencies allowed appointees to jump ahead of military veterans by ignoring laws that give a hiring preference to veterans. The investigation was conducted by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, between May 2001 and April 2005 at the request of two House Democrats, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Danny K. Davis (Ill.)."

Congress Has Until June 5 To Decide On Air Traffic Controller Pay. The Washington Times (5/26, McCaslin) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Congress has until June 5 to decide whether to raise compensation for air traffic controllers to $187,000 per year from the current $166,000. The controllers have been demanding $200,000-plus, which has "led to an impasse in negotiations that began eight months ago and shifted the matter to Congress to decide, as law requires."

Official Says Smithsonian Locked Into Deal With Showtime. Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence Small yesterday told a House panel that the Smithsonian Institution is locked into a semi-exclusive TV contract with Showtime Networks Inc. for 30 years. The Washington Post (5/26, C1, Trescott) reports, "Filmmakers, historians and members of Congress have criticized the contract, which has never been made public." The Post adds, "Summoned by the House Administration Committee, chaired by Rep. Vernon J. Ehlers (R-Mich.), Smithsonian officials explained how the deal originated and what the new partnership means to scholars and historians seeking access to the Smithsonian's voluminous collections and its experts."

OTHER NEWS:

GDP Up 5.3% In First Quarter. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 9, :20, Vargas) reported, "Economists were encouraged today by the latest report on the US economy. New figures showed gross domestic product, the broadest measure of the economy, grew at a strong rate of 5.3% from January to March. The analysts say that indicates growth without serious inflation."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, Whitehouse) reports the US "was one of the world's fastest-growing advanced economies in the first quarter of 2006. Downbeat data on home sales, however, support economists' expectations that the distinction won't last." The Commerce Department revised its estimate of GDP up to 5.2% "from an initial estimate of 4.8%. The upward revision was smaller than expected, but still made the U.S. the second-fastest-growing economy among advanced members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development that have reported first-quarter data. Greece is in first place, with an annualized growth rate of 8.2%, according to the OECD." But "new data on home sales, however, supported economists' predictions that the economy is likely cooling. The National Association of Realtors reported yesterday that sales of existing, or previously owned, homes fell 2% in April to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.76 million units."

USA Today (5/26, Kirchhoff) reports Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight, said, "The strong first-quarter data may well be the last hurrah of this phase of the current expansion." Behravesh "expects growth to slow to a 3% to 3.5% pace in the second quarter, and 3% in the second half of the year. Behravesh says the report contained some cautionary signs for the Federal Reserve as it debates whether to continue raising its target for short-term interest rates, now at 5%. A measure of core inflation, a gauge of prices that excludes food and energy, rose at a 2% rate. That's at the top of the Fed's comfort level."

DOJ_NMG_0029567

Increase In Adjustable Mortgage Rates Linked To Rise In Defaults. NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 8, 2:20, Brown) reported, "NBC News 'In Depth' tonight, housing on the bubble: A new report on existing home sales showed the markets slowed last month. But another number is making news, mortgage rates. The average rate of a 30-year fixed rate mortgage climbed to 6.62% this week, hitting the highest level in nearly 4 years. The overall increase in mortgage rates is hitting some people, especially those with adjustable rate mortgages, very hard." NBC (Mott) added, "An industry organization says mortgage defaults between January and March of this year were up 72% nationwide over the same period last year. Indianapolis leads the nation with 1 out of every 69 homes in foreclosure, followed closely by Atlanta; Dallas…Memphis and Denver complete the top five. And many experts say it's those popular variable rate loans that are actually helping drive the surge in foreclosures around the country, allowing buyers to purchase more expensive houses than they could otherwise afford."

Stock Markets Rally For Second Day. NBC Nightly News (5/25, story 11, 0:10, Williams) reported, "On Wall Street today, a rally: The Dow gained almost 94 points [to close at 11,211.05]. The Nasdaq was up 29 points on the day [to close at 2,198.24]."

The Wall Street Journal (5/26, McDonald) reports, "Emboldened by just-right readings on the economy, investors gave the Dow Jones Industrial Average a two-day winning streak for its 110th birthday." The "jittery traders cheered a Commerce Department report showing ample economic growth in the first quarter, but not enough to stoke the inflation and interest-rate-increase fears that rattled the markets for two weeks." Still, yesterday's gains "may be a brief respite, with investors scrutinizing each economic data point." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "rose 14.31, or 1.14%, to 1272.88, while the tech-laden Nasdaq Composite Index gained 29.07 or 1.34% to 2198.24. Small stocks posted the biggest gains with the Russell 2000 adding 14.31 points, or 2.01%, to 725.58."

Minority Share Of Second Home Ownership On Increase. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) says in an editorial, "The political left insists that the current economy, however strong, is leaving minorities behind, and that the gains of some have come at the expense of others. But a new study on homeownership by the National Association of Realtors suggests that the benefits of recent economic growth have been more widespread than critics want to admit. We already knew that U.S. homeownership overall is at an all-time high of nearly 70%. The minority homeownership rate of 52% is also unprecedented. Now comes news that minorities are also increasing their share of second-home purchases. According to the Realtor report, minorities accounted 'for 11% of vacation home purchases between 2003 and 2005 in contrast with 6% of purchases in 2002 or earlier. In the investment property segment, minorities accounted for 17% of transactions between 2003 and 2005 compared with 11 percent in 2002 or earlier.'"

Spokane Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Settle Abuse Claims. The New York Times (5/26, Banerjee) reports, "The Roman Catholic Diocese of Spokane, Wash., is selling its headquarters and other property valued at about $11 million as part of its effort to settle claims by victims of sexual abuse by members of the clergy." The Times continues, "The diocese is one of three in the country that have filed for bankruptcy; the others are those in Portland, Ore., and Tucson. … Although the Spokane diocese announced its intention to sell diocesan assets when it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2004, the fact that those assets are now going on the market underscores the financial strain many dioceses face as they address hundreds of millions of dollars in claims by victims of sexual abuse. … 'I think it is symbolically significant,' said the Rev. John J. Coughlin, a Franciscan priest and a law professor at the University of Notre Dame, specializing in civil and canon law. 'The diocese doesn't need the physical building to exist. But the sale shows that the effects of the sex abuse crisis are serious, for this and other dioceses as well.'" The Times notes, "In a report issued in March, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said that in 2005, dioceses in the United States paid $399 million in settlements with victims of sexual abuse and $68 million in legal fees and support programs for victims, a sharp increase from the year before. … The church's total payments resulting from the sexual abuse scandal have surpassed $1 billion, and many dioceses have yet to reach settlements with victims."

Poll Shows Harris Trails Nelson By 32 Points. The AP (5/26, Farrington) reports that FL13 Rep. Katherine Harris (R) "had weak support in a poll released Thursday that includes the three little-known entries in the Republican U.S. Senate primary. Only 37 percent of respondents said they favored Harris, compared to 13 percent for Will McBride, 4 percent for LeRoy Collins Jr. and 2 percent for Peter Monroe. … More respondents -- 43 percent -- didn't choose a candidate." In a head-to-head match-up Florida Sen. Bill Nelson (D), Harris trailed the incumbent 58%-25%. The AP notes, "The poll was conducted by Quinnipiac University May 12-22. It surveyed 1,086 registered voters and had an overall margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The poll surveyed 424 Republican voters about the primary, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4.8 percentage points. 'Given how well known Congresswoman Harris is among Republicans and how well thought of she has been by them, it is somewhat surprising that she would only get 37 percent support,' said Peter Brown, assistant director of the school's polling institute. 'The fact that 63 percent of Republicans say they prefer either the other three or are undecided is remarkable.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029568

Poll Finds Schwarzenegger Approval At 36%. The Wall Street Journal (5/26) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is ditching the "conservative 2005 script and tacks toward center. In campaign, led by former Bush strategists, he criticizes unpopular president on climate change, Medicare and immigration. A new poll by Public Policy Institute of California pegs ex-movie star's approval at 36%, up from 32% six months ago."

Krugman Says Documentary Shows Gore "Sort Of Person" Who Should Run Country. In his New York Times column (5/26), Paul Krugman says, "I won't join the sudden surge of speculation about whether 'An Inconvenient Truth' will make Mr. Gore a presidential contender. But the film does make a powerful case that Mr. Gore is the sort of person who ought to be running the country." But "can the sort of person who would act on global warming get elected? Are we — by which I mean both the public and the press — ready for political leaders who don't pander, who are willing to talk about complicated issues and call for responsible policies? That's a test of national character. I wonder whether we'll pass."

US Envoy To IAEA Says Iran Unlikely To Give Up Nuclear Program. Ambassador Greg Schulte, U.S. representative to the Vienna, Austria-based International Atomic Energy Agency, said Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is unlikely to give up programs that could lead to the development of a nuclear weapon. The Washington Times (5/26, Sands) reports that Schulte said, "We shouldn't fool ourselves. The president of Iran is not someone who is swayed by normal diplomatic demarches." But Schulte "said that there also were divisions within Iran's ruling Islamic regime over Tehran's nuclear confrontation, and that the United States and its allies must give Iran a clear path to back down."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Peterson) reports that "the UN's permanent five powers and Germany this week worked to hammer out a package of incentives and threats they hope will ensure the Islamic Republic's nuclear program is limited to peaceful purposes. On the table: giving Iran nuclear reactors and providing fuel for energy production, as well as economic and security incentives. In exchange, Iran would have to give up uranium enrichment - a step that can lead to weapons production - or face UN sanctions or even an arms embargo. … Senior diplomats from those nations and the US reported "progress" during talks in London on Wednesday, but no agreement."

Attack On Iran Could Trigger Hizbullah Clash With Israel. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Blanford) reports that an "alarming scenario gaining attention is if Iran's nuclear facilities come under attack by the US or Israel, it could inadvertently trigger a violent confrontation between Lebanon's Hizbullah and the Israeli military. Hizbullah this week aired fresh warnings on the extent of its massive rocket arsenal, reinforcing concerns in Israel that it will be targeted as part of Tehran's retaliation to a strike against its nuclear sites."

Krauthammer Warns Against US-Iran Talks. Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (5/26, A21), "All of a sudden, revolutionary Iran has offered direct talks with the United States. All of a sudden, the usual suspects -- European commentators, American liberals, dissident CIA analysts, Madeleine Albright -- are urging the administration to take the bait. … Mark my words. The momentum for U.S.-Iran negotiations has only begun. The focus of the entire Iranian crisis will begin to shift from the question of whether Tehran will stop its nuclear program to whether Washington will sit down alone at the table with Tehran. To this cynical bait-and-switch, there can be no American response other than No. Absolutely not."

Ignatius Calls For Openness With Iran. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (5/26, A21), "We are in the early stages of what the Centcom commander, Gen. John Abizaid, calls 'the first war of globalization, between openness and closed societies.' One key to winning that war, Abizaid told a small group of reporters at the Pentagon yesterday, is to expand openness and connection." In Iran, "America's best strategy is to play to its strengths -- which are the open exchange of ideas, backed up by unmatched military power. The need for connection is especially clear in the case of Iran, which in isolation has remained frozen in revolutionary zealotry like an exotic fruit in aspic. Yet some in the Bush administration cling to the idea that isolation is a good thing and that connectivity will somehow weaken the West's position. … Openness isn't a concession by America, it's a strategic weapon."

Abbas Threatens Hamas With Referendum On Recognizing Israel. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas issued what Knight Ridder (5/26, Nissenbaum) calls "a surprise ultimatum to his Hamas rivals on Thursday: Break the political stalemate imperiling the Palestinian government within 10 days or he'll ask voters to approve a measure that would implicitly recognize Israel. Hamas officials appeared caught off-guard by Abbas' threat to hold a referendum in July. Some leaders voiced optimism that they would be able to work out their differences, while others criticized Abbas for trying to bully them."

DOJ_NMG_0029569

The Washington Post (5/26, A14, Wilson) reports that Abbas gave Hamas leaders "10 days to accept a two-state solution to the conflict with Israel, something the group has rejected since its founding nearly two decades ago."

The AP (5/26, Daraghmeh) calls Abbas' announcement "a bold initiative," and says the "political gamble that could either help resolve the Palestinians' internal deadlock or lead the Hamas-led government and Fatah into a deeper crisis." USA Today carries the AP story this morning.

The New York Times (5/26, Myre) says Abbas "seems to be gambling that he can force his Fatah party, Hamas and some smaller factions to agree on a broad framework for dealing with Israel, which Hamas now refuses to recognize. But he runs the risk of provoking a political showdown at a moment when the Palestinians are already plagued by infighting and a worsening financial crisis."

The Washington Times (5/26, Mitnick) says that by issuing the "surprise declaration," Abbas has "gambled his little remaining political capital." The Times also notes that Hamas politicians "went on the defensive after Mr. Abbas' challenge. Some predicted a Fatah-Hamas agreement that would make a referendum unnecessary; others said the Islamic militants don't oppose the idea of a national referendum as long as the two sides reach agreement on the ground rules."

WPost Says Bush Has Given De Facto Consent For "Unilateral Realignment" Of Israel's Borders. An editorial in the Washington Post (5/26, A20) says, "Though they paid lip service to continued Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, President Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in effect inaugurated an entirely different process at their White House meeting Tuesday -- one in which Israel will parley with the United States about the new borders it intends to draw for itself. … Mr. Olmert has now won Mr. Bush's de facto consent to pursue a unilateral 'realignment,' in which Israel would draw a border of its own choosing in the West Bank, dismantle some of the settlements that lie beyond it and thereby 'guarantee Israel's security as a Jewish state with the borders it desires,' as the prime minister put it." The Post adds, "Mr. Bush said Tuesday that an Israeli-Palestinian peace 'will only be achieved on the basis of mutually agreed changes, and no party should prejudice the outcome of negotiations.' As his administration plunges into what will probably be months of detailed discussions with Israel about the realignment plan, it will be imperative to defend those principles."

Bush, Canadian PM To Meet In July. Bloomberg (5/26, Argitis) reports that Canada's Ambassador to the US, Michael Wilson, announced yesterday that Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Hayes "will meet with U.S. President George W. Bush on July 6 in a bid to cement improving relations between the two countries. … This would be Harper's first meeting with Bush since March, when he met with the U.S. president and Mexican President Vicente Fox at a trilateral meeting in Cancun."

Harper Refuses To Speak To Canadian National Press. The Los Angeles Times (5/26, Farley) reports that Harper "has declared he won't talk to the national media because they are biased against him, his latest move in a spat with the Parliament's press corps. After reporters walked out of a news conference this week when he refused to answer any questions, Harper said no Liberal prime minister had faced such effrontery, and he had decided to deal only with more friendly local press."

Putin Takes Issue With Cheney Comments. The AP (5/26, Isachenkov) reports that President Vladimir Putin yesterday "objected vigorously to Vice President Dick Cheney's recent criticism of democratic backtracking by the Kremlin. 'We see how the United States defends its interests, we see what methods and means they use for this,' Putin said at a news conference following a summit meeting of Russia and the European Union in his most direct criticism of Cheney's remarks." The AP adds, "The growing rift with Washington threatens to mar the summit of the Group of Eight leading industrialized nations in St. Petersburg in July."

Putin's United Russia Party Growing Quickly. The Washington Times (5/26, Mainville) reports that Putin's United Russia Party "is growing twice as quickly as the Communist Party under the Bolsheviks. And like the Communist Party of the past century, it has become the surest path to success in Russian society. … More than two-thirds of the country's federal and regional parliamentarians, and 70 of 89 regional governors are members of United Russia. Thousands of civil servants, celebrities and leading business people have joined in recent years as the party has grown into a dominant force in national and local politics. … Supporters say United Russia's success is proof of democracy in action in Russia."

Russian Ministry Urges Review Of Foreign Oil Deals. The Financial Times (5/26, Ostrovsky) reports, "Russia's natural resources ministry called on Thursday for a review of the two largest foreign oil projects in the country, even as senior Russian officials sought to assure EU leaders that Russia was a reliable energy partner. … Any review of PSAs would threaten the two largest foreign investments in Russia: the Sakhalin-1 project, on which ExxonMobil and its partners have already spent nearly $5bn; and the Sakhalin-2 project, in which Royal Dutch Shell and its partners are investing $20bn. However, two Russian ministers insisted separately that all Moscow's agreements with foreign energy companies would be honoured, suggesting a rift had opened within the government."

DOJ_NMG_0029570

Australian Troops Land In East Timor. Several Australian commandos landed in East Timor yesterday in an effort to quell escalating fighting in an ethnic dispute. The New York Times (5/26, Perlez) reports, "Nine people were killed and 27 others were wounded, including two United Nations police advisers, during an attack on the national police headquarters, the United Nations said." The Times adds, "East Timor's foreign minister, José Ramos-Horta, appealed for the outside help to disarm 'renegade troops and police rebelling against the state.'"

The Washington Post (5/26, A14, Sipress, Lynch) reports, "The violence jeopardized attempts by the government to assert control and represented a major setback for the United Nations, which had cited East Timor's independence in 2002 as one of the organization's greatest achievements of the past decade."

Sudan Agrees To Permit UN To Assess Darfur For Peacekeeping Force. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 7, :20, Vargas) reported, "A new step, today, toward ending the crisis in the Darfur region of Sudan, where fighting has left 200,000 people dead, and 2 million homeless. Sudan has agreed to let a United Nations team visit Darfur to assess what is needed to support a deployment of UN peacekeepers there."

Group Says Sudanese Raiders Killed Over 100 People In Chad. Human Rights Watch yesterday reported that Sudanese raiders have killed more than 100 villagers in Chad and the violence in Darfur may be spreading. The New York Times/AP (5/26) reports, "Survivors told Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group, that the massacre was carried out last month by the janjaweed, an Arab militia that Sudan has been accused of unleashing on African villages where Darfur rebels might find support. … Human Rights Watch, quoting witnesses, said 118 people were killed in four neighboring villages."

Militias Battle In Deadliest Mogadishu Fighting In 14 Years. The Washington Post (5/26, A15, Maliti) reports, "Islamic and secular militias battled in Somalia's capital Thursday, the most widespread and some of the deadliest fighting in Mogadishu in 14 years. Dozens of people were killed and thousands fled their homes on foot." The Post adds, "The fight for control of Mogadishu comes despite a May 14 cease-fire agreement. The alliance says the self-appointed Islamic Court leaders, who have their own militias, have links to al-Qaeda, while the Islamic militia accuses the alliance of working for the CIA. U.S. officials decline to confirm any association with the secular militia."

Chavez Using Venezuelan Oil Wealth To Promote Personal Agenda. ABC World News Tonight (5/25, story 8, 2:55, Vargas) reported Venezuela "has the largest proven oil reserves in the Western hemisphere. And it's led by one of President Bush's fiercest critics, Hugo Chavez. Chavez has been using Venezuela's oil windfall to pay for his ambitious agenda at home and abroad." ABC (Sciutto) added, "With a billion dollars a month in state oil profits, President Hugo Chavez is converting cash into political clout. The self-appointed champion of anti-Americanism has publicly labeled President Bush as assassin…and donkey. Chavez is giving significant financial support to like-minded Latin American leaders. And he's signing arms deals with Russia. 'In the past we simply exchanged oil wealth for imported cars from the US, fancy fabrics from France,' [Rafael Quiroz, the former director of the state oil company,] said. 'Superficial things with no value.' Venezuela's wealth has missed the vast majority of its population. Here in Caracas, the city's residents live in deep poverty, in slums like this. Today, Chavez is using oil money to win over the poor." Still, "many Venezuelans we spoke with, especially the wealthier ones, criticize Chavez for extending state control over the economy and wasting oil money simply to boost his profile."

Uribe Likely To Be Reelected. The Christian Science Monitor (5/26, Harman) reports that Colombia's conservative president, Alvaro Uribe "is expected to be reelected here Sunday. Uribe has more than 57 percent support, enough to win elections in the first round, according to the Napoleón Franco Group, a polling firm here. The reason, say observers, is that Colombians feel safer - and better off economically - today."

NYTimes Says Administration Should Support Colombian Court's Independence. An editorial in the New York Times (5/26) says that Colombian President Álvaro Uribe's administration "has twice written bills that restrict the jurisdiction" of Colombia's Constitutional Court, "which is the most important remaining check on the president's power. Mr. Uribe may try again if he is elected to a second term on Sunday. He enjoys the strong backing of Washington, which considers him a counterweight to Hugo Chávez in Venezuela. … While the Bush administration acknowledges in general that Constitutional Court decisions should be respected, it needs to make a strong statement of support for that court's independence, and for paramilitary demobilization under the court's terms. Mr. Uribe should, too, and should abandon his efforts to meddle with the Constitutional Court."

Bush Said To Have Abandoned Pledge To Spread Democracy. Danielle Pletka and Michael Rubin, who are, respectively, vice president for defense and foreign policy and resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, write in the Los Angeles Times (5/26) that the resumption of full US diplomatic relations with Libya "marks an effective end to the Bush doctrine." Since declaring his support for the expansion of freedom around the world, Bush "has watched Egypt abrogate elections, ignored the collapse of the so-called Cedar Revolution in Lebanon and abandoned imprisoned Chinese dissidents; now Washington is mulling a peace treaty with Stalinist North Korea. The rhetoric of democracy, it turns out, comes more easily than its implementation."

DOJ_NMG_0029571

Teacher Says Post-Election Unrest Would Weaken Mexico. Manuel Suarez-Mier, who teaches economics at American University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/26), "On July 2 Mexico will hold the most closely contested presidential election in its history." In recent weeks two of the three main campaigns have jointly pledged to challenge election results in the streets with massive unrest if their candidates don't win. If that happens, Mexico will be thrown into chaos and Mexicans will be the losers." Unrest "could compel the government to annul the poll's results, forcing a new election. This situation would weaken the country's institutions, raise uncertainty and fears of anarchy, with potentially serious financial instability and economic disarray."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Enron's Top Executives Are Convicted Of Fraud."
"Senate Passes Sweeping Bill On Immigration."
"This Gig Is A Real Grind."
"Bush Seals Jefferson's Seized Files."
"Californians See 'Poetic Justice.'"
"Probe Finds Marines Killed Unarmed Iraqi Civilians."

USA Today:
"Financial Firms Attack Child Porn."
"1 War. 2 Deaths. 1 Year Later."
"Feds Cut Off Phone Tax After 108 Years."

New York Times:
"2 Enron Chiefs Are Convicted In Fraud And Conspiracy Trial."
"Military Expected To Report Marines Killed Iraqi Civilians."
"Abbas Says Hamas Must Accept Peace Plan Or Face Referendum."
"To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Files F.BI. Seized In Congress."
"'I Didn't Know' Did Not Sway Houston Jury."
"G.O.P. Draws Line In Border."
"Bush And Blair Concede Errors, But Defend War."

Washington Post:
"Enron Leaders Found Guilty."
"Senate Approves Immigration Bill."
"Bush, Blair Concede Missteps On Iraq."
"Bush Seals Files Seized In FBI Probe Of Jefferson."
"Duncan To Return Abramoff-Tied Funds."
"Head For Beach At Rush Hour? Might Work."

Washington Times:
"Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens."
"Bush, Blair Admit Errors In Iraq War."
"Hastert Slammed For Raid Reaction."
"Gas Costs Don't Slow Memorial Day Travel."
"Abbas Delivers Ultimatum To Hamas."
"Bonds As "Race Victim' Divides Black Fans."

Detroit Free Press:
"30,000 Take GM, Delphi Buyouts."
"Enron Bosses Nailed In Fraud."
"Alert Escalates On Drug Mix: 'Too Many Dying.'"
"Granholm Ready To Replace Doomed Tax."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Home Depot's Board A No-Show For Shareholders."
"Congress Set For Immigration Duel."
"Guilty."
"Health Care For Illegals Shifts With Medicaid Rules."

Houston Chronicle:
"Bottom Line: Guilty."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Enron Verdicts; Verdicts-Former Enron Employees; Senate-Immigration Bill; Congress-FBI Raid; Hastert-Bribery Probe; Bush-Blair Meeting; UN-Darfur Crisis; Venezuela-Oil Wealth; GDP Report; Asthma Treatment; American Idol-Wrong Number.
CBS: Enron Verdicts; Verdicts-Former Enron Employees; VA Data Theft; VA Data Theft-Analysis; Senate-Immigration Bill; Iraq-Marine Investigations; Congress-FBI Raid; Pope Benedict-Poland; RV Nation.
NBC: Enron Verdicts; Verdicts-Former Enron Employees; Bush-Blair Meeting; Senate-Immigration Bill; Iraq-Marine Investigations; Congress-FBI Raid; Treasury Secretary-Resignation Report; Adjustable Rate Mortgages; Amtrak-Power Outage; VA Data Theft; Stock Markets; Climate-Expanding Deserts; Steve Jobs Interview.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate-Immigration Bill; Fox-US Visit; Midwest-Tornadoes; Enron Verdicts.
CBS: Bush, Blair Press Conference; Senate-Immigration Bill; Enron Verdicts.
NPR: Iraq Violence; Bush, Blair Press Conference; New England-Disaster Declarations; Amtrak-Northeast Corridor

DOJ_NMG_0029572

Shutdown; Foreign Stock Markets; Canada-Kyoto Protocol; KY-Mine Explosion; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Delivers commencement address at US Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: PRIME MINISTER TONY BLAIR OF THE UNITED KINGDOM. Highlights: 11 a.m. Speaks on the challenges facing the international community. Gaston Hall, 3rd floor, Georgetown University.

MEMORIAL DAY EVENTS _ Memorial Day-related events. Highlights: 9 p.m. Rolling Thunder candlelight vigil. Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

MUSLIM CONVENTION _ The Universal Muslim Association of America holds its 4th annual convention. Location: Sheraton Premiere Hotel at Tysons Corner, 8661 Leesburg Pike, Vienna.

PENTAGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9 a.m. Army Col. Michael F. Beech, commander of 4th Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division, will brief live from Iraq to give an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

TERRORIST HOAX _ 9 a.m. Scheduled sentencing before U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton for Nabil Wasfi Alkharouf of Ashburn, Va., who pleaded guilty to falsely reporting a future terrorist attack as a hoax. Location: U.S. District Court, Alexandria.

TURKMENISTAN _ 9 a.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty holds a briefing on Turkemnistan, with Farid Tuhbatullin of Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights and Vitaly Ponomarev of the Memorial Human Rights Centrer in Moscow. Location: 4th floor conference room, 1201 Connecticut Ave. NW.

PURPLE HEART STAMP _ 10 a.m. US Postal Service reissues Purple Heart stamp. Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson, Postmaster General John Potter will attend. Location: Women in Military Service Memorial, Arlington, Va.

SENSENBRENNER-IMMIGRATION _ 10 a.m. Rep. James Sensenbrenner Jr., R-Wis., House Judiciary Committee chairman, holds a press conference on immigration. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn House Office Building.

IMMIGRATION _ 1 p.m. The National Immigration Forum holds a telephone news conference on immigration from from the perspective of key advocacy organizations for business, labor, ethnic, religious and immigrant constituencies. Contacts: Douglas Rivlin, 202-347-0040 ext 5989. Notes: Dial: 1-800-811-8824, Confirmation Code: 2437631. For international callers: 913-981-4903.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, May 26, 2006 8:33 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, May 26, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060526.pdf; dojclips060526.doc

The Attorney General's News Briefing and Department of Justice News Clips will not be published on Monday, May 29, in observance of Memorial Day.

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MAY 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Secrets Claims In NSA Case May Stop Suits (WSJ) 4
National Security Is A Video Game For Politicians (WSJ) 6
Editorial: Bush Team Indifferent To Press Freedom Issues (CCCT) 7
Derrick Z. Jackson Op-Ed: AG Doesn't Grasp Notion Of Free Press (SEAPI) 8
Watch What You Read These Days (ODESAMER) 9
EDITORIAL A Total Disappointment (AAS) 9
Court Hears Appeal Of `Virginia Jihad' Cases (FINDLAW/AP) 10

Homeland Response:

House Struggles To Plug Security Gaps (AP-Y2) 11
Bush Says U.S. Learning Lessons Of Katrina (AP) 12
Senate Panel Approves FEMA Nominee (AP) 12
Despite Panel Approval, Senator Stalls FEMA Nominee (AP) 12
Fixing FEMA (WT) 13
Congress Increases Effort To Bolster Flood Insurance (WSJ) 14

War News:

Bush And Blair Acknowledge Iraq 'Setbacks' (AP) 15
Bush, Blair Concede Missteps On Iraq (WP) 15
Blair And Bush Are Duo Even In Descent (WP) 17
Bush And Blair Concede Errors, But Defend War (NYT) 18
No Quick Troop Reduction In Iraq, Allies Warn (USAT) 20
Covering A Friend's Back: Leaders Reverse The Roles (NYT) 20
Bush And Blair Admit To Missteps In Iraq (FT) 21
Britain's Blair To Rally World Support For Iraq (AFP-Y2) 22
Bush, Blair Admit Errors In Iraq War (WT) 23
Bush Says Early Iraq Troop Cuts Unlikely (LAT) 24
Inside Politics (WT) 26
Standing By Stand-Up Iraqis (NYT) 27
Military Expected To Report Marines Killed Iraqi Civilians (NYT) 29
Probe Finds Marines Killed Unarmed Iraqi Civilians (LAT) 30
General To Teach Rules Of War (WT) 31
Marine Corps To Probe Iraq Civilian Deaths (AP) 32
Top Marine General To Stress Corps' Values On Trip To Iraq (KRT) 33
Top Marine Visits Iraq As Probe Of Deaths Widens (WP) 34
Afghanistan's Leader Visits Civilians Wounded In American Bombing (NYT) 35
Inside The Ring (WT) 36

DOJ:

Local Hero Receives Courage Award (WTEN-TV) 38

Corporate Scandals:

Reversal Could Be Long Shot, Legal Experts Say (WSJ) 38
Lay, Skilling Found Guilty (USAT) 39
Skilling And Lay Convicted Of Enron Conspiracy (FT) 40
Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Case (WT/AP) 41
Enron Executives Guilty On Most Counts (LAT) 42
Enron Leaders Found Guilty (WP) 43
Two Enron Chiefs Are Convicted In Fraud And Conspiracy Trial (NYT) 45
Ignorance Claim Did Not Sway Enron Jury (NYT) 48
Defendants Sunk By Their Testimony (WP) 50
Several Factors Influence Sentences (USAT) 52
Enron's Impact On The Corner Office (CSM) 52
Verdict On An Era: Arrogance And Recklessness At Enron (NYT) 54
Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (AP) 55
Enron Jurors Find Lay, Skilling Guilty (HC) 57
SLICK EXECS TAKEN DOWN (NYPOST) 59
Lay, Skilling Convicted Of Fraud That Doomed Enron (Update9) (BLOOM) 61
Lay And Skilling's Day Of Reckoning (CNNM) 64
Jurors: Ex-Enron Execs Not Credible (USAT) 66

Trial Fails To Answer Many Questions About Spectacular Collapse (WSJ) 68
White-Collar Crime's New Milestone (WP) 69
Lay, Skilling May Have Paved Their Way To Prison (AP) 71
Enron Trial May Encourage Businesses To Adopt Low-risk Strategies (KRT) 72
Symbol Of An Era Lay, Skilling Are Convicted Of Fraud (WSJ) 74
Enron Pair Found Guilty (TIMES) 77
Legal Observers Divided On Odds Of Successful Appeal In Enron Case (LAW) 78
Justice Department, White House React To Verdict (HC) 80
Guilty Verdict Will Embolden Prosecutors (FT) 81
Guilty Verdicts Provide 'Red Meat' To Prosecutors Chasing Companies (WSJ) 82
Enron Task Force Had Rocky Path To Big Victory (WSJ) 84
Enron Convictions Solidifies Corporate America's Reform Movement (KRT) 85
Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (CHIT) 86
For Ex-Enron Employees, Verdict Is Personal (HC) 88
From The Ex-Employees: Revenge, Shock, Sadness (WP) .. 89
Many Who Lost Savings, Jobs Pleased (USAT) 90
Schwarzenegger Strategists Gain Confidence (WSJ) 91
Kenny Boy, Meet Brownie (NSWK) 92
Once A Friend And Ally, Now A Distant Memory (WP) 93
U.K. Banker Fighting Extradition Calls Enron Case `Terrifying' (BLOOM) 93
Wives, Ex-wives Faced Trials Of Their Own (USAT) 94
Books, Film, Memorabilia Not Drawing Attention (USAT) 95
The Enron Verdicts . . . (WSJ) 96
And Justice For All (NYT) 97
Not Just Bad Apples (WP) 97
Enron's End Game (USAT) 98
Convictions Drive Home The Point Again (WP) 98
Masters Of The Universe, Unite! (NYT) 99
Editorial: Enron Fraud: Guilty As Charged (SEAPI) 100
Fannie Mae Board Reverses; CEO Mudd Won't Head Probe (DOW) 101
. . . And The Beltway Version (WSJ) 103
House Committee Holds Heated Session On Corporate Execs' Pay Packages (LAW/AP) 104
Former Wal-Mart Exec Faces Fraud Sentence Aug. 11 (FINDLAW/AP) 105
$363M Is Average Pay For Top Hedge Fund Managers (USAT) 106
Charity Invites Donors To 'Kick The Tires' And Squeeze The Cash Register (NYT) 106

Criminal Law:

Bush Orders FBI-Congress Documents Sealed (AP-Y2) 108
Bush Puts Jefferson Documents On Ice Amid Heated Debate (LAT) 109
Bush Seals Files Seized In FBI Probe Of Jefferson (WP) 111
To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Seized Files (NYT) 113
Bush Seals Documents In Bribery Probe (CHIT) 114
Bush Seeks To Defuse Conflict With House Over Seized Documents (KRT) 116
Bush Seals FBI-seized Files In Bribery Probe (WT) 117
Bush Intervenes In Constitutional Battle Over Congress Raid (AFP-Y2) 117
Bush Orders House Documents Sealed (MRKTWTCH) 118
Bush Orders Evidence Seized From Congressional Office Sealed (BLOOM) 119
Lawmaker Raid May Come Back To Bite Bush (WSJ) 120
Hastert Slammed For Raid Reaction (WT) 121
Analysis: Congress-FBI Flap May Irk Voters (AP-Y2) 122
Fallout From Jefferson Case May Hurt His Party (USAT) 124
There's A Right Way (USAT) 125
Cash-in-Freezer Probe A Hot Topic In New Orleans (LAT) .. 125
G-Men Vs. Members Of The House (LAT) 127
One Man's Constitutional Crisis ... (NYT) 128
Lawmakers, Quiet On Your Rights, Roar About Theirs (USAT) 129
Editorial: Raid Reverberations / Distrust Shadows FBI In Visit To Congress (PPG) 129
FBI Raid Galvanizes Congress On Rights (SCRIPPS) 130
Opinion In Our View: Above The Law Congress Rallies Against Barbarians At The Gates (TEXGAZ) 131
Hastert Lashes Out At Justice Dept. (AP-Y2) 131
Hastert, Justice Dept. Dispute Inquiry Story (WP) 133
Novak Told Rove He Wouldn't Identify Him, Person Familiar Says (BLOOM) 134
City Hall Hiring Testimony: Interviews Were Shams (CHIT) . 134
Daley Could Be Called To Testify (CHIST) 135
House Panel Backs Internet Gambling Limits (AP) 136
House Committee Approves Limits On Online Gambling (Update1) (BLOOM) 137
Elfvin Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend (BUFFNEWS) 138
Awaiting High Court Review Of Lethal Injection, Circuits Are Divided (LAW) 139
Judge Criticizes Government's New Indictment In Gotti Trial (FINDLAW/AP) 140
Prosecutors Fire Back At Wecht's Defense (PTR) 141

DOJ_NMG_0029576

Workers Begin Digging Under Barn At Hoffa Search Site (SDUT/AP) 142
More Than $1 Million In Cash Found At Miami-Dade Homes Linked To MIA Heist (MH) 143
FBI Finds $1 Million From Airport Heist Buried At Miami-Dade House (FLSUNSEN) 143
Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Knowledge Shows (BSUN) 144
Muhammad Gets Little Help From His Witnesses (WT) 145
Witnesses In Sniper Trial Wary (WP) 146
A Killer's Testimony (WP) 147
Psychiatric Care Denied To Gunman, Attorney Says (WP) 148
Financial Firms Attack Child Porn (USAT) 149
Canada Cracks Down On Rising Violence (CSM) 150

Civil Rights:

Man Gets 20 Months In Cross Burning (CO) 151
Stop The Black-Only Treatment (WP) 151

Antitrust:

Benit, Wife Face Fraud Charges (AANEWS) 152
Ex-school Leader Accused Of Fraud (FREEP) 154
UPDATE: House Judiciary Panel Votes To Ban Content Fees (DOW) 155
Google Reaches Agreement To Have Its Software Installed On New Dell Computers (NYT) 155
Dell To Sell PCs Installed With Google's Software (SEATIMES/BLOOM) 156
Yahoo, EBay Team In Battle With Google (USAT) 157
New Tech Alliances Signal More Scrambling Ahead (WSJ) 158
Yahoo And EBay Join To Fight The Giants (WP) 160
Yahoo Makes Deal On Ads With EBay (NYT) 161

Environment:

GAO Report Faults Voluntary Programs To Cut Air Pollution (WP) 162
House Votes For Oil Drilling In Alaska (USAT) 163
House OKs Oil Drilling In Alaska Refuge (AP-Y2) 163
House Votes To Allow Drilling In Arctic Refuge (WP) 165
House Votes To Allow Drilling In Alaska Refuge (NYT) 165
House Again OKs Drilling In Arctic Refuge (LAT) 166
Death In The Mines, Action In Congress (NYT) 167

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Admits Selling Stolen Prescription Drugs Worth $7.3 Million (AP) 167
Drug Cocktail Causing Overdoses From Philadelphia To Chicago (AP) 168
A Look At A Drug Cocktail Problem Around The Country (AP) 169
FENTANYL DEATHS RISE: Mom: Cops Failed To Act On OD (FREEP) 170
Possible Sources Of Fentanyl (FREEP) 171
Fentanyl Deaths Hit 33 In A Week (DN) 172
Operation Street sweep (CA) 173
17 Arrested In Regional Drug Sting (AP) 174
Kittery Chief: Arrests 'put A Dent' In Drug Trade (PHN) 174
Clayton Man Admits To Money Laundering (DDN) 175
Study Finds No Cancer-Marijuana Connection (WP) 176
Idaho Man Indicted For Drug Smuggling From Canada (AP) 176
Judge Won't Halt Gun-store Closure (CHICOER) 177
SAN LEANDRO Gun Shop Tries To Keep U.S. From Closing Store Trader Sports Losing License Over Weapons That Can't Be Found (SFC) 178
Gun Crime Program Team Wins Award (DALLASBIZ) 179

Immigration:

Senate OKs Immigration Bill 62 To 36 (LAT) 179
Senate, In Bipartisan Act, Passes An Immigration Bill (NYT) 180
Border Fight Divides G.O.P. (NYT) 181
Senate Passes Sweeping Bill On Immigration (LAT) 183
Senate Approves Immigration Bill (WP) 186
Senate Passes Sweeping Immigration Reform Bill (KRT) 188
Senate Passes Immigration Bill; GOP Advocate Of Crackdown Pledges 'battle' (USAT) 190
House GOP Expected To Yield On Legislation (WT) 190
Immigration: Now The Hard Part (CSM) 191
Senate Passes Immigration Bill Overhaul (AP) 193
Senate Passes Immigration Bill (CHIT) 194
Immigration Bill Passes Senate, Still Faces Chasm (WSJ) 196
Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (WT) 197
Critics Say Bill Diminishes Due Process For Immigrants (WP) 199
USCIS Could Process Immigration Plan, Ombudsman Says (AP) 200
Secure Border Takes Serious Study (USAT) 201
Border Deaths Expected To Rise As Summer Arrives (WT) 202
In California, Fox Gets Warm Embrace And A Cold Shoulder (NYT) 203
ICE Set To Deport 15 Illegal Aliens (WT) 203
Their People, Our Money (WSJ) 204
A Debate Beyond The Fence (WP) 205
Our National Laboratory For Bad Government (CHIT) 206

Tax:

Feds Cut Off Phone Tax After 108 Years (USAT) 207
Phone Tax Laid To Rest At Age 108 (NYT) 208

DOJ_NMG_0029577

U.S. To End Contentious Phone Tax (WSJ).....209
'Antique' Phone Tax Dropped (WP).....210
UPDATE: Treasury Concedes Fight Over Federal Telephone Tax (DOW).....211
Treasury Disconnects Tax On Long-distance Calls (MRKTWTCH).....212
FBI And IRS Seek Documents In Land Deal Involving Palm Beach County Commissioner (FLSUNSEN).....213

Congress-Administration:

Frist Still Hopeful For Hayden Debate (AP-Y2).....214
Senate Clears The Way For Kavanaugh Vote (AP-Y2).....215
Avoiding Clash, Senate Sends Judicial Nomination To Floor (NYT).....215
Artful Dodging (NSWK).....216
Treasury Secretary To Step Down (WP).....218
Snow Plans To Leave Treasury Post Next Month (WSJ).....219
New Reports Of Change At Treasury (NYT).....220
Veteran Data Was Removed Routinely, Official Says (NYT) 220
Veterans' Data Theft Went Unreported (AP-Y2).....221
Worker Often Took Data Home (WP).....222
Cost To Inform Vets Of Data Theft Starts At $10M (USAT)...223
Veterans Chief Is Grilled Over Stolen Data (LAT).....224
Harkin, Kerry Call For Free Credit Watch For Vets After Data Theft (DMR).....226
Edwards: Investigate Records Theft (AP).....226
With War On, Americans Have Troops In Mind (CSM).....227
1 War. 2 Deaths. 1 Year Later. (USAT).....228
Remember The Guys In The Foxholes (USAT).....231
Honoring Soldiers, Not Pitying Them (WSJ).....231
GAO Review Finds Flaws In Hiring By Federal Agencies (WP).....232
Inside The Beltway (WT).....233
Smithsonian Hands Over TV Contract (WP).....235

Other News:

GDP Growth Rate Revised Upward, But Housing Slowdown Looms (WSJ).....236
5.3% Growth May Be 'last Hurrah' (USAT).....237
Dow Industrials Climb 93.73 Points As Economic Data Come In Just Right (WSJ).....237
Home Economics (WSJ).....238
Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Help Settle Abuse Claims (NYT).....239
Support Weak For Harris In Senate Poll (AP).....240
A Test Of Our Character (NYT).....240
U.S. Aide Doubts Tehran Will Bend (WT).....241
US Debates Carrots, Sticks For Iran's Nuclear Program (CSM).....242
Hizbullah Factor In Iran Fray (CSM).....244
Say No To Tehran's Gambit (WP).....245
It's Time To Engage With Iran (WP).....246
Abbas Threatens Hamas With Measure Implicitly Recognizing Israel (KRT).....247
Abbas Urges Hamas To Back 2-State Plan (WP).....249
Abbas Stuns Hamas With Talk Of Referendum (AP-Y2).....250
Abbas Challenges Hamas To Endorse Document On A Palestinian State (USAT/AP).....251
Abbas Says He'd Put Peace Plan To A Vote (NYT).....252
Abbas Delivers Talks Ultimatum To Hamas (WT).....253
Israel's 'Realignment' (WP).....254
Harper To Meet Bush July 6, Canadian Ambassador Wilson Says (BLOOM).....255
Canada's Leader Won't Talk To National Media (LAT).....255
Putin Objects To Cheney's Remarks (AP).....256
Putin Group Races Past Soviet Party (WT).....257
Russia Calls To Review Foreign Oil Deals (FT).....258
Australian Forces Intervene To Halt Fighting In East Timor (NYT).....259
Troops Land In Restive East Timor (WP).....260
Raiders From Sudan Killed 118 In Chad, Rights Watch Reports (NYT/AP).....261
Militia Fighting Intensifies In Mogadishu (WP).....262
A Latin Leader Set To Defy Leftist Trend (CSM).....262
Colombia's Peace And Justice Law (NYT).....264
The Tyranny Doctrine (LAT).....264
Democracy At Risk South Of The Border (WSJ).....266

TERRORISM NEWS:

Secrets Claims In NSA Case May Stop Suits (WSJ)
By Dionne Searcey

DOJ_NMG_0029578

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

As lawsuits mount against phone companies from plaintiffs who allege their call records were handed over to the National Security Agency illegally, the companies' defense may benefit from a powerful force: the U.S. government.

The plaintiffs, who accuse Bell phone companies of privacy violations and are seeking billions of dollars in damages, would need to delve into the depths of the NSA's surveillance program to make their cases. But the government considers such information top secret, and legal experts expect the Bush administration to assert the "state secrets" privilege in the 20 or more lawsuits filed by privacy advocates in recent weeks. If judges accept the claim, as has been the case in nearly every instance in which it has been asserted since the early 1950s, the suits will dissolve.

The state-secrets privilege stems from the Cold War era, created to allow the U.S. government a means of moving to dismiss lawsuits that would hurt foreign policy or national security. The motion has been successfully invoked in cases involving government contractors and, more recently, in the case of a German citizen claiming he was wrongfully detained by the Central Intelligence Agency.

In a California suit filed earlier this year against AT&T Inc., the Bush administration has already weighed in to try to dismiss the case, asserting state secrets in a motion aimed at preventing the airing of any classified information. A federal judge in San Francisco is expected to rule on the motion as soon as June 23.

In that case, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco privacy-rights group, accuses AT&T of illegally helping the NSA analyze phone records and Internet communications without court authorization. Most of the suits have been brought on behalf of phone-company customers by activists ranging from the state branches of the American Civil Liberties Union to public-interest lawyers to Chicago author Studs Terkel. Nearly all seek class-action status.

The suits against AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp. stem from recent media reports alleging that the companies violated privacy laws by handing over domestic calling records of Americans without court authorization. To litigate the cases, plaintiffs as well as defendants must produce evidence of exactly what happened between the companies and the NSA, lawyers say. AT&T declines to comment on the cases but insists it has violated no laws. Spokesmen for BellSouth and Verizon, which have denied turning over records to the NSA, say the suits are without merit.

Senate Judiciary Committee leaders met yesterday to consider issuing subpoenas to the chief executives of AT&T, BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest Communications International Inc. for a hearing that would examine the NSA issue. No decision was made, a committee aide said, but the senators plan to meet again June 6. Earlier this week Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin, citing the government's invocation of the state's secret privilege in the AT&T suit, said the agency wouldn't investigate allegations of privacy violations by the phone companies.

In highly redacted document unsealed yesterday in the Electronic Frontier Foundation suit, a former AT&T technician says an NSA agent visited an AT&T office in 2002 and 2003.

The bulk of the other lawsuits offer virtually no evidence from plaintiffs beyond the allegations raised in newspaper articles. The phone companies have either denied participating in the NSA program or said they did nothing illegal, and they have noted that they can't discuss classified information. So far, no one in the U.S. government has offered any information publicly.

"As it stands right now we have no way to defend against these lawsuits," said one telecom lawyer. "It's equally important to point out that short of a newspaper article the plaintiffs don't have anything to prosecute these cases," he added.

Lawyers familiar with the suits say they anticipate that the government will invoke state secrets in all the cases against the phone companies. In a filing Wednesday in which Verizon asked the courts to consolidate the myriad cases, the company's lawyers said: "The United States is likely to intervene in and seek the dismissal of these cases...in order to assert its state secret privilege." The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation in Washington, D.C., will determine whether to consolidate the cases.

In recent years, government officials have ratcheted up the use of state-secrets motions. According to Thomas Blanton, a director the National Security Archive at George Washington University, the use of the privilege climbed from about once every five years from the 1950s through the late 1970s to twice a year from 1977 to 2001. Since 2001, the government has used the privilege in at least 13 cases, or a rate of about three times a year.

Mr. Blanton says that in nearly every case judges have sided with the government. "With state secrets the way it's developed is that's the magic word, the neutron bomb that leaves no plaintiff standing," he says.

If judges dismiss state-secret motions in the cases, both sides would likely rely on classified information to argue their cases, which could result in significant logistical hurdles. Secret documents would need to be flown from Washington, with federal escorts, to judges' chambers in Rhode Island, Louisiana, Montana and numerous other states where suits have been filed.

Lee Tien, a lawyer for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, says he is optimistic that the judge in that suit will quash the state-secrets motion. He argues that the government isn't merely a bystander in the case. "They're an intrinsic part of what's going on," Mr. Tien says. "It's a bigger problem from a fairness or due process point of view."

The judge's ruling in June could set the stage for how the other cases play out, and other lawyers and plaintiffs in the suits said they will be closely watching.

National Security Is A Video Game For Politicians (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Did this week mark the first return steps to bipartisan sanity in the war on terror? The Senate Intelligence Committee approved Gen. Michael Hayden to run the CIA by a 12-3 vote. And by helpful coincidence, the Supreme Court decided 9-0 in Brigham City v. Stuart that the police can make a warrantless entry into a home in which people are in imminent danger of physical harm. As we all are now.

For awhile after 9/11 the war on terror was a serious national enterprise. Then it entered a twilight zone between the reality of terrorist killing and the abstractions of our domestic politics. The subject became a kind of political video game in which political partisans -- the press, the pols, the bureaucracies -- attempt to splatter each other. The best-selling version of the game has been Warrantless Wiretaps, introduced for political playstations by the New York Times.

The Times reported in December that President Bush had authorized a "secret" National Security Agency program run by Gen. Hayden to monitor international phone calls related to al Qaeda. Like most video games, the story line of Warrantless Wiretaps is crudely simple: President Bush sits at a console of electronic surveillance programs and tries to demolish "our most basic civil liberties," eviscerate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and trample the Constitution's Fourth Amendment. The person who has scored the most points playing Warrantless Wiretaps is GOP Sen. Arlen Specter, just ahead of Democratic presidential gamer Sen. Russ Feingold. The rest of the country has shown little interest in Washington's new game. In opinion polls about the NSA's surveillance programs, strong majorities essentially say, So what?

Something approximating "So what?" was the Supreme Court's answer this week to the proposition that the police might sometimes enter a home to prevent mayhem without a search warrant. Indeed Justice John Paul Stevens called it "an odd flyspeck of a case."

But it was a Fourth Amendment case. And we have little choice other than to apply the same Constitution to flyspecks and national tragedies, to brawling drunks in a Utah kitchen and al Qaeda agents plotting the next 9/11. Chief Justice John Roberts's opinion in Brigham is in fact a nice summary of the Court's thinking on the exceptions to requiring search warrants, what he called the Fourth Amendment's "ultimate touchstone" of "reasonableness." With apologies to Chief Justice Roberts for this legal leap, I am going to cross-apply the Fourth Amendment citations in the Court's no-brainer Brigham decision to the post-9/11 war on terror in the U.S.

"Reasonableness" was the benchmark most people were looking for amid the rancor over the warrantless wiretaps. Simply, are the anti-terror taps reasonable or not?

The Supreme Court's purpose in Brigham was to clear up confusions among lower courts about "the appropriate Fourth Amendment standard governing warrantless entry by law enforcement in an emergency situation." I'd call the terror war an emergency. Brigham said the Court has held that officers can make a warrantless entry "onto private property" to fight a fire, investigate its cause, prevent the imminent destruction of evidence, and engage in pursuit of a fleeing suspect. Al Qaeda qualifies as all four. Yet another precedent cited for "obviating the requirement of a warrant" is "the need to protect or preserve life." That sounds like the point of the war on terror, but some may disagree.

DOJ_NMG_0029580

Because the kitchen fight had already began, "the officers had an objectively reasonable basis for believing . . . that the violence in the kitchen was just beginning." Osama bin Laden has recently broadcast a "reasonable basis" to believe the violence is "just beginning." The Court said, "Nothing in the Fourth Amendment required them to wait until another blow rendered someone unconscious, semiconscious or worse before entering." To stop the next al Qaeda attack, do we need a stricter test than we allow for kitchen fights?

In a final burst of Fourth Amendment common sense, the Court said, "The role of a peace officer includes preventing violence and restoring order, not simply rendering first aid to casualties." This is what the ranting over Homeland Security's inadequacies has been about -- preventing violence before the casualties begin. That is the purpose of recording these calls at the moment they sound dangerous, not after we've made paper submissions to a court.

In a helpful June 2002 essay on all this for the Yale Law Journal, "Local Policing after the Terror," William J. Stuntz, a Fourth Amendment specialist at Harvard Law School, argued that increasing legal authority for the police was appropriate in the post-9/11 world. The problem with Big Brotherism, he says, is not the surveillance itself but that they might use the information to "punish you for ordinary behavior." To avoid tying the war on terror in legalistic knots, he proposes that we forbid public disclosure of any information gathered in anti-terror searches "where the search tactic is secret and potentially invasive." Then restrict use of that information only for prosecutions of the most serious crimes.

This sounds like 9/11 policy for adults, in contrast to Washington's "shocked" reaction to the anti-terror surveillance programs. We began by saying the 12-3 Hayden vote was cause for hope. Small cause. * * *

Supreme Court Footnote. In a April 28 column I noted that no public record is kept of the Justices' conferences. It turns out there is a fascinating record -- "The Supreme Court in Conference (1940-1985): The Private Discussions Behind Nearly 300 Supreme Court Decisions"(Oxford University Press, 1040 pages, $135). University of San Diego political science professor Del Dickson assembled the notes from the available papers of Justices such as Frankfurter, Jackson, Douglas, Harlan, Clark, Warren and Brennan. He then edited the papers around individual cases, say, Brown v. Board of Education or Roe v. Wade. The book, incidentally, is regarded in some quarters of the Court as a violation of the sanctity of the conference. Sounds like an interesting privacy issue.

Editorial: Bush Team Indifferent To Press Freedom Issues (CCCT)

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, May 26, 2006

Indeed, latest foray by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales shows an alarming eagerness to target the nation's journalists

Thomas Jefferson, who had been savaged by newspapers, nevertheless understood the role of a free and independent press in a democracy. He wrote that ". . . were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter." George W. Bush and his administration are not so inclined to embrace the work of the press.

The latest evidence of this administration's wary, and often hostile, approach, to the news media is the statement by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that his office is reviewing the possible prosecution of journalists under turn-of-the-20th century espionage laws. He spoke on ABC's "This Week" about The New York Times' disclosure last year that the National Security Agency was, without warrants, eavesdropping on international phone calls in the pursuit of terrorism suspects.

"There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility," Gonzales said regarding the possibility of prosecuting the journalists who won a Pulitzer Prize for the story.

Whether it is retroactively removing declassified documents from circulation, or seeking to rummage among the papers of deceased muckraking newspaper columnist Jack Anderson, or sending platoons of Justice Department agents bearing subpoenas after reporters, the White House has shown it will play hardball with the press. Bush's penchant for secrecy predates Sept. 11, but the terrorism threat has turned this into obsession. It's a sentiment that would have found favor with President Nixon, who fought the publication of the Pentagon papers in 1971.

Yet in both the Pentagon papers and the disclosure of NSA activities, the press was informing the public what its government was up to. If terrorists operate under the assumption that their every waking moment is under surveillance, the only party in the dark about the government's supposition that the constitutional prohibition against unreasonable searches was no longer operative was the American public.

DOJ_NMG_0029581

Even if Gonzales' statement expresses only the administration's pique over the disclosure, rather than a real intent to prosecute, the effect is nonetheless chilling. And that chill hampers the flow of information, one of those democratic values which the fight against terrorism is supposed to protect.

Derrick Z. Jackson Op-Ed: AG Doesn't Grasp Notion Of Free Press (SEAPI)

By DERRICK Z. JACKSON, SYNDICATED COLUMNIST

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, May 26, 2006

Journalists. Get the rack ready! Our attorney general is coming for us, snarling like a guard dog at Abu Ghraib.

On Sunday, Alberto Gonzales told ABC's "This Week" he would consider prosecuting reporters who get their hands on classified information and break news about President Bush's terrorist surveillance program. "There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility," Gonzales said. "We have an obligation to enforce those laws."

It is almost funny to see Gonzales scour the statutes to harass journalists. This is the same administration that cannot spell the word law if you spot it the "l" and the "a." It has already set the presidential record in claiming the authority to circumvent the law in more than 750 cases.

Because the war "is not the traditional clash between nations adhering to the laws of war," Gonzales reasoned to Bush, "in my judgment, this new paradigm renders obsolete Geneva's strict limitations on questioning of enemy prisoners and renders quaint some of its provisions requiring that captured enemy be afforded such things as commissary privileges, script (i.e., advances of monthly pay), athletic uniforms and scientific instruments."

We saw where Gonzales' desire to deny a detainee a trip to the commissary to get a candy bar and some gym clothes got us eventually: Abu Ghraib, the symbol of America's abuse of global statutes.

Gonzales was a prime force in other matters to seal off the Bush White House from accountability when he was White House counsel. He helped the administration block and drag its feet on the release of presidential papers from Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush and the papers of John Roberts as he was being considered for the Supreme Court. Gonzales helped to withhold or delay highly classified documents from the president's own 9/11 Commission and from the Government Accountability Office concerning the energy task force of Dick Cheney.

Bruce Craig, executive director of the National Coalition for History, called the Bush roadblocks on presidential papers "a disaster for history." Gonzales remains in the lead of this disastrous presidency. A few weeks before it was revealed that the administration's phone-record collecting was domestic as well as international, Gonzales was asked at a House hearing if he thought the administration could monitor domestic calls without warrants. His answer was, "I wouldn't rule it out."

Now, we have the FBI trying to get the papers of the late columnist Jack Anderson. We already knew what low regard Bush had for the press before he got into the Oval Office. On the 2000 presidential campaign, he told Cheney, "There's Adam Clymer -- major-league (expletive) from The New York Times." Cheney responded, "Oh yeah, he is, big time."

Six years later, Gonzales' comment, combined with the past, make you wonder when we are going to hear about a Nixonian enemies list. In Richard Nixon's administration, Watergate masterminds actually thought about killing Anderson with LSD, and Attorney General John Mitchell threatened Katharine Graham, the late Washington Post publisher, by saying she would have her breast caught in a wringer.

We have not heard of anything that incredible yet. But there is nothing to suggest this administration is going to do anything else but sink deeper into secrecy. On Monday, Bush tried to plug the leaks in his plunging popularity over Iraq by saying, "Freedom is moving, but it's in incremental steps."

It is impossible to take Bush seriously on that concept when, at home, he is attempting to circumvent Congress and prosecuting one of the most important institutions for free speech. Gonzales told ABC, "I understand very much the role that the press plays in our society, the protection under the First Amendment we want to promote and respect, the right of the press." The actions of Gonzales show how little the Bush administration promotes the rights of the press. With every pronouncement, freedom is disappearing, in incremental steps.

DOJ_NMG_0029582

Derrick Z. Jackson writes for The Boston Globe.

Watch What You Read These Days (ODESAMER)

Odessa (TX) American, May 26, 2006

THE POINT — Attorney general hints at prosecutions for leaks of classified information.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales may have simply been launching a trial balloon on one of the Sunday political chat shows when he hinted that certain laws could be interpreted to authorize the prosecution of journalists who receive leaks of classified material.

If so, that trial balloon needs to be punctured. If not, the law needs to be changed. If it's intended as intimidation, Gonzales deserves the scorn all bullies deserve.

On ABC's "This Week" Sunday, Gonzales was asked if he can prosecute journalists for publishing classified information. The administration is reportedly upset about the story last December that revealed the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of Americans in telephonic communication with alleged terrorist suspects overseas, among others. His careful lawyer's answer deserves careful analysis.

"There are some statutes on the book, which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility. That's a policy judgment by the Congress in passing that kind of legislation. We have an obligation to enforce those laws."

Gonzales is almost certainly referring to the World War I-era 1917 Espionage Act, which made it a crime for "unauthorized persons" to receive national defense information and transmit it to others. The Justice Department is using that act, which hadn't been invoked for years, to prosecute two pro-Israeli lobbyists, although the judge in that case is considering a motion to dismiss the charges on the contention that the old law is unconstitutionally vague and violates the First Amendment.

If that provision, written before World War II, the Cold War and the rise of the National Security State, were applied literally, it could make journalists who publish such material criminals.

It could also make criminals of whistle-blowers seeking to reveal government abuses of power, of academics who write papers and books about leaked information, of members of Congress who discuss classified material, and perhaps even of readers of newspapers who discuss stories based on leaked information with their friends.

Gonzales is more than a little disingenuous in trying to make it seem as if policy judgments by Congress could "force" the administration to go after journalists. The 1917 Espionage Act was not passed by the current Congress to force the administration's hand. It has never been applied against journalists because most authorities believe the First Amendment would protect journalists and others from its provisions. Indeed, during the Clinton administration Congress passed a law to criminalize leaks of classified material (which Bill Clinton vetoed) precisely because people on all sides of the issue understood that then-current law (including the Espionage Act) did not criminalize most leaks.

Government officials who receive security clearances and promise not to divulge classified material are a different story. They have made contractual assurances and been entrusted with secret information. Ordinary citizens — and yes, that includes journalists — are under no such contractual obligation.

Unfortunately, government has become so big, so secretive and so inclined to classify material that is embarrassing or scandalous rather than vital to national security that whistle-blowers and leakers are sometimes the only way citizens can learn what government is really doing in their name.

Prosecuting journalists would not be the end of freedom as we know it, but it would be a step on the road to more overbearing government.

EDITORIAL A Total Disappointment (AAS)

Austin American-Statesman, May 26, 2006

When he was nominated to be U.S. attorney general, Alberto Gonzales had a mostly quiet record as a Texas Supreme Court justice, secretary of state and George W. Bush's attorney, both as governor and president.

DOJ_NMG_0029583

But now it seems the signs were there all along that he is a lawyer willing to defend executive power to an extreme rarely seen in national politics. At his Senate confirmation hearing, Gonzales was grilled about memos construed as defending torture and ignoring the Geneva Conventions.

He evaded most of those queries and cast enough doubt about others to gain confirmation. And his personal story of rising from a farm laborer background to graduate from Harvard Law School was compelling enough to overcome vague doubts.

Since taking over the Justice Department, however, Gonzales has acted as if he is still the president's general counsel, not the top law officer in the land.

He has gone to Congress to defend the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of American citizens living in this country. Gonzales has said the war powers act gives the administration the authority to spy on Americans, and that the secret court where domestic surveillance warrants are sought is insufficiently speedy for the war on terror.

His willingness to condone domestic spying has even some members of his own Republican Party squirming.

This week, Gonzales sparked a constitutional crisis by authorizing the FBI to search the congressional offices of U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-Louisiana. When an executive branch Cabinet member OKs rummaging through a legislative branch office, separation of powers issues become a political battleground. The GOP leadership in Congress is livid at Gonzales for approving the search.

Gonzales began the week by assaulting the First Amendment and threatening to prosecute journalists under an ancient espionage law. The attorney general objects to journalists revealing classified material — even when that information shouldn't be classified and properly informs the public.

It's no secret that the president and Gonzales harbor no fondness for a free press. Their loathing is palpable, and they have declared war on journalists. They might prosecute The New York Times for writing about the NSA's no-warrant eavesdropping on U.S. citizens, and they are eager to tap journalists' phones when they think information is being leaked.

What is at stake here is the public's ability to know what its government is doing. The administration can declare anything classified as part of the war on terror — including gathering millions of private citizens' phone records and spying on Americans without a warrant — then jail any reporter who exposes it.

It is chilling to consider how far this administration will go to crush dissent and free speech, and how far Gonzales will go to defend it.

What a disappointment he has been.

Court Hears Appeal Of `Virginia Jihad' Cases (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry O'dell, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

(AP) - RICHMOND, Virginia-Three U.S. Muslims convicted in a conspiracy that began with paintball games to train for a holy war against the United States were improperly denied a jury trial, their lawyers told a federal appeals court Thursday.

A federal prosecutor, however, argued that the three had to live with their "tactical decision" to entrust their fate to a judge.

"They got exactly what they wanted," Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg told a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Masoud Khan of Gaithersburg, Maryland, Seifullah Chapman of Alexandria and Hammad Abdur-Raheem of Falls Church were part of what prosecutors called a "Virginia jihad network" that prepared to join the Taliban by playing paintball games in the woods near Fredericksburg in 2000 and 2001.

In all, the government charged 11 men. Six entered plea bargains and two were acquitted.

Khan was convicted of the most serious charges, including conspiracy to levy war against the United States and conspiracy to contribute services to the Taliban. He trained with the militant, anti-American group Lashkar-e-Taiba, which the government later designated a terrorist organization.

Lawyers for Chapman and Abdur-Raheem contend their clients and Khan should have been tried separately. Chapman's attorney, John Zwerling, said his client was essentially forced to choose a bench trial because a jury's post-9/11 passions might be inflamed by the more serious allegations against Khan.

Khan's attorney, Jonathan Shapiro, suggested his client may have waived his right to a jury trial because of pressure from his co-defendants and that all three men may have based their decision on "a misapprehension about what their trial would be like."

Appellate Judge H. Emory Widener Jr. seemed unimpressed with the defense attorneys' arguments.

"If a feeling that you can't get fair trial is reason to reverse a case, we'd have to reverse them all," Widener said.

Lawyers for Chapman and Khan also are appealing their clients' sentences. Khan was originally sentenced to life plus 65 years in prison, but that was reduced to life plus 45 years. Chapman's original 85-year sentence was reduced to 65 years.

The government is appealing Abdur-Raheem's sentence reduction from eight years and a month to four years and four months.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Struggles To Plug Security Gaps (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP2, May 25, 2006

Worried about security gaps in commuter trains and at U.S. borders, the House struggled Thursday to pump billions of extra dollars into protecting the country against terrorists without putting too much strain on taxpayers.

The spending bill would give the Homeland Security Department $32 billion in 2007, $1.8 billion more than this year. The legislation moved toward passage as lawmakers debated dozens of competing proposals to bolster national security.

Lawmakers nixed a plan to add $36 million for devices to detect nuclear materials being smuggled over U.S. borders that critics said would short-shrift other security programs.

But they agreed to spend an additional $50 million to bolster rail security in a plan by Rep. Stephen F. Lynch (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., that pit lawmakers from cities with large transit systems against those from rural areas.

"We seem to have forgotten that more people travel on rail on a daily basis than fly," Rep. Rob Simmons, R-Conn.

Rep. Harold Rogers (news, bio, voting record), chair of the House Appropriations panel that oversees homeland security spending, warned the plan would shift money from other projects to avoid increasing the bottom line.

"What we can't afford to do is fund one program at the expense of all the others," said Rogers, R-Ky.

Democrats accused the Bush administration of not doing enough to protect the nation from terrorists, and lawmakers from both parties noted widespread management problems at Homeland Security.

"We don't have the bucks in here to get enough of a bang to really protect the country," said Rep. David Obey (news, bio, voting record) of Wisconsin, top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee.

Homeland Security, which was created in response to the 2001 terror attacks in New York and Washington, has been criticized for providing only spotty protections since it opened its doors three years ago.

Homeland Security "has yet to prove itself to be a valued agency," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y. "Frankly, its value is very dubious."

For the second straight year, the House bill eliminates a $1.3 billion administration plan to raise fees for airline passengers. It also includes:

_$20 billion to protect U.S. borders and deter illegal immigration.

_$4.2 billion for port security.

_$6.5 billion to bolster disaster preparedness and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which was overwhelmed when Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast last year.

_$3.2 billion in state and local grants for emergency first responders.

The Senate has yet to write a similar bill.

___

On the Net:

The FY07 Homeland Security Appropriations bill, H.R. 5441, can be found at: http://thomas.loc.gov/

DOJ_NMG_0029585

Bush Says U.S. Learning Lessons Of Katrina (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The AP, May 25, 2006

President Bush highlighted U.S. preparedness for the upcoming hurricane season as he marked a change of command Thursday at the U.S. Coast Guard, which rescued 33,000 people after Hurricane Katrina.

"The whole world saw your skill and bravery during the hurricanes last year," Bush said at Fort McNair, where Adm. Thad Allen replaced Adm. Tom Collins as commandant of America's oldest maritime service. "They saw Coast Guard rescuers plunging from helicopters, lifting people from rooftops, hoisting them to safety."

Overall, however, the federal government botched its response to Katrina, which devastated the Gulf Coast. The National Hurricane Center has warned residents to prepare for as many as six major hurricanes during this year's hurricane season, which begins June 1.

"We're determined to learn the lessons of Katrina, and we're doing everything possible to be prepared for the next storm," Bush said. "The Department of Homeland Security has reviewed emergency plans for all 50 states and America's 75 largest cities. The department is working closely with communities to identify any weaknesses in their plans and to find ways to improve them now."

Bush said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has taken steps to reform FEMA, improve partnerships with the Red Cross and the Defense Department and expand federal supplies.

"We're also making it clear that all able-bodied Americans should have the resources necessary to sustain themselves for 48 to 72 hours after a disaster so that emergency personnel can focus on saving those who cannot help themselves," Bush said.

While Bush was with the Coast Guard, Senate Democrats hosted a homeland security summit with leaders from across the nation to discuss how to protect the nation from the next emergency.

"While President Bush has pushed hard to ensure that our military has the resources necessary to protect our nation abroad, he has let our country's fire fighters and paramedics down by failing to provide the resources necessary for them to protect our citizens here at home," said Harold Schaitberger, president of the International Association of Fire Fighters. "Our nation shouldn't have to suffer another Katrina or 9/11 before our nation's first responders get the support they need."

Senate Panel Approves FEMA Nominee (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, May 25, 2006

A Senate panel on Thursday approved the nomination of R. David Paulison as chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency after he pledged to refile three years of tax returns to correct questionable travel deductions.

In a statement, Paulison said he was "pleased to have this matter raised and resolved" after the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this week found errors in his state and federal returns.

Paulison, who has served as acting FEMA director since September, said he relied on ultimately bad advice from his accountant in filing the returns from 2003 to 2005. It was not immediately known how much the deductions were worth.

"I will file as soon as possible the required federal and state returns and will pay all taxes, penalties or interest that may be required to immediately correct these issues," Paulison said in a letter Thursday to Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., who lead the committee.

That satisfied the panel's concerns as it wrapped up its review of Paulison's returns. It approved his nomination by voice vote and sent it to the full Senate for consideration.

"We do not believe it should disqualify him," Collins said. Lieberman said Paulison "answered the committee's questions on this matter completely."

The 2006 hurricane season begins next week, on June 1. Paulison has had a three-decade firefighting career, including a stint as chief of the Miami-Dade County fire department and head of the U.S. Fire Administration.

Despite Panel Approval, Senator Stalls FEMA Nominee (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0029586

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, May 26, 2006

Angered over FEMA's flood insurance program, a senator said late Thursday he would block the nomination of R. David Paulison as the agency's chief in the latest hitch in the push for his approval before the start of the hurricane season.

A spokesman for Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., said he will delay Paulison's confirmation until the Federal Emergency Management Agency develops a suitable appeals process for property owners whose flood insurance claims are rejected.

FEMA administers the insurance program. Bunning spokesman Mike Reynard said the agency was supposed to establish an appeals process by December 2004.

Bunning "is going to hold the nomination until they meet the intention of Congress by establishing an appeals process that will help the victims of floods," Reynard said. "It has to be a real and meaningful appeals process."

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke declined comment Thursday night on the stalled confirmation. The Homeland Security Department oversees FEMA.

The surprise delay surfaced hours after a Senate panel approved Paulison's nomination after he pledged to refile three years of tax returns to correct questionable travel deductions.

In a statement, Paulison said he was "pleased to have this matter raised and resolved" after the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this week found errors in his state and federal returns.

Paulison, who has served as acting FEMA director since September, said he relied on ultimately bad advice from his accountant in filing the returns from 2003 to 2005. It was not immediately known how much the deductions were worth.

"I will file as soon as possible the required federal and state returns and will pay all taxes, penalties or interest that may be required to immediately correct these issues," Paulison said in a letter Thursday to Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., who lead the committee.

That satisfied the panel's concerns as it wrapped up its review of Paulison's returns. It approved his nomination by voice vote and sent it to the full Senate for consideration.

"We do not believe it should disqualify him," Collins said. Lieberman said Paulison "answered the committee's questions on this matter completely."

The 2006 hurricane season begins next week, on June 1. Paulison has had a three-decade firefighting career, including a stint as chief of the Miami-Dade County fire department and head of the U.S. Fire Administration.

Fixing FEMA (WT)

By Susan M. Collins And Joseph I. Lieberman

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Moving an intensive-care patient outdoors won't cure him, but that's how some members of Congress would treat a patient in desperate need of care and rehabilitation — the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

We shared Americans' shock at news accounts of FEMA's delayed, halting and often wasteful response to Hurricane Katrina last summer. After a seven-month investigation that featured 22 hearings and 325 formal interviews and collected more than 838,000 pages of documents, the Senate Homeland Security Committee concluded that "FEMA was unprepared — and has never been prepared — for a catastrophe of the scale of Katrina." The committee found that FEMA has been under-staffed, under funded, unready and weakened by loss of essential functions like grant-making authority to support state and local disaster training.

Among the 88 recommendations in our new committee report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," is that FEMA be strengthened, protected and given a more regional focus to promote faster and better-tailored responses to natural disasters or terror attacks — and be reconstituted as the National Preparedness and Response Authority as a mark of serious change.

Some Washington insiders have reacted poorly to this proposal (e.g., the op-ed "Getting FEMA wrong," in the Washington Times on May 8). They want to pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security to reclaim what they see as the glory days of an earlier time.

Their prescription has several reality-based problems.

DOJ_NMG_0029587

First, FEMA is not now and probably never was capable of responding effectively to a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina — even when it was an independent agency. Its response to the 1992 destruction in Florida from Hurricane Andrew was widely criticized. A Government Accountability Office report said the "the federal strategy for responding to catastrophic disasters is deficient" and that the performance "raised serious doubts about whether FEMA is capable of responding to catastrophic disasters." And FEMA's own inspector general recently reported that, except for evacuation planning, there was no evidence of "FEMA efforts to conduct planning specifically for catastrophic natural disasters, and little awareness of the need for preparing for them, prior to 2001."

Second, moving FEMA out of DHS won't cure its problems, but will sever its close working ties with other DHS units like the Coast Guard, infrastructure protection, law enforcement, and communications and intelligence capabilities. We would note that the Coast Guard — by all accounts a stellar performer in responding to Katrina — was, like FEMA, transferred to DHS, and has continued to excel.

Third — and ironic, considering that critics like Reps. Tom Davis and Bill Shuster fault us for supposedly "creating another bureaucracy" — moving FEMA out of DHS would force the department to create another bureaucracy to maintain its capability to deal with the disastrous aftermath of a mass-casualty terror attack. Since DHS' mission applies to both natural and man-made disasters, and since challenges like arranging evacuation, food, medical care and shelter are similar regardless of cause, keeping a strengthened agency within DHS makes operational and financial sense.

Fourth, the critics' position overlooks the committee's recommendation that the emergency preparedness and response system be transformed from a Washington-centered bureaucracy into a 10-region organization focused on training, planning and responding in close cooperation with state and local officials. While we propose a decentralized model that focuses on regional challenges, others cling to a more bureaucratic model.

Fifth, our plan would protect a reinforced, reinvented FEMA to ensure its visibility and influence. It includes statutory protection against departmental reorganization, a regular advisory link to the president, and direct reporting to the president in times of crisis.

Members of Congress engaged in a long and thoughtful debate before deciding that FEMA belonged in the DHS structure. That logic is still sound. Emergency management is a central part of our homeland security. FEMA's withdrawal from DHS can only weaken the agency further and transfer its problems elsewhere. It is the wrong way to go if we are serious about protecting American lives.

Sen. Susan M. Collins, Maine Republican, is chairman of the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, is ranking member.

Congress Increases Effort To Bolster Flood Insurance (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As hurricane season approaches, Congress will speed action on a bill to shore up the National Flood Insurance Program by raising policy premiums for the most vulnerable coastal properties.

Most policyholders wouldn't be assessed big premium increases under the proposals, but commercial properties and second-home owners in high-risk areas would pay much more for insurance.

The Senate Banking Committee unanimously approved a flood-insurance bill yesterday that is similar to a measure passed in March by the House Financial Services Committee.

The urgency to pass legislation stems from fears of a new round of storm damage this season, as well as from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita that put the flood-insurance program deeply in the red. Costs amounting to $23 billion dwarfed the $2 billion in premiums and fees the program collects each year.

The legislation would remove the flood-insurance program's obligation to repay as much as $20.8 billion in borrowings from the U.S. Treasury for last year's hurricane-damage claims. The Senate bill would require future borrowing requests to include a repayment plan and create a reserve fund of as much as 1% of all risk exposure in force.

DOJ_NMG_0029588

Like the House measure, the Senate proposal would require policyholders with vacation homes in risky areas to pay fair-market rates for their premiums. The Senate measure also would end subsidies for structures that have received claims from repeated flood damage.

While federally chartered banks already must ensure that mortgage holders in flood-prone areas have insurance, the Senate bill would add the requirement to state-chartered financial institutions. The bill would impose new stiffer fines on financial institutions that fail to verify applicable mortgage holders have flood insurance.

Industry experts believe that the bills would only incrementally help the national flood-insurance program, which is operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, but won't eliminate future needs for taxpayer bailouts.

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Blair Acknowledge Iraq 'Setbacks' (AP)

By Terence Hunt And Tom Raum

The AP, May 25, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair acknowledged difficult times in the Iraq war they launched together in 2003, but both vowed to keep troops there until the new Iraqi government takes control.

"Despite setbacks and missteps, I strongly believe we did and are doing the right thing," Bush said Thursday evening in a White House news conference with Blair.

For his part, Blair declared that after a meeting earlier this week with Iraq's new prime minister, "I came away thinking the challenge is still immense, but I also came away thinking more certain than ever that we should rise to it."

Bush and Blair refused to discuss withdrawing troops from Iraq.

Bush, Blair Concede Missteps On Iraq (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair last night acknowledged a series of errors in managing the occupation of Iraq that have made the conflict more difficult and more damaging to the U.S. image abroad, even as they insisted that enough progress has been made that other nations should support the nascent Iraqi government.

In a joint news conference, Bush said he had used inappropriate "tough talk" -- such as saying "bring 'em on" in reference to insurgents -- that he said "sent the wrong signal to people." He also said the "biggest mistake" for the United States was the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, in which guards photographed themselves sexually tormenting Iraqi prisoners, spawning revulsion worldwide. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time," he said.

Blair, who visited Baghdad this week, said he and Bush should have recognized that the fall of president Saddam Hussein would not "be the rise of a democratic Iraq, that it was going to be a more difficult process" because "you're talking about literally building the institutions of a state from scratch."

While Bush increasingly has begun to acknowledge missteps in handling the war, his comments last night -- together with Blair's -- represent his most explicit acknowledgment that the administration underestimated the difficulty of the central project of his presidency.

The hour-long news conference came at a moment of acute political weakness for both men, who repeatedly emphasized that Iraq is finally turning a corner and that, whatever their other misjudgments, the decision to attack Iraq remains justified. Blair appeared dour and exhausted during much of the news conference, and both leaders became most animated when talking about their sagging political fortunes.

"No question that the Iraq war has, you know, created a sense of consternation here in America," Bush said. "I mean, when you turn on your TV screen and see innocent people die day in and day out, it affects the mentality of our country." He added: "I can understand why the American people are troubled by the war in Iraq. I understand that. But I also believe the sacrifice is worth it and it's necessary."

DOJ_NMG_0029589

In his own recital of errors -- which came in response to a British reporter on the last question of the evening -- Blair cited the process of "de-Baathification" that immediately followed the overthrow of the old government. Many analysts say that decision to remove all of Hussein's loyalists fueled the insurgency because it threw tens of thousands of Iraqis out of work and left an administrative vacuum, and Blair agreed that it should have been done "in a more differentiated way."

The prime minister's examples appeared to be a direct rebuke of both the Pentagon's insistence that a detailed "nation-building" plan was unnecessary before the invasion and the push by key members of Bush's administration for broad de-Baathification.

Bush's approval ratings have sunk to some of the lowest numbers for any president in decades, while Blair's Labor Party took a beating in recent elections. Iraq has played a role in both their troubles as American and British voters tire of the war. In the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, 32 percent of Americans approved of Bush's handling of the war and 37 percent said it has been worth the cost.

Bush, and especially Blair, made the case that because Iraq now has a permanent government, other nations and international organizations -- such as the United Nations -- that have been reluctant to assist in rebuilding the country now have an obligation to step forward. Speaking of his trip to Baghdad, Blair said, "I came away thinking that the challenge is still immense, but I also came away more certain than ever that we should rise to it.

"What is important now is to say that after three years, which have been very, very difficult, indeed, and when at times it looked impossible for the democratic process to work . . . then it is our duty, but it is also the duty of the whole of the international community, to get behind this government and support it," he added.

Both governments have previously signaled desires to draw down troops in Iraq. Britain in the next week or so will have reduced its deployment from 8,000 to 7,200, and officials in London have talked about making greater progress toward withdrawals in the next year. Pentagon officials have suggested they would like to withdraw about 30,000 troops by the end of the year, leaving 100,000 there.

At the same time, both governments have made it clear that they envision some troops remaining for years. Bush at a previous news conference said it will be up to future presidents to decide when the last U.S. forces will leave, and an aide to Blair told British reporters this week that London hopes to pull out its last troops by 2010.

Bush brushed away questions about reducing troop levels, saying it depends on discussions with the Iraqi government and the judgment of U.S. commanders. "I have said to the American people, 'As the Iraqis stand up, we'll stand down,' " he said. "But I've also said that our commanders on the ground will make that decision.

"I want our troops out, don't get me wrong," Bush added, saying that he said U.S. troops would not leave the country until Iraq is able to sustain, defend and govern itself.

Blair's singling out the handling of "de-Baathification" -- that is, the effort to remove members of Hussein's ruling Baath Party from positions of power in post-invasion Iraq -- is noteworthy because Bush administration officials have been reluctant to revisit the controversy surrounding that decision publicly. Blair's raising of the issue may signal a greater willingness to acknowledge such debates, which have raged among policy analysts.

The de-Baathification program was issued as Coalition Provisional Authority Order Number 1 on May 16, 2003, by L. Paul Bremer III, the chief of the U.S. occupation in 2003-2004.

It purged all Baath Party members with rank, a number estimated at 30,000 to 85,000. It was opposed by many other U.S. civilian and military officials, including the CIA station chief at the time, who thought it would drive tens of thousands of influential Iraqis into the arms of those violently opposed to the U.S. presence. On the other hand, it was consistent with the Bush administration's policy of transforming Iraq as a way of changing Middle Eastern politics.

In 2005, a joint study by the inspectors general of the Pentagon and State Department concluded that de-Baathification had indeed helped destabilize post-invasion Iraq. "The CPA decision to cleanse the political system of Hussein sympathizers -- notably, the 'de-Baathification' effort -- effectively decapitated" the Iraqi police services, they wrote.

While Blair singled out the de-Baathification policy, he did not mention the other major program that was started just after it, Bremer's order on May 23, 2003, that dissolved the Iraqi military and the Interior Ministry's national police force. That move added to the group of disaffected Iraqis and also lessened the ability of the occupation authority to control post-invasion Iraq. It was a move that surprised generals at U.S. Central Command, the nation's military headquarters for Iraq and the Middle East, where plans had been developed to use Iraqi army troops in reconstruction tasks.

DOJ_NMG_0029590

Bremer and his allies have argued that the Iraqi military already had disbanded itself, but other officials said it could have easily been called back to bases and supported by U.S. logistics.

Regarding Iran, Bush said he would consider providing incentives if it agreed to abandon nuclear enrichment activities. "If they would like to see an enhanced package, the first thing they've got to do is suspend their operations, for the good of the world," Bush said. He also said that a letter from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was "interesting," but it skirted the nuclear issue.

Blair earlier in the day tried to defuse talk of military confrontation with Iran. "We don't want a conflict with Iran, we have got enough on our plate doing other things," he told al-Jazeera television. "Nobody is targeting Iran. People are simply worried because they appear to be in breach of their nuclear obligations and because they are supporting terrorism around the Middle East."

Blair And Bush Are Duo Even In Descent (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair once bestrode the globe as powerful leaders who spoke boldly of bringing democracy to the Middle East. Now, dragged down by popular discontent over their adventure in Iraq, both have reached the lowest point of their careers.

On May 4, Blair's Labor Party suffered its worst defeats since 1997 in elections for seats on local governing boards, forcing the prime minister to shake up his cabinet amid calls that he step aside soon in favor of Gordon Brown, his expected successor. Bush, with his approval ratings hovering just above 30 percent, has also tried to reinvigorate his sagging popularity by reshuffling top aides.

Blair, desperate to hang on for at least another year, is already viewed as a lame duck -- and Bush also is increasingly seen as one, even though he has nearly three years left in his term.

As the Economist magazine put it earlier this month, the Bush-Blair partnership has become the "axis of feeble."

The two have always been a bit of an odd couple. Bush is a conservative Texan who speaks inelegant English, while Blair is an eloquent speaker who promoted the "third way" of politics with former president Bill Clinton, his transatlantic pal. After their first meeting, when Bush was asked what they had in common, he replied: "We both use Colgate toothpaste."

But Blair always has had a moralistic streak. Clinton, after all, had restrained the more enthusiastic prime minister when he wanted to send ground troops during the conflict over Kosovo. It turned out that Blair's worldview meshed perfectly with the neo-Wilsonian outlook that Bush adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Blair, convinced that it was essential for Britain to align its foreign policy closely with that of the United States, moved quickly to make sure he was in Bush's good graces. Though most European nations opposed Bush's plan for a missile defense system, Blair offered to support it as long as Bush agreed to negotiate a deal with Russia to end the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty -- rather than end it unilaterally, as some administration officials preferred. Bush agreed to Blair's proposal.

In many ways, the partnership has worked that way: Bush sets the course, with Blair at his side occasionally urging a slight turn of the oar. For instance, Blair persuaded Bush to seek U.N. approval before attacking Iraq, and he intervened at crucial moments to get Bush to devote more attention to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In Britain, however, Blair's willingness to accommodate Bush made him the subject of ridicule, earning him the sobriquet "Bush's poodle."

By coincidence or not, the two men held a news conference last night when it was past midnight in London. Indeed, while they still speak frequently by secure videoconference, yesterday's Oval Office visit was their first substantial meeting since September. Blair has also not officially accepted the Congressional Gold Medal that Congress awarded him for support after the Sept. 11 attacks, though he has come to Washington frequently since then.

"One of the reasons Blair is unpopular, even in his own party, is because he has been so close to Bush," said Charles Grant, director of the Center for European Reform in London. He said that in Bush's second term, the administration has worked hard to repair relations with European allies. But he said that while the European foreign policy elite was aware of the change, the general public was not -- and impressions of Bush had hardened.

DOJ_NMG_0029591

"The thing public opinion focuses on is Iraq, which is still there," Grant said. The sudden upsurge in violence in Basra, which is controlled by British troops and had been largely quiet until now, has further hurt the prime minister.

Blair, in fact, is among the last of Bush's foreign policy allies still in power, with many ousted by anti-U.S. sentiment.

Peter Riddell, a political writer for the Times of London who wrote a book called "Hug Them Close" on Blair's relationship with Clinton and Bush, said that if Brown replaces Blair, it is unlikely he would suddenly try to distance himself from Bush; that is in part because British leaders have long regarded a close relationship with the United States as critical for Britain. But Grant said that Brown is closer to Labor Party members -- who deeply dislike Bush -- than is Blair, and so Brown would be reluctant to send British troops into any more military campaigns led by Americans.

"Public opinion is quite hostile to this shackling of British foreign policy to the United States," Grant said.

Of course, Iraq may yet turn out to be a success. But neither Bush nor Blair is likely to be in power to enjoy the moment.

Bush And Blair Concede Errors, But Defend War (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, two leaders badly weakened by the continuing violence in Iraq, acknowledged major misjudgments in the execution of the Iraq war on Thursday night even while insisting that the election of a constitutional government in Baghdad justified their decision to go to war three years ago.

Speaking in subdued, almost chastened, tones at a joint news conference in the East Room, the two leaders steadfastly refused to talk about a schedule for pulling troops out of Iraq — a pressure both men are feeling intently. They stuck to a common formulation that they would pull troops out only as properly trained Iraqi troops progressively took control over more and more territory in the country.

But in an unusual admission of a personal mistake, Mr. Bush said he regretted challenging insurgents in Iraq to "bring it on" in 2003, and said the same about his statement that he wanted Osama bin Laden "dead or alive." Those two statements quickly came to reinforce his image around the world as a cowboy commander in chief. "Kind of tough talk, you know, that sent the wrong signal to people," Mr. Bush said. "I learned some lessons about expressing myself maybe in a little more sophisticated manner." He went on to say that the American military's biggest mistake was the treatment of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison, where photographs of detainees showed them in degrading and abusive conditions. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time," Mr. Bush said, his voice heavy with regret.

Mr. Blair, whose approval levels have sunk even lower than Mr. Bush's, said he particularly regretted the broad decision to strip most members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party of their positions in government and civic life in 2003, leaving most institutions in Iraq shorn of expertise and leadership.

The news conference, in the formal setting of the East Room, was notable for the contrite tone of both leaders. Mr. Bush acknowledged "a sense of consternation" among the American people, driven by the steady drumbeat of American casualties.

The meeting came at a low moment in Mr. Bush's presidency and Mr. Blair's prime ministership, at a time when the decisions that they made to invade Iraq and that they have defended ever since have proved a political albatross for both.

Just as they joined in the drive to war in 2003, the two leaders on Thursday evening seemed joined by a common interest in arguing that things had finally turned around in Iraq. Mr. Blair, who was in Iraq earlier this week, ventured the closest to a prediction about a timetable for disengagement, saying that he thought it was possible that Iraq's new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, was accurate in his prediction that Iraqi forces could control security in all of the country's provinces within 18 months.

But Mr. Bush quickly fell back to his familiar insistence that he would not begin a drawdown until his commanders said it was possible, and he noted that troops were recently called up from Kuwait to help stabilize Baghdad. He said that in the end he would insist on victory over both insurgents and terrorists linked to Al Qaeda, and he dismissed as "press speculation" reports of tentative Pentagon plans to bring American troop levels to about 100,000 by the end of this year. "A loss in Iraq would make this world an incredibly dangerous place," Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0029592

Mr. Bush said he and Mr. Blair had spent "a great deal of time" discussing their next challenge: how to put together the right mix of penalties and incentives to force Iran to suspend the production of uranium and give up a program that both men had said clearly pointed to a desire to build a nuclear bomb.

Mr. Bush bristled at a question about whether he had "ignored back-channel overtures" from the Iranians over possible talks about their nuclear program. Mr. Bush said that "the Iranians walked away from the table" in discussions with three European nations, and that a letter sent to him by Iran's president "didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon." Some in the State Department and even some of Mr. Bush's outside foreign policy advisers have said that Mr. Bush missed a diplomatic opening by deciding not to respond to the letter, though others say it is still not too late.

But the overwhelming sense from the news conference was of two battered leaders who, once confident in their judgments on Iraq, now understood that misjudgments had not only affected their approval ratings, but perhaps their legacies. The British news magazine The Economist pictured the two on a recent cover under the headline "Axis of Feeble."

And while both men sidestepped questions about how their approval ratings were linked to Iraq, at one point Mr. Bush seemed to try to buck up his most loyal ally, who is expected to leave office soon and may be in the midst of his last official visit to Washington, by telling a British reporter, "Don't count him out."

Outside the White House gates, a smattering of protesters gathered, blowing whistles and chanting, "Troops out now."

Mr. Bush called the terrorists in Iraq "totalitarians" and "Islamic fascists," a phrase he has used periodically to give the current struggle a tinge of the last great American-British alliance, during World War II. But he acknowledged that the war in Iraq had taken a significant toll in public opinion. "I mean, when you turn on your TV screen and see innocent people die day in and day out, it affects the mentality of our country," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Blair tried to focus on the current moment, saying that he had heard the complaint that "you went in with this Western concept of democracy, and you didn't understand that their whole culture was different." With a weak smile, he suggested to Mr. Bush that those who voted in Iraq had amounted to "a higher turnout, I have to say — I'm afraid to say I think — than either your election or mine."

Mr. Bush did not budge from his long-stated position that conditions in Iraq and the ability of Iraqi security forces to assume greater responsibilities would dictate whether the United States reduced the 133,000 American forces there. He said he would rely on the recommendations of Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq. In an effort to cajole the new government even while he was praising it, Mr. Bush twice mentioned that it had yet to appoint a defense minister with whom to discuss troop cuts, one of the glaring gaps in the Iraqi cabinet that is symbolic of the continuing struggle over power. "We'll keep the force level there necessary to win," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Blair acknowledged that some of the 260,000 Iraqi security forces, especially the police, suffered from corruption and the influence of militias. But he said a new Iraqi government would be more able than allied officials to cope with these problems.

For those who trace Mr. Bush's own reluctance to acknowledge errors in Iraq, his statements on Thursday night seemed to mark a crossing of a major threshold. In an interview with The New York Times in August 2004, Mr. Bush said that his biggest mistake in Iraq had been underestimating the speed of initial victory over Mr. Hussein's forces, which allowed Iraqi troops to melt back into the cities and towns. When pressed, he said he could think of no other errors.

Over the winter, as public support for the war eroded, he acknowledged other mistakes — failing to plan sufficiently for the occupation and rebuilding of the country, or to execute the plans that had been made. But he described these as tactical mistakes that had been fixed.

His answer on Thursday evening, though, harked back to the two statements — "bring them on" and "dead or alive" — that his wife, Laura, had been particularly critical about. While he had apologized before for the treatment of detainees at Abu Ghraib, his statement on Thursday was his starkest admission to date of the damage that the episode did to the image of the United States.

But Mr. Bush emphasized that American soldiers had been punished for the abuses. "Unlike Iraq, however, under Saddam, the people who committed those acts were brought to justice," he said. Mr. Bush's critics have noted that the prosecutions have focused on low-level soldiers and have not held senior officers accountable.

DOJ_NMG_0029593

Mr. Blair, while saying that the coalition had misjudged the de-Baathification process, added: "It's easy to go back over mistakes that we may have made. But the biggest reason why Iraq has been difficult is the determination of our opponents to defeat us. And I don't think we should be surprised at that."

No Quick Troop Reduction In Iraq, Allies Warn (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday acknowledged mistakes in Iraq and cautioned that the formation of a unity government for the country does not mean an immediate drawdown of troops.

"We'll keep the force level there necessary to win," Bush said at a joint news conference with Blair, a staunch ally in Iraq. "Politics isn't going to make the decision as to the size of our force level."

Blair, who met in Baghdad on Monday with Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, said it's possible to realize al-Maliki's goal of having Iraqi troops take control of the country's security by the end of 2007. But Blair agreed with Bush that any timetable for withdrawal will be set by conditions on the ground. "Obviously the first thing that we need is a strong government in Baghdad," he said.

While the two leaders said there had been setbacks and missteps in Iraq, they spoke candidly and at times emotionally as they defended a war they called a critical step toward democracy in the Middle East. Both said deposing Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do.

Bush identified the abuse scandal at the U.S.-operated Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad as the biggest mistake of the war. He also said he regretted some of his own "tough talk," including saying Osama bin Laden was "wanted dead or alive" and his challenge in the summer of 2003 — "Bring 'em on" — as insurgents in Iraq were stepping up attacks on U.S. troops.

"In certain parts of the world, it was misinterpreted," he said.

Opposition to the Iraq war has sapped political strength from Bush and Blair. Both face low approval ratings in public opinion polls and discontent within their own parties. Some members of Blair's Labor Party have called on him to step aside in favor of Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the exchequer, or finance minister.

The embattled allies repeatedly backed each other up in their remarks at the news conference. When a British reporter asked whether this would be Blair's last official trip to Washington, Bush replied, "Don't count him out." He said he wants Blair to remain in office through the end of his presidency.

Bush said there are about 135,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Asked about reports that the Pentagon would like that number to be about 100,000 by the end of this year, he said it was "some speculation in the press" that hasn't been discussed with him.

While saying "I want our troops out," Bush also said it is vital to complete the mission of defeating insurgents: "A loss in Iraq would make this world an incredibly dangerous place."

Blair said "the challenge is still immense" in Iraq but added that it is the duty of the international community to put aside differences over the 2003 invasion and get behind the new government in Iraq.

"These people who are fighting us there know what is at stake," he said. "The question is, do we?"

Gary Schmitt, a foreign policy analyst with the business-oriented American Enterprise Institute, said that as they serve out the remainders of their terms, "Bush and Blair are both holding onto the same life preserver — Iraq."

"As Iraq goes," he said, "so go their ultimate reputations."

On another matter, Bush said Iran must suspend programs that could lead to development of nuclear weapons. Only then, he said, can negotiations begin for a possible assistance package to Iran.

"If they suspend … then of course we'll talk about ways forward," Bush said.

Covering A Friend's Back: Leaders Reverse The Roles (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029594

Tony Blair has always served as the world's Bush-whisperer, but at their joint news conference last night, it was almost the reverse. Mr. Blair, the normally silver-tongued prime minister, seemed stiff and defensive, and it was Mr. Bush who tried to smooth things over and help Mr. Blair out.

British political analysts have repeatedly predicted that Mr. Blair, a lame duck whose popularity in Britain has never been lower, will be out of office as early as next year. But when a British reporter actually suggested that this was his last official Washington visit, he looked dismayed and tongue-tied.

Mr. Bush jumped in, saying with a laugh, "Don't count him out, let me tell it to you that way." He also asked the British to give his friend another chance. "I want him to be here so long as I'm the president."

That role reversal was as good a sign as any of how the two friends' political standing has eroded since they made the case together for war in Iraq. Last week even The Economist, a British magazine that has been more favorable to Mr. Blair than most, called his partnership with Mr. Bush the "Axis of Feeble."

In the past, Mr. Blair always raced to Washington to buck up Mr. Bush with his eloquence and aplomb, spending his own political capital to enhance that of the American. Mr. Bush was obviously grateful for his ally's support, yet last night he hinted that if he had to go it alone, he could take it from here — even in the realm of the English language.

Asked what he most regretted, Mr. Bush replied that he was sorry he had used terms like "bring it on" and "dead or alive," and that he had learned to express himself in a "little more sophisticated manner."

It was never an even-steven friendship; Mr. Blair risked his popularity in Britain when he stood by Mr. Bush and supported the war. In return he received gratitude, but little else.

One reason Mr. Blair's reputation is so tattered is his critics dismiss him as a poodle, doing his master's bidding. It did not help that before the war, Mr. Blair was unable to persuade his American friend to seek a second United Nations resolution authorizing military action.

He did not have much luck with other issues important to Europeans, from an effort to double aid to Africa to the need to take steps to avert global warming. (It probably did not help Mr. Blair's morale that "Stuff Happens," a play by David Hare that focuses on the imbalance of power between the White House and 10 Downing St., is on the New York stage.)

No one has been a better bedfellow for George Bush than Tony Blair, but last night the steadfast British prime minister tugged the covers to his side, adding his own, broader agenda to the subject at hand.

He spoke of "the importance of trying to unite the international community behind an agenda that means, for example, action on global poverty in Africa, and issues like Sudan; it means a good outcome to the world trade round, which is vital for the whole of the civilized world, vital for developing countries, but also vital for countries such as ourselves; for progress in the Middle East; and for ensuring that the global values that people are actually struggling for today in Iraq are global values we take everywhere and fight for everywhere that we can in our world today."

Mr. Blair came to Washington to help the president, but this time, perhaps for the first time, he looked like he needed the president's help.

Bush And Blair Admit To Missteps In Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

President George W. Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday night pointedly refused to set a timetable for withdrawal of troops from Iraq, but acknowledged that they had both made missteps in the country over the last three years since the invasion.

Striking a sombre note during a 45-minute joint press conference at the White House, both leaders stuck to the script on ruling out a clear timetable to exit Iraq. Mr Bush distanced himself from hopes that US troops could fall to 100,000 from 135,000 by the year end. He cautioned: “It is kind of hard to have a conversation [about timing] when you don’t have a defence minister [in Iraq].”

Mr Bush, in a rare declaration of personal regret, for the first time said he had been wrong to use the phrase: “bring it on,” a reference to the challenge he had once confidently laid down to the insurgents in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0029595

"Saying 'bring it on', kind of tough talk, you know, that sent the wrong signal to people. I learned some lessons about expressing myself maybe in a little more sophisticated manner, you know. 'Wanted, dead or alive', that kind of talk, I think in certain parts of the world it was misinterpreted."

He added that for the administration in Iraq, the biggest error had been the Abu Ghraib prison. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time."

Mr Blair, while reaffirming the decision to invade Iraq and oust Saddam Hussein, conceded that: "probably in retrospect, though at the time it was very difficult to argue this, we could have done de-Baathification in a more differentiated way than we did."

In a sign of the warmth of the personal relationship between the two men, Mr Bush strongly defended Mr Blair's leadership and hailed his resolve in refusing to be driven by opinion polls about Iraq. "Don't count him out," he said, when asked what he would miss about Mr Blair as prime minister. "I know a man of resolve and vision and courage, and ... my attitude is I want him to be here so long as I'm the president."

Mr Blair, who has faced renewed pressure to stand down as prime minister following the recent local elections in the UK when the Labour party fared poorly, responded with a sheepish look and added: "Probably not wise to say anything more at all."

The two leaders, whose political obituaries will be dictated by the fate of Iraq, both sought to shift the focus to the future and place Iraq in the wider context of reform of the Middle East and democratisation of the region.

Mr Bush said there was "no question that the Iraq war has ... created a sense of consternation here in America," and cited the daily toll of civilian deaths in Iraq. Yet the key question from Americans was: "Can we win? That's what they want to know."

Iran was also a central issue in the talks between the two leaders on Thursday, which will continue on Friday.

Mr Bush declined to comment directly on whether he would agree to the overtures from Iran for direct talks, and instead blamed the Iranian presidents for having "walked away from the table…. we've got to continue to work to convince them that we're serious, that if they want to be isolated from the world, we will work to, you know, to achieve that."

He added that the 17-page letter from the Iranian president sent last month, "didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon. That's the issue at hand."

Britain's Blair To Rally World Support For Iraq (AFP-Y2)

AFP, May 25, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair met with US President George W. Bush on the future of Iraq and to rally world support for the new government in the war-torn country.

Blair, Bush's staunchest ally, is to brief the US leader on talks he held earlier this week with Iraq's new Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The two men, who have seen their popularity ratings drop as a result of the Iraq war, were also to discuss trade issues, Iran, Afghanistan, and the Middle East peace process.

The prime minister's official spokesman said Blair would emphasize "the need for the international community as a whole, including the United Nations, to get behind the democratically elected government of Iraq and support it."

Bush's chief spokesman for his part dampened expectations that the meeting could lead to dramatic announcements such as a timetable for troop withdrawals.

"There aren't going to be people kissing in Times Square tomorrow, but I think what you will have is a very forward-leaning set of discussions about how to proceed forward," spokesman Tony Snow told reporters.

The Bush administration has repeatedly stressed that US troops can only leave Iraq when the country's forces can assure security unaided.

Bush and Blair hope to chart a new course following the formation of a new Iraqi government under the country's new prime minister.

"They're going to be talking about the readiness of Iraqi troops, how to continue the business of training Iraqi troops, professionalizing them, getting the government institutions in place," and related matters, Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0029596

US and British officials are relying on the new government in Baghdad to help extricate them from an increasingly unpopular war that has left them weakened at home and which is costing both governments billions of dollars each month.

The Iraq venture has also had a higher than expected death toll. In addition to the tens of thousands of Iraqis believed to have been killed since the 2003 invasion to topple Saddam Hussein, Washington has lost 2,460 soldiers and Britain has lost 111.

The United States has about 130,000 soldiers in Iraq. Britain has the second largest contingent, some 8,000 troops.

As the death toll rises, both Blair and Bush have seen their popularity ratings drop. Both need to show their constituencies that there is some movement forward in Iraq, observers say.

Bush, whose popularity has sunk to 31 percent, is also seeking to minimize Iraq war fallout ahead of legislative elections in November that could hurt his Republican Party.

There is speculation that Blair's trip could be his last to the United States as prime minister, especially after the drubbing his Labour Party suffered in local elections earlier this month and mounting calls for him to step down.

Blair, prime minister since 1997, has pledged to resign before the end of his third term, which is due to expire in May 2010 at the latest.

Following their meeting, Blair and Bush were to hold an evening press conference during prime television viewing hours in the United States. The two leaders are to meet again Friday after Blair delivers a speech on foreign policy at Georgetown University.

Bush, Blair Admit Errors In Iraq War (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair yesterday acknowledged setbacks and missteps in the Iraqi war, but both refused to set a timeline for withdrawing troops, instead voicing optimism that a new unity government will be best able to end insurgent violence and establish stability.

In a rare admission, Mr. Bush said during the hourlong press conference that he regretted once having taunted loyalists to former dictator Saddam Hussein and insurgents by saying "bring it on" and calling for Osama bin Laden "dead or alive" and the Abu Ghraib prison abuse by U.S. soldiers.

Mr. Bush said last night that the "bring it on" remark was "tough talk that sent the wrong signal," but both he and Mr. Blair were steadfast in arguing that removing the Iraqi dictator from power was necessary.

"We did not find the weapons of mass destruction that we all believed were there, and that's raised questions about whether the sacrifice in Iraq has been worth it. Despite setbacks and missteps, I strongly believe we did, and are doing, the right thing," the president said.

Mr. Blair traveled to Iraq earlier this week to see firsthand the government and Cabinet that were formed over the weekend, and yesterday's meeting was a chance for him to share his impressions with Mr. Bush.

"Something fundamental changed in Iraq last weekend," the president said.

Standing in the White House East Room, both leaders said coalition troops are winning in Iraq, and each said the unity government made up of Sunnis, Shi'ites and Kurds is best able to establish security in a country being ripped about by insurgent terrorist attacks.

"I don't think, in one sense, it's very surprising that it is both difficult and taking time," Mr. Blair said. "But I think that they do know that this is of vital importance for them to succeed. And I think you may find that it is easier for Iraqis to do this themselves and take some of these measures necessary than it is for us."

The White House spent much of yesterday downplaying expectations that the two leaders would make a major announcement about troop withdrawals. But that was the subject of most of the questions, from both the U.S. and British press, and Mr. Bush said he does not plan to keep U.S. troops in Iraq any longer than necessary.

"Listen, I want our troops out, understand what it means to have troops in harm's way," he said. "But I also understand that it is vital that we do the job, that we complete the mission. But it has been tough, it has been really tough."

DOJ_NMG_0029597

Deeming reports that the Pentagon hoped to reduce the 131,000 troops in Iraq to 100,000 by year's end "speculation in the press," Mr. Bush repeated his longtime stance.

"We'll keep the force level there necessary to win."

The president said he would continue to rely on his commanders on the ground to determine when Iraq is stable enough for troops to withdraw and said he will work with the new unity government toward that goal.

"First of all, we're going to work with our partners in Iraq, the new government, to determine the best way forward in achieving an objective, which is an Iraq that can govern itself and sustain itself and defend itself," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Blair, who met earlier this week with Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, said he felt after the meeting that "the challenge is still immense, but I also came away thinking more certain than ever that we should rise to it."

Mr. al-Maliki said on Wednesday that Iraqi police forces will be capable of taking control of all security within 18 months. And Mr. Blair said that he found the assertion "possible."

Each leader has tumbled in his country's polls, with Mr. Bush now facing the possibility that Republicans could lose control of one or both congressional chambers and Mr. Blair seeking to build a legacy as the end of his tenure approaches. Both in Britain and the United States, calls are increasing to begin troop withdrawals.

But neither would back down from a commitment to see the war to its end, and Mr. Blair said the new Iraqi government wants "us to stay until the job is done."

He also said coalition nations need to understand the dedication it takes to fight.

"We should have the same faith and confidence in our determination to succeed as [the insurgents] have in their determination to make us fail," the British leader said.

He called on the international community to step up and bolster the new government.

"I think after these three years and the democratic process working and producing this government, then it is our duty, but it is also the duty of the whole of the international community to get behind this government and support it," Mr. Blair said.

Mr. Bush said the United Nations needs to step up its support of the fledgling government.

"The United Nations ought to be clear about its desire to liberate people from the clutches of tyranny. That's what the United Nations ought to be doing, as far as I'm concerned," he said.

The British prime minister also voiced his regrets in answer to a question posed to both leaders. He said he regretted the way in which Saddam's Ba'ath Party political allies were purged from the Iraqi military and government soon after the fall of Baghdad. Mr. Blair also said his allies seriously underestimated the insurgency.

The chance of a major insurgency "should have been very obvious to us" from the beginning, he said.

For his part, Mr. Bush also cited the abuse of prisoners at Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison as the "biggest mistake" in the U.S. conduct of the war in Iraq.

"I think the biggest mistake that's happened so far, at least from our country's involvement, is Abu Ghraib," Mr. Bush said. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time."

On Iran, Mr. Bush said recent overtures by that nation's leaders, including what he called "16 or 17 single-spaced typed pages" letter he received from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, don't answer the fundamental questions about its nuclear program.

"He didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon," Mr. Bush said. "That's the issue at hand."

He said he and Mr. Blair are committed to a diplomatic solution, and will try to convince other key countries to press the issue through the U.N. Security Council. He also held out the chance of further incentives to entice Iran to forgo its nuclear program but said Iran must take concrete steps first.

"The Iranians walked away from the table," he said. "They're the ones who made the decision, and the choice is theirs. Now, if they would like to see an enhanced package, the first thing they've got to do is suspend their operations, for the good of the world."

Bush Says Early Iraq Troop Cuts Unlikely (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0029598

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that the formation of a new government in Iraq marked a turning point for the war-torn country, but not one that would allow for an earlier drawdown of U.S. and coalition forces.

After a White House meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Bush repeated his position that he would order a reduction in forces only after military commanders told him that the country could be defended by the growing Iraqi military and police forces.

"The American people need to know that we'll keep the forces there necessary to win," Bush told an evening news conference. "It's important for the American people to know that politics isn't going to make the decision as to the size of our force level."

He dismissed reports that the administration intended to reduce the number of troops in Iraq to 100,000 from 131,000 by year's end as no more than "speculation in the press."

The meeting of the two wartime allies had given rise to hope that they might signal the beginning of a troop drawdown long sought on both sides of the Atlantic. But the leaders instead indicated that they still saw huge risks for Iraq, where a Sunni Arab-driven insurgency rages on and sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims is on the rise.

Bush said his commanders would recommend only a troop reduction "based on conditions on the ground."

"I know I keep saying that," he said. "And it probably bores you that I keep giving you the same answer. But I haven't changed my opinion."

Blair suggested that the leaders might make no decision on troop levels for several months while they waited to see how effectively Iraqi forces stood up to their attackers.

"You will find probably, over the next few months, there will be a real attempt by the anti-democratic forces to test them very, very strongly," Blair said, responding to a question about potential troop withdrawals.

Iraq's new leader, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, said this week that he wanted Iraqi troops to take over responsibility for the nation's security as soon as possible. Maliki said he believed Iraqis could assume a lead role by the end of 2007.

Blair cast some skepticism on Maliki's prediction, saying it was possible, but insisting that Iraqi control was contingent on the new government quickly establishing a strong grip on the country, and on the ability of the Iraqi troops to crack down on insurgents.

A decision to maintain troop levels at their current size may be unwelcome news for Republicans, who face midterm elections in November with their party's poll numbers sagging. Delaying the decision on troop withdrawals also poses difficulty for Bush and Blair, whose political fortunes have been badly damaged by the war.

The meeting of the two weakened leaders drew ridicule from some parts of the British press; the Economist magazine referred to the pair as an "axis of feeble." Blair is expected to leave office by next summer and is widely viewed as a lame duck. Some observers have noted that this visit could be Blair's last to the White House as prime minister.

Bush and Blair were asked pointedly about "missteps and mistakes" that they most regretted during the war.

Bush said he considered the Abu Ghraib prison abuses to be the biggest U.S. mistake in Iraq. "We've been paying for that for a long time," he said.

The president also said he regretted some of his own "tough talk," including the very phraseology that initially endeared him to Americans after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He said he regretted responding to early reports of the rising Iraqi insurgency by saying, "Bring it on." He also lamented his use of the phrase "dead or alive" in describing how he would one day capture Osama bin Laden and others. Bush has mentioned those regrets before.

For his part, Blair said the expulsion of members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from the Iraqi government could have been handled better. Many people argue that expelling low- and mid-level party members alienated Sunni Arabs and fueled the insurgency.

Bush has in the past derided opponents of the war as isolationists, but he was more conciliatory Thursday. "No question that the Iraq war has, you know, created a sense of consternation here in America," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029599

But even with surveys showing greater support for a withdrawal or reduction in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, Bush said that most Americans would not support pulling out.

Military commanders and other U.S. officials have said privately that they hope for a substantial troop withdrawal this year. Some suggested that the U.S. troop level could drop to about 100,000 by year's end.

But in recent months, as sectarian divisions have become more deadly, such talk has appeared to subside.

Blair, who met with Army Gen. George W. Casey, commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, during a surprise visit to Baghdad this week, said commanders were concerned that the new Iraqi government could face a surge in violence as Iraqi forces began to take over more territory from U.S., British and other coalition troops.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld said this month that he expected a recommendation on troop levels from Casey once Maliki's government was in place. However, Bush said Casey was awaiting the installation of a new Iraqi defense minister, who has yet to be selected. The president said any reductions might not come until the new ministry had developed capabilities "to enable the Iraqis to take more of the fight."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Sham-nesty

Rep. J.D. Hayworth makes clear what's so "onerous" about White House immigration policy. The Arizona Republican offered a point-by-point deconstruction of an explanation of the policy made by White House spokesman Tony Snow.

"Illegal aliens will have to 'pay taxes': That's no penalty; they're supposed to pay taxes. In fact, according to Sen. Chuck Grassley, under Bush's plan illegals would have the option to only have to pay three of their last five years in back taxes," Mr. Hayworth observed in the National Review Online yesterday.

"They have to 'keep their nose clean' : Big deal. So does everybody else.

"They have to get a tamper-proof ID card: Oh, the humanity!

"They'll have to stay employed: But isn't that why they came here, to do jobs Americans won't?

"They'll have to learn English: That's a benefit to the illegal."

Mr. Hayworth continued, "Most of these 'benchmarks' would be required of any legal immigrant. They are in no way burdensome, yet Tony Snow makes them sound almost oppressive. The only real punishment on the entire list is the fine. Know what it is? A measly $2,000 payable in two $1,000 installments. When you consider what illegals get for their two grand, it's the deal of a lifetime."

He concludes, "The American people see through the White House spin. They know an amnesty when they see it. And the president's plan is an amnesty."

Off the deep end

British leftist George Galloway has taken his opposition to the Iraq war to the point of saying that the assassination of British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be "morally justified."

In an interview with GQ, the men's fashion magazine asked him: "Would the assassination of, say, Tony Blair by a suicide bomber — if there were no other casualties — be justified as revenge for the war on Iraq?"

Mr. Galloway, a member of Parliament for the Respect party, responded, "Yes, it would be morally justified. I am not calling for it — but if it happened, it would be of a wholly different moral order to the events of 7/7," referring to the deadly al Qaeda attacks on the London mass-transit system last year.

Mr. Blair's assassination "would be entirely logical and explicable. And morally equivalent to ordering the deaths of thousands of innocent people in Iraq — as Blair did," he said.

Labor member of Parliament Stephen Pound called Mr. Galloway's words "disgraceful and truly twisted."

"These comments take my breath away," he told the Sun. "Every time you think he can't sink any lower, he goes and stuns you again."

The Sunday Times reported Mr. Blair's reaction: "No. 10 made no comment."

DOJ_NMG_0029600

Fleet Street also reported on Mr. Galloway's doings this week: a visit to Cuba to make nice with dictator Fidel Castro.

"Mr. Galloway shocked panelists on a live television discussion show in Havana by emerging on set mid-transmission to offer passionate support for Castro. Looking approvingly into each others' eyes, the pair embraced," reports the Independent's Oliver Duff.

Ready to rumble

Young Republicans are looking out for their party. The College Republican National Committee (CRNC) announced yesterday that 275 membership chapters were established on campuses nationwide last year — joining 1,000 existing chapters.

"The success of college Republicans this spring is a reflection of the organization and initiative that distinguishes the Republican Party," said the group's chairman, Paul Gourley. "We are determined to remain the well-organized grass-roots force that wins elections for the GOP in November.

"We've witnessed a lot of legislative victories thus far: the confirmation of many sound federal judges, and tax cuts at a variety of levels. But there's still a lot of work to do," Mr. Gourley added. "We need to lock Republican majorities in the fall to carry out our full agenda."

Young GOPers are already "on the ground," he said.

One noteworthy former member applauds their vigor.

"Grass-roots initiatives have surged and marked the College Republican National Committee as a compelling force in the current political fight," observed Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform who was a field director for the organization in the early 1980s.

A green Bush

"Environmentalists should thank President Bush for breathing new — albeit indignant — life into the stagnant climate-change debate when he announced in 2001 that he wouldn't pursue ratification of Kyoto. New policy opportunities opened up, and people went back to the creative drawing boards," Samuel Thernstrom of the American Enterprise Institute notes in a story that plumbs Al Gore's global-warming-destroys-the-earth movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," now in theaters.

"We're taking small steps in the right direction, but activists are more enamored with their politics, which dictate that anything that Bush supports must be wrong — than with spurring these nascent efforts on. Clinton and Gore continue to mislead Americans by telling us that the solutions are simple and cheap — all we need is political will to implement them. Nothing could be further from the truth: the answers to climate change are expensive and elusive; they will be found in the Los Alamos labs, not the halls of Congress."

"We can build fuel-cell cars now — for $1 million. When we figure out how to sell them for $30,000, we won't need an international treaty to get people to buy them. Almost every major car company in the world is frantically trying to unlock that puzzle and — are you sitting down? — George W. Bush, the ex-oil man who once mocked Al Gore's fascination with green cars, is pouring billions of federal dollars into the effort."

What's to come

Look for congressional Republicans to "dish up a plate of 'red meat' social issues they hope will motivate their conservative base for the Nov. 7 elections," predicts Judy Holland of Hearst Newspapers.

Next week, Republican senators will push proposals on hot-button issues — including constitutional amendments to ban homosexual "marriage" and to outlaw flag burning, along with legislation to clamp down on minors who cross state lines for abortions and thus evade parental-notification restrictions in their home states.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, who is behind the flag-burning proposal, concedes his chances aren't good, but said the party's base "would get mad if we didn't try."

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, said Republicans will be satisfied only if they think that the party leadership "really went after these measures. If they feel they have paid lip service, then I think the leadership is going to pay for it."

Standing By Stand-Up Iraqis (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029601

I am often asked why I don't just give up on Iraq and pronounce it a lost cause. It would certainly make my job (and marriage) easier.

What holds me back are scenes like the one related in last Sunday's Times story from Baghdad about the Iraqi Parliament's vote to approve the country's new cabinet. Our story noted that during the Iraqi parliamentary session, the Sunni party leader Saleh Mutlaq, a former Baathist, stood up and started denouncing the decision by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to have Parliament vote on the new cabinet even though he hadn't yet filled the key security posts.

At that point, another Sunni politician, Mithal al-Alousi, told Mr. Mutlaq to sit down. "Iraqi blood is being spilled every day," Mr. Alousi said. It was time to move forward. When Mr. Mutlaq pressed on with his denunciations, Mr. Alousi "pulled him down into his chair," The Times reported. That was a gutsy move — live on Iraqi TV. Many Sunni insurgents may not like what Mr. Alousi did, but he did it anyway.

As long as I see Iraqis ready to take a stand like that, I think we have to stand with them. When we don't see Iraqis taking the risk to build a progressive Iraq, then it is indeed time to pack and go. That moment may come soon. It's hard to tell. I won't hesitate to say so — but not yet.

In such confusing times I find it useful to listen to someone steeped in the history of the Arab world, someone like the Egyptian sociologist and democracy campaigner Saad Eddin Ibrahim, who was visiting Washington with a human rights group from the Carter Center.

Mr. Ibrahim compares the U.S. invasion of Iraq to Napoleon's invasion of Egypt in 1798, which punched the first big hole through which modernity could seep into the Arab world. It was the key ruler of Egypt after the Napoleonic invasion, Muhammad Ali, who started sending students to Europe, introduced secular education and ushered in a mini-Arab renaissance that culminated with the first Egyptian parliament, elected in 1866.

What you are seeing in Iraq today is the "hard labor" of nation building in a country that has gone through almost 50 years of tyrannical rule, Mr. Ibrahim said. It is a naturally messy process, much messier than Eastern Europe's, with the outcome uncertain. "Everyone with a grievance for 50 years there is now breathing freely and wanting to act on their newfound freedom," he added.

The reason that the violence in Iraq is so intense — mass executions, mosques blown up — is in part because of all these pent-up grievances. But in part it is also because two very entrenched forces in that part of the world — the theocrats and the autocrats; that is, the Qaedas and the Arab regimes surrounding Iraq, even the "pro-America" ones — are deeply worried that we might succeed.

"The theocrats fear modernity taking root in Iraq," in the heart of the Arab world, "and the autocrats fear democracy taking root there," Mr. Ibrahim said. Therefore, they are pulling out all the stops to make Iraq fail. America, Britain and their Iraqi allies must fail, the theocrats and autocrats say, so the Arab theocrats can tell their people that modernity is not an option and so the Arab autocrats can tell their people that democracy is not an option. The future of the Arab world is at stake here.

Nevertheless, thanks to the incredible sacrifice of U.S. and British soldiers, Iraqi elections have been held, a parliament convened. The process is indeed messy, and, given all the shameful mistakes by the Bush team, much deadlier than it had to be. But Mr. Ibrahim, who spent from 2000 to 2003 in an Egyptian prison for pushing free and fair elections in Egypt, is no starry-eyed dreamer, and he believes there's a decent chance that in a few years, Iraq will make its transition, build up an army and settle down.

"Every major transformation since Napoleon in this part of the world has been the function of an external jolt," Mr. Ibrahim said.

The best thing the Americans could do now to help this process is to move into the background in Iraq, he added. Let the Iraqis invite our help, but let's get out of their faces wherever possible. Also, Mr. Ibrahim said, "We need America to get back on the moral high ground that it has slid down from since 9/11."

President Bush may have moral clarity when speaking about freedom and democracy in the Arab world, but he has no moral authority. He lost it all by coddling Arab oil regimes and by tolerating the Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo prisons, which should be closed down immediately.

"So you have your homework to do, and we have ours," Mr. Ibrahim said.

DOJ_NMG_0029602

Military Expected To Report Marines Killed Iraqi Civilians (NYT)

By Thom Shanker, Eric Schmitt And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

This article is by Thom Shanker, Eric Schmitt and Richard A. Oppel Jr.

WASHINGTON, May 25 — A military investigation into the deaths of two dozen Iraqis last November is expected to find that a small number of marines in western Iraq carried out extensive, unprovoked killings of civilians, Congressional, military and Pentagon officials said Thursday.

Two lawyers involved in discussions about individual marines' defenses said they thought the investigation could result in charges of murder, a capital offense. That possibility and the emerging details of the killings have raised fears that the incident could be the gravest case involving misconduct by American ground forces in Iraq.

Officials briefed on preliminary results of the inquiry said the civilians killed at Haditha, a lawless, insurgent-plagued city deep in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, did not die from a makeshift bomb, as the military first reported, or in cross-fire between marines and attackers, as was later announced. A separate inquiry has begun to find whether the events were deliberately covered up.

Evidence indicates that the civilians were killed during a sustained sweep by a small group of marines that lasted three to five hours and included shootings of five men standing near a taxi at a checkpoint, and killings inside at least two homes that included women and children, officials said.

That evidence, described by Congressional, Pentagon and military officials briefed on the inquiry, suggested to one Congressional official that the killings were "methodical in nature."

Congressional and military officials say the Naval Criminal Investigative Service inquiry is focusing on the actions of a Marine Corps staff sergeant serving as squad leader at the time, but that Marine officials have told members of Congress that up to a dozen other marines in the unit are also under investigation. Officials briefed on the inquiry said that most of the bullets that killed the civilians were now thought to have been "fired by a couple of rifles," as one of them put it.

The killings were first reported by Time magazine in March, based on accounts from survivors and human rights groups, and members of Congress have spoken publicly about the episode in recent days. But the new accounts from Congressional, military and Pentagon officials added significant new details to the picture. All of those who discussed the case had to be granted anonymity before they would talk about the findings emerging from the investigation.

A second, parallel inquiry was ordered by the second-ranking general in Iraq to examine whether any marines on the ground at Haditha, or any of their superior officers, tried to cover up the killings by filing false reports up the chain of command. That inquiry, conducted by an Army officer assigned to the Multinational Corps headquarters in Iraq, is expected to report its findings in coming days.

In an unusual sign of high-level concern, the commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, flew from Washington to Iraq on Thursday to give a series of speeches to his forces re-emphasizing compliance with international laws of armed conflict, the Geneva Conventions and the American military's own rules of engagement.

"Recent serious allegations concerning actions of marines in combat have caused me concern," General Hagee said in a statement issued upon his departure. The statement did not mention any specific incident.

The first official report from the military, issued on Nov. 20, said that "a U.S. marine and 15 Iraqi civilians were killed yesterday from the blast of a roadside bomb" and that "immediately following the bombing, gunmen attacked the convoy with small-arms fire."

Military investigators have since uncovered a far different set of facts from what was first reported, partly aided by marines who are cooperating with the inquiry and partly guided by reports filed by a separate unit that arrived to gather intelligence and document the attack; those reports contradicted the original version of the marines, Pentagon officials said.

One senior Defense Department official who has been briefed on the initial findings, when asked how many of the 24 dead Iraqis were killed by the improvised bomb as initially reported, paused and said, "Zero."

DOJ_NMG_0029603

While Haditha was rife with violence and gunfire that day, the marines, who were assigned to the Third Battalion, First Marines, and are now back at Camp Pendleton, Calif., "never took what would constitute hostile fire of a seriously threatening nature," one Pentagon official said.

Women and children were among those killed, as well as five men who had been traveling in a taxi near the bomb, which killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas of El Paso.

Although investigators are still piecing together the string of deaths, Congressional and Pentagon officials said the five men in the taxi either were pulled out or got out at a Marine checkpoint and were shot.

The deaths of those in the taxi, and inside two nearby houses, were not the result of a quick and violent firefight, according to officials who had been briefed on the inquiry.

"This was not a burst of fire, but a sustained operation over several hours, maybe five hours," one official said. Forensic evidence gathered from the houses where Iraqi civilians died is also said to contradict reports that the marines had to overcome hostile fire to storm the homes.

Members of the House and Senate briefed on the Haditha shootings by senior Marine officers, including General Hagee and Brig. Gen. John F. Kelly, the Marine legislative liaison, voiced concerns Thursday about the seriousness of the accusations.

Representative John Kline, a Minnesota Republican who is a retired Marine colonel, said that the allegations indicated that "this was not an accident. This was direct fire by marines at civilians." He added, "This was not an immediate response to an attack. This would be an atrocity."

The deaths, and the role of the marines in those deaths, is being viewed with such alarm that senior Marine Corps officers briefed members of Congress last week and again on Wednesday and Thursday.

The briefings were in part an effort to prevent the kind of angry explosion from Capitol Hill that followed news of detainee abuse by American military jailers at Abu Ghraib prison, which had been quietly under investigation for months before the details of the abuse were leaked to the news media. "If the accounts as they have been alleged are true, the Haditha incident is likely the most serious war crime that has been reported in Iraq since the beginning of the war," said John Sifton, of Human Rights Watch. "Here we have two dozen civilians being killed — apparently intentionally. This isn't a gray area. This is a massacre."

Three Marine officers — the battalion commander and two company commanders in Haditha at the time — have been relieved of duty, although official statements have declined to link that action to the investigation.

Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican who heads the Armed Services Committee, said he expected senators would review investigators' evidence, including photographs by military photographers that Mr. Warner said were "taken as a matter of routine in Iraq on operations of this nature when there's loss of life."

Lawyers who have been in conversations with the marines under investigation stressed the chaotic situation in Haditha at the time of the killings. And they expect that the defense will stress that insurgents often hide among civilians, that Haditha on the day of the shootings was suffering a wave of fluid insurgent attacks and that the marines responded to high levels of hostile action aimed at them.

Much of the area around Haditha is controlled by Sunni Arab insurgents who have made the city one of the deadliest in Iraq for American troops. On Aug. 1, three months before the massacre, insurgents ambushed and killed six Marine snipers moving through Haditha on foot. Insurgents released a video after the ambush that appeared to show the attack, and the mangled and burned body of a dead serviceman. Then, two days later, 14 marines were killed when their armored vehicle was destroyed by a roadside bomb near the southern edge of the city.

The Marines also disclosed this week that a preliminary inquiry had found "sufficient information" to recommend a criminal probe into the killing of an Iraqi civilian on April 26 near Hamandiyah, a village west of Baghdad.

Probe Finds Marines Killed Unarmed Iraqi Civilians (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Marines from Camp Pendleton wantonly killed unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, and then tried to cover up the slayings in the insurgent stronghold of Haditha, military investigations have found.

DOJ_NMG_0029604

Officials who have seen the findings of the investigations said the filing of criminal charges, including some murder counts, was expected, which would make the Nov. 19 incident the most serious case of alleged U.S. war crimes in Iraq.

An administrative inquiry overseen by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell found that several infantry Marines fatally shot as many as 24 Iraqis and that other Marines either failed to stop them or filed misleading or blatantly false reports.

The report concludes that a dozen Marines acted improperly after a roadside bomb explosion killed a fellow Marine, Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas.

Looking for insurgents, the Marines entered several homes and began firing their weapons, according to the report.

In its initial statement to the media, the Marine Corps said the Iraqi civilians were killed either by an insurgent bomb or by crossfire between Marines and insurgents.

But after Time magazine obtained pictures showing dead women and children and quoted Iraqis who said the attack was unprovoked, the Marine Corps backtracked on its explanation and called for an investigation.

The Marines, many of whom were on their third deployment to Iraq, are part of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment of the 1st Marine Division.

The battalion commander and two company commanders were relieved of duty last month because, a spokesman said, Maj. Gen. Richard Natonski, commanding general of the division, had lost confidence in their leadership.

The Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which conducted a separate investigation, is expected to call for criminal charges, including murder, negligent homicide, dereliction of duty and filing a false report.

After the roadside bomb killed Terrazas, the Marines conducted a sweep of the area, a common military tactic. But instead of following the Geneva Convention rules about identifying combatants, the Marines killed Iraqis in homes and five sitting in a vehicle, reportedly without provocation, the investigation found.

Bargewell's report is to be given soon to Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top operational commander in Baghdad. Chiarelli will make recommendations involving leadership, training and filing reports. Compensation has already been paid to families of some of the slain Iraqis.

Marine officials also confirmed Thursday that an investigation had been opened into an April 26 incident in which troops allegedly killed a civilian in the town of Hamandiya, west of Baghdad.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael Hagee flew to Iraq on Thursday to talk to Marines and remind them of long-standing orders to protect Iraqi civilians and follow the Geneva Convention.

Hagee is emphasizing "the importance of our core values" and reminding troops about the laws of war, a Marine Corps statement said.

The Marine commandant planned to read to officers and enlisted personnel a statement reminding them: "We must regulate force and violence, we only damage property that must be damaged, and we protect the noncombatants we find on the battlefield."

Hagee last week briefed key congressional leaders on the upcoming report. One of those, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a retired Marine colonel, said later that Marines "killed innocent civilians in cold blood."

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, held a news conference last Friday to plead with reporters, politicians and the public not to judge U.S. troops by the action "of one squad, in one city, on one morning."

The Marines have had more than 700 personnel killed in Iraq.

In his statement, Hagee said that Marines should overcome the tendency "of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life" in their dealings with Iraqi civilians.

General To Teach Rules Of War (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The Marine Corps' top general yesterday left Washington for Iraq, where he will lecture Marines on the importance of fighting Iraqi insurgents and foreign terrorists by the rules.

Gen. Michael W. Hagee's trip comes as members of a Marine battalion, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif., are under investigation in the deaths of more than 20 Iraqi civilians, some of them women and children, in the town of Haditha.

The fact that the Marine commandant is dedicating his trip to reinforcing the need to refrain from war crimes underscores the severity of what happened Nov. 19 in Haditha, a known haven for insurgents and al Qaeda in Iraq fighters who regularly attack Marines.

Gen. Hagee said in a message to his troops, "We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force. We use lethal force only when justified, proportional and, most importantly, lawful. ... We protect the noncombatants we find on the battlefield."

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and a decorated Marine veteran, told reporters last week that Marines killed "innocent civilians in cold blood." Sources close to the investigation told The Washington Times that defense attorneys expect one or more Marines to be charged with murder.

A Marine Corps statement announced Gen. Hagee's departure for Iraq, where he will "reinforce the ideals, values and standards for which Marines have been known for more than 200 years."

The Corps is bracing for the worst, congressional sources say, and are regularly briefing members of Congress. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) will likely complete its investigation this summer.

Senate Armed Services Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, has been briefed by Gen. Hagee and yesterday convened a closed committee briefing from Brig. Gen. John Kelly.

"There are established facts that incidents of a very serious nature did take place," Mr. Warner told reporters afterwards." He spoke of "very, very serious allegations, and there have been facts substantiated to date to underpin those allegations as to what occurred."

Gen. Hagee said in his message that "To a Marine, honor is more than just honesty. It means having uncompromising personal integrity and being accountable for all actions. To most Marines, the most difficult part of courage is not the raw physical courage that we have seen so often on today's battlefield. It is rather the moral courage to do the 'right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines."

The events in Haditha began when a Marine was killed by an improvised explosive device (IED) while on patrol. The Marines -- members of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment -- launched quick, house-to-house raids to try to find the insurgents who made and planted it. During the operation, perhaps as many as two dozen Iraqi civilians were killed.

Haditha lies west of Baghdad, in the Anbar province, which is patrolled by about 20,000 Marines who face constant attacks. In the fog of combat, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish Iraqi civilians from hardened al Qaeda terrorists.

"The nature of this war with its ruthless enemies and its complex and dangerous battlefield will continue to challenge us in the commitment to our core values," Gen. Hagee said. "We must be strong and help one another to measure up. The war will also test our commitment to our belief in the rule of law."

As the Haditha investigation was in full bore, the Marines announced this week a second criminal probe in the death of an Iraqi civilian last month near Baghdad.

Marine Corps To Probe Iraq Civilian Deaths (AP)

By Robert Burns

The AP, May 25, 2006

The top Marine general said Thursday that he feared, based on two recent cases of alleged killings of civilians in Iraq, that some Marines could become "indifferent to the loss of a human life." His office announced that he was enroute to Iraq to reinforce the Corps' standards of behavior in combat.

"We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force. We use lethal force only when justified, proportional and, most importantly, lawful," Gen. Michael W. Hagee wrote in a statement issued by his office.

His statement and the announcement of his trip to Iraq came just hours after the Marine command in Iraq disclosed a criminal investigation into allegations that an unspecified number of Marines killed an Iraqi civilian west of Baghdad on April 26. Iraqis made the charge during a meeting with Marine officers on May 1.

DOJ_NMG_0029606

"Many of our Marines have been involved in life or death combat or have witnessed the loss of their fellow Marines, and the effects of these events can be numbing," Hagee wrote. "There is the risk of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life, as well as bringing dishonor upon ourselves."

A spokesman for Hagee, Col. David Lapan, said the general had scheduled the trip long ago but in light of the latest allegations he decided to use the visit as an opportunity to reinforce Marine Corps values and standards.

"To a Marine, honor is more than just honesty; it means having uncompromising personal integrity and being accountable for all actions," Hagee said in his statement. He urged all Marines to have the moral courage to "do the `right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines."

He referred to "recent serious allegations about actions of Marines in combat," but he did not specifically cite the two cases - one from last November and the other in April - of alleged killings of civilians.

In Wednesday's announcement of the latest criminal investigation, Marine officials said a preliminary investigation by Multinational Force-West, headed by Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, had found enough information to recommend an investigation by the Naval Criminal Investigation Service.

The statement provided no details about the alleged killing, including either the gender or age of the victim. It said "several service members" from the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, which is based in the Fallujah area about 40 miles west of Baghdad, were suspected of involvement. They were "removed from operations" and sent back to the United States pending the results of the criminal investigation, it said.

A criminal investigation also is under way in connection with Marines from another battalion who are accused of killing at least 15 civilians, including women and children, last November in Haditha, 140 miles northwest of Baghdad.

The military initially described the Haditha encounter as an ambush during a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol that involved a roadside bombing in which a Marine died, followed by a firefight. However, residents of the neighborhood maintained that only U.S. forces were shooting after the explosion.

Videotape aired by an Arab television station showed images purportedly taken in the aftermath of the encounter: a bloody bedroom floor, bullet holes in walls and bodies of women and children. An Iraqi human rights group called for an investigation of what it described as another deadly mistake that had harmed civilians.

The military began its administrative investigation to review whether the Marines involved had lied about what happened. A House committee will review the military's investigation next month.

On May 17, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a decorated former Marine, said the toll in the Haditha attack was far worse than originally reported and that U.S. troops killed innocent women and children "in cold blood." He said that nearly twice as many people were killed than first reported, maintaining that U.S. forces are "overstretched and overstressed" by the war in Iraq.

Last August, the Marine Corps announced a criminal investigation into the death of the cousin of Iraq's ambassador to Washington, Samir al-Sumaidaie, who was shot and killed during a search of his home in Haditha on June 25.

No announcement has been made about the findings of the investigation.

Top Marine General To Stress Corps' Values On Trip To Iraq (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Marine Corps' top general left for Iraq on Thursday to remind Marines that it's important to maintain their core values of "honor, courage and commitment" even in the middle of a bitter counterinsurgency where the differences between right and wrong, friend and foe, are often blurred.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael W. Hagee's departure came a day after Marines in Iraq announced a criminal investigation into allegations that Marines killed an Iraqi civilian near the town of Hamandiyah, west of Baghdad, on April 26. Investigators are also probing a Nov. 19 incident in which a group of Marines allegedly shot and killed 23 Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha, according to survivors interviewed by Knight Ridder.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told reporters on Thursday that in both cases "there are established facts that incidents of a very serious nature did take place." Hagee briefed Warner and the committee's ranking Democrat, Carl Levin of Michigan, about the investigations on Wednesday. The full committee was briefed on Thursday.

Warner said he would reserve judgment until he and other members of Congress "have a full set of facts." He disclosed that there were possibly photos taken of the scene where the killings occurred.

A person familiar with the investigation said the photos were taken after the incident and didn't show actual wrongdoing by troops.

But the person, who asked not be identified because the investigation was still ongoing, said that if the photos are tied to the killings, they "could be very damaging to the U.S. effort in Iraq."

Marine Corps officials said Hagee's trip had been scheduled months ago, but that he intended to use the trip to deliver prepared remarks at Marine bases in Iraq and on every Marine base in the United States reminding troops of their obligations under the rules of war.

"Many of our Marines have been involved in life or death combat or have witnessed the loss of their fellow Marines, and the effects of these events can be numbing," Hagee will say, according to a copy of the remarks. "There is the risk of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life, as well as bringing dishonor upon ourselves."

Hagee said all Marines have been taught how to conduct themselves properly on the battlefield and have been trained to follow the Geneva Convention and other regulations while at war.

"We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force," the prepared text said. "We use lethal force only when justified, proportional, and most importantly lawful."

The remarks call such conduct "the American way of war."

"We must regulate force and violence," Hagee will say. "We only damage property that must be damaged, and we protect non-combatants we find on the battlefield."

Hagee also will urge Marines to have the "moral courage to do the `right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines."

On Wednesday, the Marine command in the Iraqi city of Fallujah said that "several" Marines from 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment had been returned to the United States until an investigation is completed into the April 26 killing of an Iraqi civilian near Hamandiyah. The Marines said local Iraqis brought the alleged killing to the attention of Marine commanders during a routine meeting on May 1.

Investigators reportedly are near completion of their probe into the Nov. 19 incident at Haditha. Military officials in Baghdad initially reported that 15 civilians on a bus were killed that day, along with one Marine in a nearby Humvee, when a roadside bomb exploded. They later said the civilians died in the crossfire between Marines and insurgents.

But Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., told a press conference last week that the Marines killed the civilians "in cold blood" after snapping because of the pressures of combat.

Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee and an opponent of Bush administration policy in Iraq, said those findings would be included in a report due for delivery to top military brass in Baghdad this week.

Murtha, a retired Marine officer and Vietnam veteran, said he had not read the report, but had learned of its findings from military commanders and other sources.

A Marine lieutenant colonel and two company commanders from 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment were relieved after the Haditha killings and sent home. The commander of 1st Marine Division didn't tie the officers to the alleged massacre, but said they'd been relieved because of numerous incidents throughout their tour.

Haditha, a town in western Iraq about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad, has been a hotbed of the Iraqi insurgency in western Anbar province for more than two years. Fourteen Marines were killed near Haditha last August when a bomb blew up underneath their armored personnel carrier, in one of the worst single fatal attacks for U.S. troops so far in the war.

Top Marine Visits Iraq As Probe Of Deaths Widens (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The commandant of the Marine Corps flew to Iraq to address his troops yesterday, and members of the Senate Armed Services Committee were briefed on allegations that Marines had purposely killed as many as two dozen Iraqi civilians in November.

The two developments were indications of the growing seriousness of two investigations into the incident in Haditha that has led to charges from a congressman that Marines killed civilians "in cold blood."

"When these investigations come out, there's going to be a firestorm," said retired Brig. Gen. David M. Brahms, formerly a top lawyer for the Marine Corps. "It will be worse than Abu Ghraib -- nobody was killed at Abu Ghraib."

An Army lawyer who has heard some accounts of the investigation said, "It's a lot more serious than people thought at the beginning. It's really bad timing," coming as the repercussions of the Abu Ghraib detainee abuse scandal are waning, he added. He requested anonymity because he is on active duty and not authorized to be interviewed.

If so, the case is likely to make it more difficult for the Bush administration to bolster support for the war.

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was briefed Wednesday by Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Marine commandant, and again yesterday by Brig. Gen. John Kelly, the legislative liaison for the Corps. Warner described the case as consisting of "very, very serious allegations" that resulted in "a significant loss of life, civilian."

Hagee flew to Iraq yesterday "to reinforce the ideals, values and standards" of the Corps, the Marines said. "There is a risk of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life, as well as bringing dishonor on ourselves," Hagee said in a statement announcing his trip. "We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force."

Two military investigations of events in Haditha are expected to be completed soon, and charges could be brought by late June, according to a person familiar with some aspects of the case. A civilian lawyer tracking the case said he has heard from Marine contacts that there could be as many as a dozen court-martial proceedings.

At issue is what occurred on Nov. 19, 2005, after a Marine convoy was allegedly hit by a roadside bomb, killing Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas. An initial inquiry found that 15 civilians were killed in the crossfire of a subsequent Marine firefight with insurgents.

In April, the Marine Corps relieved Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani of his command of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marine Regiment, the unit involved in the incident. Two of his company commanders were also relieved of command. The 1st Marine Regiment is part of the 1st Marine Division and is based at Camp Pendleton, Calif., just north of San Diego.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) said last week that there was neither a bomb nor a firefight, and that 24 civilians had been killed "in cold blood."

"It's much worse than reported," said Murtha, who like Warner is a former Marine and maintains close ties with senior Marine officers despite his vigorous opposition to the war.

Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.), a retired Marine helicopter pilot, said in an interview he thought Hagee was doing the right thing.

"I was saddened, surprised and outraged that this could happen," Kline said. He said he thought the incident would be regarded as "a horrific aberration" for the Marines.

Afghanistan's Leader Visits Civilians Wounded In American Bombing (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 25 — President Hamid Karzai made a surprise trip to his hometown of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan today to visit civilians wounded in an American bombing raid earlier in the week amid one of the worst bouts of violence in the last four years.

Thousands of villagers have fled their homes and sought refuge in the city in the last few days after heavy fighting just 35 kilometers west of the city, and fighting and bombing continued.

Mr. Karzai made a fleeting visit to Kandahar, where he narrowly survived an assassination attempt in 2003, and promised a gathering of tribal elders that he would bring security to the region.

"He told us not to be worried about the situation, that let's see what happens and that we will bring security," said Haji Agha Lalai Dastagiri, a member of the newly elected provincial council in Kandahar who was present at the meeting.

"He promised the people of Afghanistan that he would build Afghanistan, that God would rebuild it, that the international community was with us and they would build Afghanistan and bring security to this region," said Haji Agha Lalai Dastagiri, a member of the newly elected provincial council in Kandahar who was present at the meeting.

"People were telling him we really need security, but that we do not need foreign troops, and helicopters and tanks anymore, we Afghans should take care of it," he said.

Meanwhile the American-led coalition in Kandahar said fighting continued in the Panjwai district just west of Kandahar Wednesday and coalition forces bombed the area again Wednesday night. Two suspected Taliban insurgents were detained, the military said in a press statement.

In the evening, troops clashed with a "sizable force of Taliban, who retreated into a house and continued fighting," the statement said. "Artillery and air support was used to destroy the enemy. Sporadic fighting continued through the night. We have no assessment of Taliban killed or wounded."

The numbers of civilian casualties in the bombing continued to rise. At least 35 civilians were killed and 15 wounded when United States planes bombed Taliban fighters in a village of Tolokan, west of Kandahar, on Sunday night, said Abdul Qadar Noorzai, the head of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission in Kandahar, who has been compiling numbers from accounts from families arriving at his office.

Villagers had traveled in to the city to report that 24 members of one family, living in a large mud-walled compound, had died and eight were wounded, he said. In a second bombing of a madrassah, nine civilians were killed and three were wounded, he said. Villagers had reported that they had buried 35 Taliban fighters who were also killed in the bombardment, he said.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

N. Korean sanctions

As this paper reported Tuesday, the Bush administration recently tightened economic sanctions on North Korea after learning that Pyongyang was selling its ship registry to U.S. and foreign companies here for two or three times the going rate for such so-called flags of convenience.

The registry provides cash for Pyongyang, but there also are signs that the ships flying North Korean flags do so to avoid inspections because of criminal activity.

Administration officials tell us the new sanctions followed the interdiction March 29 of the freighter MV Crystal off a European port. The ship was found to be engaged in migrant smuggling. The officials did not identify the owner by name but said it was a company incorporated in Delaware. Under the sanctions that went into effect May 8, the company will be forced to give up the North Korean registry.

Another North Korean-flagged vessel, the Rimyongsu, was stopped by Japanese authorities in 2005 and found to be carrying 6,500 counterfeit $100 bills, a North Korean specialty known as the supernote because of the high-quality forgery.

According to the International Transport Workers' Federation, most ships that sail under North Korean flags are bulk, cargo and fishing vessels. A report by the federation stated that out of 408 North Korean-flagged vessels, 187 were owned by North Korea and the rest were owned by a variety of states, including three U.S. companies. Most of the ships are owned by companies based in Cambodia, Comoros, Tonga, and Sao Tome and Principe.

Navy intercept

The U.S. Navy this week reached a milestone in its sea-based missile defense program. A modified SM-2 interceptor missile launched from the Hawaii-based Aegis cruiser USS Lake Erie successfully shot down an incoming short-range test missile in the final few seconds before impact.

It was the first sea-based intercept of a ballistic missile in the terminal, or last stage, of flight.

The target missile was destroyed by a combination of the SM-2's direct contact with it as well as an explosive blast, Pentagon officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0029610

"We believe it is an important step towards the desired end-state of a robust sea-based terminal ballistic missile defense capability," Rear Adm. Barry McCullough, director for surface warfare on the staff of the chief of naval operations, said of the test. He noted that the new system "begins to meet an immediate near-term concern of our combatant commanders."

The only other terminal missile defense available is the land-based Patriot PAC-3 system.

There is no current sea-based terminal defense, and the modified SM-2 is a "limited emergency capability" for sea-based terminal missile defense.

China threat

Call it good timing. Just as the Pentagon releases a report critical of communist China's brisk military buildup, a Defense Department hand and a radio talk show host came out with a book on why Beijing wants a military confrontation with the United States.

"Showdown: Why China Wants War With the United States" paints several scenarios for how China and the world's only superpower will clash one day.

"China may soon have the capacity to shut down the stock market, take out air traffic control and telephone satellite networks and hijack our electric power grid," writes Jed Babbin, a frequent fill-in for a variety of radio hosts across the country and a former senior Pentagon official; and Edward Timperlake, a Pentagon procurement official and former Marine fighter pilot. Both authors have written previous New York Times best-sellers.

The authors also save space for scolding democratic Taiwan, the island that China claims as its own.

"President Bush and his successors must take a 'tough love' approach with the Taiwanese," the authors write. "If the Taiwanese are unwilling to spend the necessary money to defend themselves they should be told in unmistakable terms that we will not spend blood and treasure in their defense. The Taiwanese need a big dose of reality."

Buyer and the vets

Veterans cannot recall the last time relations were so bad between the chairman of a congressional committee and the groups that go to bat for the country's millions of ex-service members.

It began when House Veterans' Affairs Committee Chairman Steve Buyer, Indiana Republican, changed the way the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars and other vets groups provide their views to his committee. The old practice was for joint hearings with the Senate committee counterpart, with individual sessions with each group's leader, who had plenty of time to testify.

Mr. Buyer has condensed those proceedings, according to the American Legion, and has pushed back the hearing date until after the president's veterans budget is delivered to Congress each February. Previously, the groups met with the committee in September as the White House formulated the federal budget.

Thomas Bock, the American Legion's national commander, said Mr. Buyer offered him three minutes to talk as part of a panel and then increased his time — by seven minutes. "I thought, 'What a slap in the face,' " Mr. Bock told us.

Earlier this month, Mr. Bock and representatives from three other leading vets groups sent a letter to Mr. Buyer.

"The fact that you have made a decision without consulting the [veterans service organizations] is on its face, disrespectful to our organizations and our millions of volunteer members that live and advocate for their fellow veterans and their families all across this great nation," said the letter, which was hand-delivered to every member of Congress. The groups called Mr. Buyer's attitude "hostile."

Matters got worse. Mr. Buyer fired back on May 12 that the letter was "a political stunt filled with falsehoods, innuendo and misrepresentations."

This week, the four veterans groups replied: "That you would label our attempt to speak to reason on this issue a 'political stunt' is both offensive and disingenuous in the extreme. Your implication that we are putting politics above service to veterans is disgraceful and a calculated misrepresentation." They asked for a meeting with Mr. Buyer sometime after Memorial Day.

Jeff Phillips, Mr. Buyer's spokesman, said in an e-mail: "Chairman Buyer heard from 19 veterans' groups in February, under this new schedule — before his committee wrote its views and estimates. That has never been done before. He also plans a 'look-back, look ahead' hearing in September for these groups. That's new, too."

Said Mr. Bock, "We never have had relations so strained with a committee chairman."

DOJ_NMG_0029611

DOJ:

Local Hero Receives Courage Award (WTEN-TV)

WTEN-TV, Albany, NY, May 26, 2006

Stephanie was honored at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day awards ceremony.

A local hero receives a national award; and if anybody deserved one, 15-year-old Stephanie Quackenbush does.

She is the Albany girl who fought off an armed attacker and then helped send him to prison. Today she received "The Courage" award.

And courage is something Stephanie has plenty of. So much, she was honored at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day awards ceremony. She shares the credit with her mom.

"I'm proud of myself, I just did everything my mom taught me to do," said Quackenbush.

There were words of praise from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales

"Today we honor all who work for our children, because they are our dreams and our future," says Gonzales.

Stephanie almost never lived to see her future. On June of last year, on the way to school she was attacked by a man armed with a butcher knife. Quackenbush fought and screamed, even after the man told her he was going to stab her.

Her screams got the attention of two men, as her attacker ran. He turned out to be 24-year-old Darius Ashley, who is serving 25 years in prison for the assault on Quackenbush, and the rapes of two other girls.

Stephanie's mom, Rhonda Quackenbush, says she is, "proud, very proud. She has four sisters and she taught us all a lot. She deserves it.

Stephanie also has words of advice. "Just for like young girls, fight back, scream as hard as you can. You have one chance, why not take it."

Stephanie's attacker also allegedly admitted to raping and killing Gretchen Perham, a classmate of Quackenbush. He has not been prosecuted for those crimes.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Reversal Could Be Long Shot, Legal Experts Say (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel And Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

For former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2, overturning yesterday's guilty verdicts will be a long shot, legal specialists say.

Mr. Lay was found guilty in a Houston federal court of conspiracy, securities fraud and wire fraud. He was also found guilty of bank fraud and misrepresentation in personal loans in a separate trial. Mr. Skilling was found guilty of conspiracy, securities fraud, making false statements and insider trading. Mr. Skilling was acquitted of some other insider-trading counts.

Sentencing was set for Sept. 11. Mr. Lay, 64 years old, faces a maximum penalty of 45 years in prison in the main trial, and he could get from zero to six months for each of the four separate bank charges; Mr. Skilling, 52, faces a maximum penalty of 185 years in prison. However, sentencing experts say that the actual sentences are likely to fall in the 12- to 25-year range.

The two are expected to seek reversals in the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which lawyers say is one of the more pro-government benches in the nation. It also would likely be the last stop for Messrs. Skilling and Lay, since the U.S. Supreme Court agrees to hear very few cases.

"Your typical white-collar defendant has a better chance of winning a Golden Globe award than getting his conviction reversed in the Fifth Circuit," says Brian Wice, a Houston lawyer who specializes in criminal appeals.

After the trial, Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli3, said the verdict "didn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence" and said he would soon file an appeal. "We have just begun the fight."

Mr. Lay said he was "shocked" at the verdict but didn't say whether he would appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0029612

Lawyers for the former Enron chiefs likely will raise a host of appellate arguments, including that the case should have been moved to another venue and that the defendants were adversely affected by having to stand trial together. Both defense lawyers had requested trials outside of Houston, where Enron's collapse had a particularly significant impact. Mr. Lay had requested to be tried separately.

But trial judges are given wide latitude over the conduct of a trial. And lawyers who attended the Enron trial say federal Judge Simeon Lake4, widely regarded as one of Houston's more fastidious judges, didn't make any obvious missteps. "Judge Lake is on solid ground," says Houston securities lawyer Christopher Bebel.

Here is a snapshot of issues that could be raised in an appeal:

• JURY INSTRUCTIONS: Over the defense's objection, Judge Lake included a controversial "deliberate indifference" instruction. Under this standard, the jury could find either Mr. Lay or Mr. Skilling guilty for closing their eyes to signs of criminal conduct that would otherwise have been obvious to them. The defense contended this instruction didn't apply either to the prosecution's or defense's theory of the case.

• VENUE: Judge Lake denied a request to move the trial out of Houston. The defense argued that Enron's implosion so infected Houston that they would be unable to get a fair trial there.

• PAIRING THE TRIALS: Judge Lake denied Mr. Lay's request to have his case tried separately from Mr. Skilling's. Mr. Lay might argue on appeal that he was unfairly prejudiced by the joint trial.

• IMMUNITY: Judge Lake and the government declined to grant immunity to numerous former Enron executives who might have testified on behalf of the defense. This stance regarding potential witnesses deprived the defendants of helpful testimony, they might argue.

Meantime, Messrs. Lay and Skilling shouldn't take heart from two other recent, high-profile appeals, legal specialists say. Last year, the Supreme Court reversed the 2002 conviction of Arthur Andersen LLP for obstructing justice by shredding documents related to its work for Enron. The Supreme Court held that the Andersen trial judge erred by not requiring the jury to find Andersen knew the document-shredding was unlawful.

The Andersen ruling, in turn, paved the way for former investment banker Frank Quattrone to win a reversal this year of his 2004 conviction for obstructing a government probe of Credit Suisse First Boston (now named Credit Suisse.) The Second Circuit concluded Mr. Quattrone was harmed by juror-instruction errors highlighted by the Andersen ruling.

Unlike the Andersen and Quattrone cases, however, the Enron trial dealt with "very well-settled law," says Samuel Buell, a professor at the University of Texas School of Law and a former prosecutor with the Enron Task Force.

Lay, Skilling Found Guilty (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — In a dramatic resolution to a landmark criminal case that defined an era of corporate fraud in the USA, a jury here found former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling guilty on all counts of conspiring to hide the company's financial condition in 2000 and 2001.

The verdict was a resounding victory for federal prosecutors who had spent four years building a criminal case against two men once celebrated as business visionaries.

It was also a total repudiation of Lay and Skilling, who both testified that Enron was a fundamentally sound company brought low in a market panic spurred by short sellers and negative media reports. The government had argued Enron was a speculative trading company that boosted its earnings through deceptive accounting and bogus claims about the growth potential of new business units.

The jury found Lay, 64, guilty of six counts of conspiracy and fraud. Skilling, 52, was convicted on 18 counts of conspiracy and securities fraud but acquitted on nine out of 10 counts of illegal inside trading.

Lay was not charged with inside trading, but in a news conference after the verdict was announced, jurors said Lay's incessant selling of stock in the months leading up to Enron's collapse was evidence of intent to deceive the public about Enron's financial health.

DOJ_NMG_0029613

The two men, who stood stoically in the courtroom while the verdicts were announced, even as their families and lawyers were overwhelmed with emotion, are scheduled to be sentenced on Sept. 11. Because of the magnitude of the financial losses caused by Enron's collapse into bankruptcy in December 2001, which erased more than $60 billion of market value, both men could spend the rest of their lives in prison.

As the verdicts were read, Lay's wife, Linda — a fixture in the courtroom throughout the four-month trial — slumped her head toward her husband's shoulder and fought back sobs.

On his way out of the courthouse, Lay said he was "shocked" by the verdict. "I firmly believe I am innocent of the charges against me as I've said from day one."

In a news conference after the verdict was announced, several jurors said they didn't believe that Lay and Skilling were unaware of the accounting manipulations that took place on their watch.

"I felt it was their duty to know what was going on," said juror Wendy Vaughan. Another juror, Kathy Harrison, declared, "No American is above the law."

Outside the courthouse after the verdict, prosecutors said the trial should send a message to executives who manipulate their companies' earnings. "No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules," said Sean Berkowitz, director of the Enron Task Force. "You will be held accountable for your actions."

Skilling And Lay Convicted Of Enron Conspiracy (FT)

By Sheila McNulty And Ben White

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

Former Enron executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were convicted on Thursday of fraud and conspiracy for their role in the energy trader's collapse, bringing a dramatic conclusion to a case that changed the face of US business.

The verdict provided the federal government with its most important victory in a five-year crackdown, which followed a white-collar crime wave that rattled investor confidence, wiped out thousands of jobs and destroyed billions of dollars in wealth.

Some of the jurors said they saw themselves as part of a bigger battle against corporate excess, an effort that prompted US lawmakers to pass Sarbanes-Oxley, which requires increased accountability from corporate executives and directors.

"This is undoubtedly the most challenging and heart-rending experience I've ever had," one of the jurors, Kathy Harrison, an elementary school teacher, said at a news conference. "I've fought on this battleground for American justice."

After five days of deliberations on the case, which involved the use of off-the-book partnerships to disguise debt, Mr Lay, former chairman, was found guilty on all six counts of wire fraud, securities fraud and conspiracy. In addition, Judge Sim Lake said he had found Mr Lay guilty of four counts of bank fraud in a separate case that was argued last week without a jury.

Mr Skilling, the former chief executive, was found guilty on 19 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, insider trading and making false statements. Mr Skilling was acquitted on nine of 10 counts of insider trading.

It is possible the two men could spend the rest of their lives in prison. Mr Lay, 64, faces up to 45 years. Mr Skilling, 52, faces up to 185 years. They are to be sentenced on September 11.

As the verdicts were read, Mr Lay's face turned grey. His wife and daughter covered their faces and sobbed. All five of his children huddled around him. Mr Skilling, whose wife was not at court, kept his face blank. Daniel Petrocelli, his lawyer, promised a "vigorous" appeal.

Legal experts said the verdicts showed jurors rejected defence arguments that there was no accounting fraud at the world's biggest energy trader, and that the collapse was sparked by a collapse in confidence caused by heightened scrutiny from regulators, analysts and the media.

Henry Hu, business and law professor at the University of Texas, said: "Symbolically, this is the end of the morality play. Enron has become a word that you can use to scare children. Average investors might not have followed some of the other cases, such as WorldCom and Tyco, but they followed this one. They knew who these guys were."

Jurors said their verdict was not reached because of one particular witness or piece of evidence, and confessed to changing their minds from day to day.

"You felt like a ping-pong ball,'' said Doug Baggett, a juror who manages a legal department, in a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0029614

Judge Lake said Mr Skilling's $5m bond was sufficient to release him until sentencing but told Mr Lay to surrender his passport and have his five children post their homes to back up his $5m bond.

Meanwhile, a consortium of US and European hedge funds had agreed to buy the international assets of Enron for $2.1bn in cash.

Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Case (WT/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON -- Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were convicted of conspiracy and fraud yesterday by a federal jury that laid blame for one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history squarely on Enron Corp.'s two former top executives.

Jurors found that the once-wealthy and powerful corporate chiefs repeatedly lied to cover up accounting tricks and business failures that led to its 2001 demise. The collapse wiped out more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

The verdict came in the sixth day of deliberations after a criminal trial that lasted nearly four months. Lay also was convicted of bank fraud and making false statements to banks in a separate, nonjury trial before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake related to Lay's personal finances.

The conspiracy conviction was a major victory for the government, serving almost as a bookend to an era that has seen prosecutors win convictions against executives from WorldCom Inc. to Adelphia Communications Corp. and homemaking diva Martha Stewart. The public outrage over the string of corporate scandals led Congress to pass the Sarbanes-Oxley act, designed to make company executives more accountable.

"The jury's verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies" said Rep. Michael G. Oxley, Ohio Republican, co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation. "Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

Lay was convicted on all six counts of conspiracy, securities and wire fraud against him in the corporate trial and all four in the personal banking trial. Former Chief Executive Officer Skilling was convicted on 19 of the 28 counts in the corporate trial, including one count of insider trading, and acquitted on the remaining nine.

Judge Lake set sentencing for September 11. The charges against Lay, who is 64, carry a maximum penalty in prison of 45 years for the corporate trial and 120 years in the personal banking trial. The charges against Skilling, 52, carry a maximum penalty of 185 years in prison.

As Judge Lake read the verdict from the bench, Lay tossed his head at hearing the first "guilty" on the conspiracy count. He clutched his wife's hand as he heard that word over and over again.

Lay sat with his wife, Linda; his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team; and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn. As Lay clutched his wife's hand, the three women leaned forward and began to sob quietly.

Skilling, sitting with his brother, Mark, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

The sentencing will come five years almost to the day after Skilling sold 500,000 shares of Enron stock for $15.5 million, for which he was convicted of insider trading.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," he told reporters outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works." Skilling said he will appeal.

Skilling's $5 million bond, which restricts him to the continental U.S., remains in effect. Lay, who surrendered his passport, posted a $5 million bond secured with family-owned properties at a hearing after the verdict.

"I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me," Lay said afterward. "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed He does work all things for good for those who love the Lord."

Jurors found that both men had repeatedly lied to cover a vast web of unsustainable accounting tricks and failing ventures at Enron.

DOJ_NMG_0029615

Both men testified in their own defense. But the panel rejected Skilling's insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives skimming millions in secret side deals, and that bad press and poor market confidence combined to sink the company.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying, very much so, and there were pieces in the testimony where I felt their character was questioned," juror Wendy Vaughan said after the verdict was announced.

The government's victory caps a 41/2 year investigation that garnered 16 guilty pleas from ex-Enron executives, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow and former Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey. All are awaiting sentencing later this year except for two, who either finished or are still serving prison terms.

Enron Executives Guilty On Most Counts (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — Former Enron executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling were found guilty today on most counts in their landmark conspiracy and fraud case.

In the end, the jury of eight women and four men embraced the testimony of a parade of former Enron executives who said Lay and Skilling lied publicly about the energy company's financial health and condoned, if not actively encouraged, the use of accounting tricks to boost reported profits and hide debt.

The verdicts, which were reached after the jury deliberated for more than five days, were read aloud in a Houston courtroom.

Lay, 64, the company's former chairman, was found guilty on all six counts of fraud and conspiracy. Former chief executive Skilling, 52, was found guilty of fraud and conspiracy in addition to one count of insider trading, 19 counts in all; he was acquitted of the nine remaining insider trading charges. One of the fraud counts against Skilling included the misstating of Enron's financial situation during the California energy crisis.

Sentencing was scheduled for Sept. 11. Lay faces a maximum of 165 years in prison while Skilling faces a maximum of 185 years, according to Associated Press.

Outside the courtroom, Skilling denied any wrongdoing, and his chief defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, vowed to file a "full and vigorous appeal."

"We fought a good fight," Skilling told reporters gathered outside the downtown courtroom. "Some things work. Some things don't."

A few hours later, Lay, accompanied by his wife, Linda, emerged from the courthouse to profess his innocence and his belief that "God, in fact, is in control, and indeed he does work all things for good."

But the former chairman said he was stunned by the verdict.

"Certainly, we are surprised. I think [it's] probably more appropriate to say we are shocked," said Lay in brief comments to reporters. "I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me, as I have said from day one."

Police mounted on horses kept the news media at bay as Lay and his entourage made their way from the courthouse into another building.

One of the jurors interviewed after the trial said that the testimony of former Enron treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., who is serving a five-year prison sentence for his role in the scandal, played an important part as they weighed the evidence.

"We kept on going back to that testimony to corroborate things," said school principal Freddy Delgado. "I believe that he was one of the best witnesses that was brought forward."

The decision of Lay and Skilling to take the stand in their own defense didn't help their case much, according to another juror.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying," said business owner Wendy Vaughn. But, "there were places in their testimony where I felt their character was questioned."

DOJ_NMG_0029616

Lay's sale of $20 million of Enron stock in 2001 months before the company collapsed also weighed heavily with jurors, with one expressing disgust at the transaction, which would not have to be reported until the following year. It was "a disgrace," said electrical designer Doug Martin.

The verdicts were perhaps the government's most important victory in its high-profile war against corporate corruption.

"The jury has spoken, and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country: You can't lie to shareholders. You can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interest," said Sean M. Berkowitz, head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, outside the courtroom. "No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules."

Fellow Enron task force member and Orange County federal prosecutor John C. Hueston said that the verdicts will make it harder for top executives to blame their company's problems on their underlings to avoid legal responsibility.

"CEO's cannot hide behind accountants. They cannot hide behind lawyers. They cannot hide behind claims of ignorance when they have been paid tens of millions of dollars to be the faithful stewards of shareholders and investors," Hueston said.

Enron's implosion was one of the most infamous corporate scandals in U.S. history. The energy company's failure wiped out more than 5,000 jobs and billions of dollars of stock market value. It also led to sweeping new regulations and legislation — particularly the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law — meant to curb corporate wrongdoing and restore confidence in companies' financial statements.

Lay and Skilling, who have insisted that they were made scapegoats for Enron's shocking 2001 collapse, became the headline targets of a massive crackdown on corporate wrongdoing that also resulted in charges against executives of such companies as WorldCom, Adelphia Communications, HealthSouth and Tyco International.

Enron's auditors, then-Big Five accounting giant Arthur Andersen, went out of business after being indicted for obstruction of justice in the wake of Enron's collapse. Testimony showed that Andersen employees shredded mounds of Enron-related documents after the federal probe was launched. The U.S. Supreme Court last July overturned the firm's 2002 conviction due to faulty jury instructions.

Lay and Skilling attempted vainly to have their trial moved to a location less saturated by media coverage of Enron's crash, but there were few places in America where the news hadn't penetrated.

"Just the mention of the name Enron evokes images of duplicity and greed," Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of enforcement for the Securities and Exchange Commission, said at the time of Lay's July 2004 indictment.

An Oscar-nominated documentary film and a handful of mass-market books were spawned by the scandal. Feisty Enron whistle-blower Sherron S. Watkins, in addition to co-authoring a book, launched a lucrative second career lecturing on business ethics.

An investigation by the Enron Task Force, created by the Department of Justice shortly after the company's Dec. 2, 2001 bankruptcy filing, has resulted in charges against more than 20 people.

The Enron trial lasted 56 days, including one day for jury selection, one day for opening statements and three days for closing arguments. The prosecution team took 30 days to present its case. The defense took 21 days.

The government called 22 witnesses and the defense 31, including Lay and Skilling. Lay spent five days on the witness stand. Skilling testified for eight days.

Lay and Skilling argued that there was no crime at Enron, other than that committed secretly by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew S. Fastow. Times staff writer Jesus Sanchez in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

Enron Leaders Found Guilty (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 -- A federal jury found former Enron chairman Kenneth L. Lay guilty of every one of the half-dozen counts with which he was charged and convicted his protege Jeffrey K. Skilling of 19 more on Thursday, pinning them with responsibility for one of the era's biggest and most damaging business frauds.

Jurors deliberated for less than six days over a trial that took almost four months and was more than four years in the making. As they filed back into the courtroom, jurors avoided eye contact with the defendants and their families. Skilling rose first and stood impassively, holding his hands pressed together in front of him and exchanging words with his brother, while the judge read aloud "guilty" after "guilty."

Lay, who sat beside his weeping wife and daughter, bowed his head at Skilling's predicament, then stood and braced himself as the judge handed down a rapid-fire series of guilty verdicts against him. Relatives and friends of both men buried their heads in their hands and murmured "no" as individual jurors affirmed their ruling.

Moments after the verdicts, U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III asked Lay to stand for a second time, finding him guilty of four counts of bank fraud and making false statements in a separate trial, related to personal loans. The judge then demanded that the once-powerful executive who had dominated this city's business and cultural circles surrender his passport and fork over a $5 million bond. At the bond hearing, Lay's wife and three of the couple's children pledged their homes on the promise that he would not abscond before he is sentenced.

"I am not going to let him leave this building until his passport is surrendered," Lake said firmly. The judge ordered both men to return to the building for sentencing on Sept. 11, the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks that the defense blamed for contributing to Enron's misfortunes.

Skilling's lawyer Daniel M. Petrocelli appeared at microphones set up on the courthouse steps just minutes after the verdict was read and vowed a "full and vigorous" appeal.

"We have just begun to fight," he said, standing beside his client, who appeared composed. Skilling, whose wife and three children were not present for the verdict, was among the first to race out of the courtroom when the judge left the bench. Skilling was heckled by a few members of the public who camped outside the courthouse alongside scores of cameramen and reporters. Two police officers on horseback patrolled the area, trying to keep order, stopping traffic so Lay and a phalanx of relatives could cross the street and make their way home.

Skilling, 52, and Lay, 64, once stood near the pinnacle of American business, as the energy trading powerhouse they created out of a stodgy pipeline company grew to become the nation's seventh-largest public company. But much of their fortunes collapsed in a heap along with the business in December 2001.

Now the two men, who together invested close to $70 million in their defense, face the possibility of spending the rest of their lives in prison and living in history as the ringleaders of a fraud at a company whose name became synonymous with accounting tricks and rule-breaking.

"Certainly, we're surprised, and it's probably more accurate to say we're shocked," Lay told reporters outside the courthouse. Earlier in the day, he held hands with a circle of family members and prayed alongside his pastor inside the courtroom well. "I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me. . . . Most of all, we believe in the fact that God is in control."

Jurors, on the other hand, said they believed Lay and Skilling were firmly in charge as the company veered into financial problems, rejecting the defense that Enron fell victim to a market panic fueled by skeptical news reports; the terrorist attacks; investors who bet the stock price would drop; and concerns about the ethics of Andrew S. Fastow, then Enron's finance chief.

"Both defendants said they had their hands firmly on the wheel," said juror Freddy Delgado, an elementary school principal. "To say you didn't know what was going on in your company . . . was not the right thing to do."

Enron's bankruptcy filing cost thousands of workers their jobs, spooked investors into doubting the integrity of the stock market and spurred lawmakers to enact the most significant changes to corporate practices in more than 70 years.

Another jury member, payroll manager Carolyn Kuchera, said panelists managed to do their jobs at nights, on weekends and during breaks in the long case. "We were responsible, we were always accountable, we tied up the loose ends, and I think those [Enron] employees were entitled to the same thing."

Both Lay, who once mingled with members of the Bush family and earned the nickname "Kenny Boy" from the president, and Skilling, who during boom years convinced Wall Street analysts of Enron's genius and his own, took the witness stand in an effort to deploy their legendary salesmanship on their own behalf. But, in 14 days of testimony, neither man proved convincing, jurors said.

DOJ_NMG_0029618

The eight-woman, four-man jury issued its verdict after hearing evidence over 16 weeks from 56 witnesses, including eight insiders who pleaded guilty and testified against Lay and Skilling. None, however, mattered more than the defendants themselves.

In contrast to his grandfatherly, genial public image, Lay angrily attacked prosecutors for deigning to investigate his $77.5 million of stock sales back to Enron in the months before its demise, an issue that did not form the basis of criminal charges but nonetheless struck juror Don Martin as a "disgrace," he said later. Skilling suffered memory lapses about key events and tried to outwit the government by spinning long explanations for such things as problems in Enron's retail and broadband units.

Federal prosecutors prevailed despite the lack of documents that directly linked the men to a scheme to boost earnings and conceal billions of dollars in debt. From the start of the trial Jan. 30, government lawyers signaled they would skim over arcane business issues and instead focus on whether the defendants misled analysts and investors in a series of optimistic public statements designed to prop up Enron's stock price.

"The jury has spoken, and they have sent a powerful message," said Justice Department Task Force Director Sean M. Berkowitz. "You can't lie to shareholders. You can't put yourself above employees' interests. . . . No matter how rich you are, you have to play by the rules just like anyone else."

Skilling, whom prosecutors characterized as the mastermind of the fraud, resigned abruptly in August 2001, passing the torch back to his mentor. He faced a total of 28 charges of insider trading, conspiracy, securities fraud and making false statements. Jurors acquitted Skilling of nine of the 10 insider-trading charges because, they said, they did not have sufficient evidence. Forewoman Deborah Smith, a human resources manager, explained the move by saying: "Not guilty equals not proven. It does not equal innocent."

Lay faced six more-narrow charges based on his leadership of the company after he stepped in upon Skilling's departure, a decision that he testified he grew to regret bitterly. Prosecutor John C. Hueston told reporters that Lay had a "golden opportunity" to come clean about Enron's problems but instead chose time and again "not to tell the unvarnished truth."

The Enron investigation has been the most sophisticated and painstaking white-collar criminal probe in history, Justice Department officials said, producing convictions of 18 people. Enron's collapse also helped topple accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP, convicted of obstructing justice for tampering with documents related to Enron in 2002. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously overturned the verdict last year because of faulty jury instructions -- one of many issues Lay and Skilling are likely to argue in their own extensive appeals.

Enron's implosion in late 2001 put substantial pressure on the Bush administration, which had developed close ties to Lay, to distance itself from business malfeasance. Within months, President Bush mobilized federal agencies and launched a corporate-fraud task force that has convicted more than 1,063 people, including 167 corporate presidents and chief executives and 36 chief financial officers.

"This was the most important corporate scandal of our lifetimes," said securities-law historian Joel S. Seligman. "It was one of the immediate causes of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the governance reforms of the New York Stock Exchange and NASD, and the most consequential reorientation of corporate behavior in living memory."

Lay and Skilling have yet to resolve civil lawsuits filed by former shareholders who seek billions of dollars. But they may have to stand in line behind the federal government, which is seeking the forfeiture of Lay's $4 million penthouse apartment and Skilling's $5 million Mediterranean-style mansion, among other assets.

Two Enron Chiefs Are Convicted In Fraud And Conspiracy Trial (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 — Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the chief executives who guided Enron through its spectacular rise and even more stunning fall, were found guilty Thursday of fraud and conspiracy. They are among the most prominent corporate leaders convicted in the parade of scandals that marked the get-rich-quick excesses and management failures of the 1990's.

DOJ_NMG_0029619

The eight women and four men on the jury reached the verdicts after a little more than five days of deliberations. Mr. Skilling was convicted of 18 counts of fraud and conspiracy and one count of insider trading. He was acquitted on nine counts of insider trading. Mr. Lay was found guilty on six counts of fraud and conspiracy and four counts of bank fraud.

The conspiracy and fraud convictions each carry a sentence of 5 to 10 years in prison. The insider trading charge against Mr. Skilling carries a maximum of 10 years.

Both men are expected to appeal. Judge Simeon T. Lake III, the judge in the case, set sentencing for Sept. 11. Until then, the two men are free on bail. If they lose their appeals, Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay face potential sentences that experts say they believe will keep them in prison for the rest of their lives. Mr. Skilling, who had few family members in attendance, reacted with little emotion as the verdict was read, briefly searching the audience's faces and later striding confidently alone out of the courtroom ahead of his lead lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," Mr. Skilling said as he left the courthouse, "but that's the way the system works."

Once jurors and the judge cleared out of the courtroom, Mr. Lay's family members huddled around him. Elizabeth Vittor, Mr. Lay's daughter and a lawyer who had worked on his defense team, sobbed uncontrollably. Two local ministers also leaned in and hugged Mr. Lay, whose family members soon formed a circle in the courtroom, with arms over shoulders, and cried together. "I know, I know," Mr. Lay said in a soothing voice to several of them, as they clutched at his suit coat.

After he emerged from court, Mr. Lay said, "I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me."

In televised remarks he said, "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed he does work all things for good for those who love the Lord."

For a company that once seemed so complex that almost no one could understand how it actually made its money, the cases ended up being simpler than most people envisioned. Mr. Lay, 64, and Mr. Skilling, 52, were found guilty of lying — to investors, employees and regulators — in an effort to disguise the crumbling fortunes of their energy empire.

The 12 jurors and 3 alternates, who all agreed to talk to about 100 reporters at a news conference after the verdict, said they were persuaded — by the volume of evidence the government presented and by Mr. Skilling's and Mr. Lay's own appearances on the stand — that the men had perpetuated a far-reaching fraud by lying to investors and employees about Enron's performance.

The panel rejected the former chief executives' insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few underlings who stole millions in secret side deals. And the jurors said they did not believe that negative press and failing market confidence combined to sink the company.

"The jury has spoken and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country that you can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourself in front of your employees' interests, and no matter how rich and powerful you are you have to play by the rules," Sean M. Berkowitz, the director of the Justice Department Enron Task Force, said outside the courthouse.

For years, Enron's gravity-defying stock price made it a Wall Street darling and an icon of the "New Economy" of the 1990's. But its sudden collapse at the end of 2001 and revelation as little more than a house of cards left Enron, with its crooked E logo, the premier public symbol of corporate ignominy. Investors and employees lost billions when Enron shares became worthless.

Enron's fall had a far greater impact than on just the energy industry by heightening nervousness among average investors about the transparency of American companies. "The Enron case and all the other scandals and cases that trailed after it may have finally punctured that romance with Wall Street that has been true of American culture for a while now," said Steve Fraser, a historian and author of "Every Man a Speculator: A History of Wall Street in American Life."

At Enron, Mr. Skilling was the visionary from the world of management consulting who spearheaded the company's rapid ascent by fastening on new ways to turn commodities, like natural gas and electricity, into lucrative financial instruments.

Mr. Lay, the company's founder, was the public face of Enron. Known for his close ties to President Bush's family, he built Enron into a symbol of civic pride and envy here in its hometown of Houston and throughout the financial world.

The verdicts are a vindication for federal prosecutors, who had produced mixed results from their four-year investigation of wrongdoing at the company. The investigation resulted in 16 guilty pleas by Enron executives, and four convictions of Merrill Lynch bankers in a case involving the bogus sale of Nigerian barges to the Wall Street firm.

DOJ_NMG_0029620

Last year, however, the Supreme Court, blaming flawed jury instructions, overturned the obstruction-of-justice verdict that sounded the death knell for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, Enron's outside auditor. And a jury either acquitted or failed to agree on charges in the fraud trial of former managers of Enron's failed broadband division.

In the 56-day trial, defense lawyers repeatedly criticized prosecutors for bringing criminal charges against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, saying the government had set out to punish the company's top officers regardless of what the facts might be. The lawyers said the government was criminalizing normal business practices and accused prosecutors of pressuring critical witnesses to plead guilty to crimes they did not commit.

The defense lawyers also complained about a lack of access to witnesses who they contended could have corroborated their clients' versions of events. Several jurors said they would have liked to hear from more witnesses, in particular Richard A. Causey, the chief accounting officer, whom neither side called. "To me, he was a missing link," said a juror, Douglas Baggett, an administrative manager for a corporate legal department at Shell.

The Enron trial, more than any other, punctuates the era of corporate corruption defined by the failure of WorldCom, the telecommunications giant whose bankruptcy following revelations of $11 billion in accounting fraud exceeded even Enron's in size; the prosecution of Frank P. Quattrone, the technology industry banker; and scandals at Tyco, Adelphia and HealthSouth.

Mr. Lay was forced to remain in the courthouse for more than three hours after the verdict was announced for a hearing on securing a $5 million bond, which will come from a mix of financial pledges from his children, and to surrender his passport.

Judge Lake will have broad discretion in determining the former executives' sentences.

He is not known for his leniency. Two years ago he sentenced Jamie Olis, a former midlevel executive at Dynegy, an Enron competitor, to 24 years for his role in a scheme to disguise the company's finances. An appeals court last year ordered the judge to revise the sentence. A hearing is set for June 9. The guilty verdicts could have limited impact on a spate of civil cases. "They are not the ones who are going to pay the billions of dollars in additional recoveries that we hope to obtain on top of the $7.2 billion we already have from banks in our previous settlements," said William S. Lerach, the lead lawyer in the largest civil case, set to go to trial in October.

From the beginning, the Enron leaders' trial was not what many people expected after revelations of secret off-the-books schemes that earned a small fortune for Andrew S. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, and his cadre of co-conspirators. Some of those transactions were used by Mr. Fastow without approval by anyone to enrich himself at Enron's expense; others were used to manipulate Enron's financial reports with what Mr. Fastow testified was the full knowledge of his bosses.

Rather than delve into those intricate structures, prosecutors focused on what they cited as the false statements Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay made to employees and outside investors.

The "lies and choices" theme transformed the case into a test of credibility between the former chief executives and the more than half a dozen witnesses from inside Enron who testified for the government.

During the trial, the government called 25 witnesses and the defense called 31, including Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay. Government witnesses, including the former Enron treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., testified that the executives had sanctioned or encouraged manipulative accounting practices and then crossed the line from cheerleading into outright misrepresentations of financial performance.

Mr. Fastow's emotional turn on the stand offered some of the most devastating evidence against Mr. Skilling, and to a lesser extent, Mr. Lay. He said he had struck "bear hug" side deals with Mr. Skilling guaranteeing that his off-the-books partnerships, called LJM, would not lose money in their dealings with Enron. Mr. Fastow also described how Mr. Skilling had bought into using the LJM's to bolster earnings.

But Mr. Fastow's own admitted history of extensive crimes at Enron was dissected by Mr. Petrocelli, and jurors said they did not find Mr. Fastow particularly persuasive. "Fastow was Fastow," said a juror, Donald Martin, shaking his head. "We knew where he was coming from."

The jurors said they were moved, in contrast, by the testimony of Mr. Glisan. "We kept on going back to that testimony to corroborate things," said one juror, Freddy Delgado, a school principal.

DOJ_NMG_0029621

The surprise testimony of David W. Delainey, the former chief of a retail unit called Energy Services, also helped pave the way for Mr. Skilling's conviction. Mr. Delainey, who pleaded guilty to fraud, said that Mr. Skilling took part in a decision to shift some $200 million in losses from Energy Services to the more profitable wholesale energy division to avoid having to admit to investors that Energy Services was failing.

On the stand, Mr. Skilling offered differing and confusing explanations for the shift. He proved evasive and sometimes forgetful, and he revealed a highly emotional demeanor rarely seen among the stoic class of chief executives.

His resignation in August 2001, after only six months as chief executive, led to a bout of heavy drinking as a depressed Mr. Skilling watched in horror as the company he helped build edged closer to the brink.

For Mr. Lay, a turning point came when Sherron S. Watkins, the former Enron vice president, took the stand to describe how she confronted him with concerns about Enron's accounting. Ms. Watkins suggested that the subsequent investigation Mr. Lay ordered was intentionally limited in scope to conclude that there were no problems.

Other issues plagued Mr. Lay's defense, most notably his own testiness on the stand and the sudden illness of his lead lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, a well-regarded criminal defense lawyer who was forced to miss more than a month of the trial because of coronary disease that required two operations. Mr. Lay, in part because of his own strained finances, decided to carry on without Mr. Ramsey rather than seek to delay the trial and fight another day.

Ignorance Claim Did Not Sway Enron Jury (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Kyle Whitmire

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 — One after another, the jurors spoke and, in different voices, it all added up to the same thing.

They simply could not believe, the eight women and four men of the jury explained in an extraordinary joint news conference after rendering their verdict, that Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling were telling the truth when they claimed they didn't realize that something was rotten at Enron.

How, they repeatedly wondered, could Enron's former chief executives not have known what was going on?

The jurors said they found the testimony by Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling in their own defense — which many legal experts had warned could prove to be their undoing — both revealing and damning.

Freddy Delgado, an elementary-school principal, questioned how the two men could testify that they "had their hands firmly on the wheel" at Enron and then say that they did not know about the improper accounting and the intensifying financial problems?

After all, parents hold him accountable for their children's welfare and safety. "I can't say that I don't know what my teachers were doing in the classroom," Mr. Delgado said. "I am still responsible if a child gets lost."

"So I would say that to say that you didn't know what was going on in your own company," Mr. Delgado added, "was not the right thing."

After sitting through a 16-week trial and listening to 56 witnesses, the jurors finally had a chance to speak. And gathering together in a sixth-floor room at the federal courthouse here, several blocks from Enron's former headquarters, that's exactly what they did.

In other high-profile cases, many jurors quickly dispersed to avoid reporters. But all of the Enron jurors, including the three alternates, attended the hourlong session. Facing dozens of reporters and TV cameramen, they calmly and patiently answered questions, appearing unburdened and frequently cracking jokes. If they had any doubt or hesitation about the verdict they had reached in the biggest corporate corruption case in recent American history, they didn't show it.

The jury included people of widely different backgrounds — a dairy farmer, payroll manager, two engineers, a ship inspector, county court clerk, personnel manager, retired sales assistant and dental hygienist — but they drew on their own life experiences, making clear that they thought of themselves as responsible for knowing everything about their jobs. Certainly, richly paid corporate executives should, too?

They respected Mr. Lay's charitable, civic and political standing in Houston and Washington, they said, but ultimately concluded that he put his own financial welfare ahead of his duties to shareholders and employees.

DOJ_NMG_0029622

As for Mr. Skilling, jurors said they found his professed memory lapses and unfamiliarity with certain details incredible for someone who prided himself on having command over every area of Enron's operations.

"It is hard to believe," said Deborah Smith, the jury forewoman, "that someone, such a hands-on individual, could not possibly know the things that were going on within the company."

When the verdict was announced, Mr. Lay tried to console his sobbing wife while Mr. Skilling looked expressionless at the judge, turning briefly to search the faces of the audience.

But Nancy Thomas, who is retired and whose police officer husband is recovering from a stroke, shed a few tears as the verdict was read. Later, she said: "This is an emotional thing, there are too many people involved in it. There are human beings; there are families."

Before the trial, defense lawyers doubted they could ever find an untainted jury in Houston. Federal District Judge Simeon T. Lake III chose the jury in one day after the jurors filled out 14-page questionnaires. Some jurors expressed doubt about the innocence of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, yet were allowed on the panel.

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling were "greedy people" and that's what helped cause Enron's demise, Ms. Smith wrote on her jury questionnaire.

Jill Ford, another juror who made the panel, wrote: "I think they probably knew they were breaking the law."

Throughout the trial, the jurors showed a remarkable solidarity. On Valentine's Day, most of them wore red; during Mardi Gras they came to court donning colorful beads.

But throughout, as Judge Lake proudly told them on Thursday, they did not show up late a single day in the 56-day trial. One woman, an alternate who called in sick, was immediately booted from the jury by the judge.

For the jurors, the four months were an extraordinary period of personal sacrifice. Mr. Delgado said he struggled to keep his focus on school matters with only one day a week — Fridays — to be at school when the case was not in session.

"We've cried together, we've laughed together and we really, really became more than just friends," he said. "I believe that we are a family and we supported each other with all the different things that happened in our lives within these four months."

The jurors took two days to organize themselves, but by the third day of deliberations they began working through the counts one by one, according to Douglas Baggett, an administrator for a corporate legal department, who described the mood in the jury room in an interview at his home.

"After not being able to discuss the trial this whole time, the biggest thing we did in deliberations was to talk about how everybody felt," he said. "There were differing opinions."

The jurors said that they found it appalling that Mr. Lay had mismanaged his own finances and was selling his own Enron shares even as he assured employees and shareholders that the company was fiscally sound.

"I thought that was a disgrace," Donald Martin, an electrical designer, said.

A moment later Mr. Delgado echoed that thought. "That was very much the character of the person that he was. He cashed out before the employees did."

For Mr. Lay the decision came as a heavy blow that he went out of his way to prepare himself for. Just before the jury returned to the courtroom, Mr. Lay told his lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, that he would like to sit with his wife in the first bench of the visitors section.

"It's just never been done before," Mr. Ramsey told him.

"Why not?" Mr. Lay responded. "It's just as much her life as it is mine."

To Wendy Vaughan, Mr. Lay "very much wanted to be in control when he spoke."

"He kind of commanded the room, I thought," Ms. Vaughan, who owns a gym and a roofing business, added. "He answered questions. He just seemed very focused, a little bit of a chip on his shoulder."

Some added that they would have still found the men guilty had they not taken the stand, though they would have been disappointed. "I would have always had questions if they had not taken the stand," said Kathy Harrison, an elementary-school teacher.

DOJ_NMG_0029623

Judge Lake commended and thanked the jurors for sitting through often obtuse and conflicting testimony. During the trial, they were shown thousands of pages of corporate documents and spreadsheets; they took 27 boxes worth of evidence with them into the jury room where they deliberated.

One juror contrasted their determination with Mr. Lay's and Mr. Skilling's approach to their top positions at Enron.

"Those of us that have full-time jobs, we did our jobs at night when we went home so tired we hardly knew who we were," said Carolyn Kuchera, a payroll manager. "We were responsible, we were always accountable and we always found a way to circle back around to tie up the loose ends."

"And I think those employees," she said about Enron workers, "were entitled to the same thing."

The jurors said they had become like a family and planned to drive in different directions at the end of the news conference and meet at an undisclosed location to celebrate the end of the trial.

Mr. Baggett said he and his wife planned to go out of town on Friday to celebrate their anniversary.

When asked what they had learned, several said they better understood corporations and the legal system.

Mr. Delgado, the principal, said he realized that "if I ever had to be defended, I would go with Mr. Petrocelli," he said, referring to Daniel Petrocelli, the well-regarded Los Angeles-based lawyer who defended Mr. Skilling. "If I had the money."

The jurors said they vacillated during the trial as prosecutors and defense lawyers offered competing explanations of the events going on at the company.

"Through 16 weeks of testimony, I would go home one night swayed in one direction," Mr. Baggett said. "The next day, when cross or direct began, it would go the other direction. And I think we all felt that — you felt like a Ping-Pong ball."

There did not appear to have been one inflection point when the jury became convinced of the defendants' guilt. Rather, they gradually made up their minds as they went over the voluminous evidence and the testimony by former Enron officials like Ben F. Glisan, a company treasurer who pleaded guilty and has already served the bulk of a five-year sentence. He was granted immunity from further prosecution to testify.

"I don't think I had made up my mind one way or the other until we entered into deliberations, and it all came together," Mr. Delgado said.

The jurors said they had at least some concern about the credibility of virtually every witness who took the stand, but decided that the sum total of the testimony and the evidence was enough to convict Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling.

"We turned to the evidence," said Ms. Smith, a human resources manager. "We put our own timeline in place and we thrashed it out."

Ms. Vaughan, the entrepreneur, said she wanted to believe the defendants but in the end could not square their version of events with the evidence and the testimony of other Enron executives.

"Early during the trial, I had an admiration for both men — just what they had accomplished in their careers," she said. "And it was sad to see that in the end it wasn't accomplished in a respectful manner, having to hurt so many people to get there."

Defendants Sunk By Their Testimony (WP)

By Carol Rust

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 -- Jurors in the Enron trial made it clear that it would have been better for former executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling if they'd kept their mouths shut and stayed off the witness stand.

Speaking shortly after a federal judge read their verdict, jurors said Lay's indignant outbursts while testifying in his own behalf made him seem "that he very much wanted to be in control -- he commanded the courtroom," said Wendy Vaughan, a Houston business owner.

"He was very focused, but he had a bit of a chip on his shoulder that made me question his character," she said.

As for Skilling, who spent days explaining the tedious financial inner workings of the once high-flying energy company, the jurors couldn't understand how he could know so much about that and not be aware of illegal business maneuvering, whether or not he was responsible for it personally.

DOJ_NMG_0029624

"Skilling was supposed to be a hands-on individual," said Freddy Delgado, an elementary school principal. "It's hard to believe a hands-on individual wouldn't know what was going on."

"When he got on the stand and knew what a [technically complicated] chart was and how it worked, we knew he was involved," Delgado said.

Elementary school teacher Kathy Harrison said she was glad Lay and Skilling took the stand during their trial. Had they not, "I would have always had questions," she said.

Jurors, who appeared from the start of the trial to form a close and cohesive unit, collectively hissed when one brought up Lay's testimony about how he felt his employees' pain, given his repeated multimillion-dollar stock sales in the weeks leading up to Enron's bankruptcy. During that time, Enron's human resources department was switching to a new savings program and employees couldn't sell their stock, which for many was their life savings.

Lay's stock sales "meant a lot," said legal department manager Doug Baggett. "It defined the word 'intent.' " "It went very much to the character of the person he was -- cashing out at the expense of employees," Delgado said.

Juror Carolyn Kuchera, a payroll manager, said most jurors worked nights and on weekends to maintain their personal and professional lives during the four months of testimony and less than six days of deliberations.

"The responsibility of Lay and Skilling -- all I can do is relate that to what we had to do," she said. "We did our jobs on nights, weekends and holidays. We would leave here to go to work. We were accountable -- those [Enron] employees deserved the same thing."

Speaking early Thursday afternoon in a sixth-floor jury assembly room, the jurors -- who dressed in red for Valentine's Day, wore Mardi Gras beads on Fat Tuesday and dressed in Western clothing on Texas Independence Day -- sometimes finished each other's sentences and voiced confidence that they had made the best decision possible after the biggest collective challenge in their lives.

"We answered all the questions, we tore the boxes [of evidence] apart and we looked at all the evidence," said jury forewoman Deborah Smith, who works in human resources. "We won't have to worry about this [decision] later because we did it right the first time."

"We didn't have a target of today. We were prepared to stay as long as it took to reach the verdict," she said. "We thrashed it out."

Beginning deliberations on such a complicated case, which practically required them to learn a new vocabulary of financial and business terms and Enron vernacular, "was like having a 25,000-piece puzzle dumped on the table," said Vaughan, who owns a roofing company and a fitness company and is a mother of two.

"And not all the pieces were there," added another juror.

Smith said they started by building their own timeline based on numerous dates and events they believed were pivotal to determining what happened in the company's final year, the time frame for the events that led to most of the government's charges.

They also reached conclusions on the credibility of the witnesses who took the stand, especially the government's witnesses, many of whom had pleaded guilty previously and whose testimony could affect their possible punishment.

"The people with plea bargains we questioned from different angles," said Don Martin, an electrical designer. "All their answers led to one result."

"Fastow was . . . Fastow," Martin continued, referring to former Enron finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who faces 10 years in prison for stealing millions from the company. "We knew where he was coming from, and we kind of discounted some of what he said, but we weighed all the stuff the government witnesses said, and their answers all came to the same conclusion."

Whenever there was doubt about credibility, jurors dug through the 10 crate-size boxes to find evidence to support or discredit the testimony.

The jury delivered not-guilty verdicts on all but one of Skilling's 10 insider trading charges. In deciding the answer to each charge, forewoman Smith said, "We went by the judge's instruction: 'Not guilty' means 'not proven.' "

Baggett said the government didn't provide enough evidence for insider trading.

DOJ_NMG_0029625

At one point Wednesday, jurors sent a note to U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, requesting the trial transcript. Usually, jurors can have part of trial testimony read back to them, although Lake asked them to be more precise in their request. In that note, jurors also asked for additional copies of the list of evidence.

On Tuesday, they requested speakers for the computer they were using. During the trial prosecutors had played tapes of conference calls to investors, which Lay and Skilling held several hours after they released quarterly earnings reports, as well as the tape of an employee meeting during which Lay encouraged his employees to buy more Enron stock, calling it "an incredible bargain." Government prosecutors revealed that Lay sold millions of dollars worth of Enron stock the same day.

"I don't think it's over," Vaughan said of Thursday's outcome. Both defendants plan to appeal. "Now that we have made our decision, it will be interesting to know if justice will be served or whether the almighty dollar will win again."

Several Factors Influence Sentences (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, May 26, 2006

After a Supreme Court ruling last year that gave judges more leeway to sentence criminals, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling could face prison terms of anywhere from 10 years to life, some legal experts say.

Amid the legal confusion, "There is ample discretion in the guidelines to impose what could essentially be a life sentence," said Barry Boss, an attorney at Cozen O'Connor.

Skilling's counts carry a maximum prison sentence of 185 years; Lay's, a maximum of 45 years, not including his separate convictions in a bank fraud case.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake will base their prison terms on several factors, including total dollar loss to investors, the number of people hurt by the fraud and whether Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, obstructed justice by lying on the witness stand.

If the judge finds that investment losses are more than $100 million, current guidelines recommend 10 to 12 years. If the losses are higher, the years rise, too.

Enron once had a $60 billion stock-market value, and if Lake finds Lay and Skilling responsible for a loss of 1%, that's $600 million, said law professor Peter Henning at Wayne State University.

Lake also will study other sentences before the Sept. 11 hearing, such as the 25-year prison term for former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers, said Douglas Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University.

The U.S. Sentencing Commission adopted tougher guidelines in 2003. But defense attorneys called the longer sentences draconian, including a 24-year prison term for Jamie Olis, a former Dynegy energy trader convicted of fraud, which was tossed out by an appeals court.

Last year, the Supreme Court ruled the guidelines "advisory," not binding, which makes it "much harder to predict what the courts will do," Henning said.

Enron's Impact On The Corner Office (CSM)

By Ron Scherer And Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

BRYN MAWR, PA., AND HOUSTON - The quiet, classic bank offices at Bryn Mawr Trust are a far cry from the hustle - and self-dealing - of Enron Corp., the former energy powerhouse of Houston.

But the tale of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, the Enron executives who were found guilty of most charges by a jury Thursday, has prompted change even at the gracious offices of the 117-year-old bank.

"This is the highest profile white-collar trial in the past 20 to 30 years and it has literally been watched by the world," says Thomas Ajamie, a securities-fraud lawyer in Houston. "The broader message to people in corporate America is: 'Don't lie to your investors or you'll go to jail.' "

Just ask the Bryn Mawr Trust's chairman and CEO, Ted Peters, who has been a banker for most of his career. Today, he can reel off the provisions of a reform law Congress passed in the wake of the corporate scandals of the late 1990s. The one that really gets his attention is his personal liability.

DOJ_NMG_0029626

"I could get 20 years in jail and a $5 million fine if [I] do something wrong purposely," he says during an interview at the white, limestone bank.

This is just one of the ways life for a CEO has changed since 2001, when the Enron collapse stunned the business world. The jury's quick - and overwhelming - verdict Thursday is likely to hammer home that sense of diligence to corporate America.

The jury found Mr. Lay, Enron's founder, guilty on all six counts of conspiracy and fraud against him. It found Mr. Skilling, the former CEO, guilty on 19 of the 28 counts he faced. Lay was also found guilty of four counts of bank fraud in a case heard the past few days by US District Judge Sim Lake.

Lay faces a maximum of about 165 years in prison and Skilling about 85 years, but they will both realistically get between 10 and 25 years each, says Gerald Treece, assistant dean of the South Texas College of Law in Houston.

Others expect the punishment will be greater. "I believe it will be the stiffest sentence for corporate crime in our history," says Jacob Zamansky, a securities fraud lawyer in New York who attended much of the Enron trial.

Today, CEOs can no longer use the excuse that they can't be responsible for other people robbing the company. They can't reward friends with a seat on the board of directors - today, the board must consist of knowledgeable people who will challenge company procedures when it's necessary. And, CEOs, if they choose to ignore the changes, could well be out of their jobs.

"This is part of a unified effort by state and federal authorities to wage war on white-collar crime," says Christopher Bebel, a former federal prosecutor and economic-crimes expert in Houston.

"This has undoubtedly had a powerful effect on the corporate mind-set. CEOs from Main Street to Wall Street are going to be more hesitant to deceive investors while lining their own pockets," says Mr. Bebel.

Since Enron, forced turnover at the top has doubled.

"The CEO used to be the pinnacle of a career, the reward for a long, hard slog," says Paul Kocourek, a senior vice president at Booz Allen Hamilton in San Francisco. "Now, it boils down to your performance - if it's not there you are probably not either."

One reason boards are starting to exert themselves more are changes in how board members are chosen. In the case of the Bryn Mawr bank, Mr. Peters says his predecessor, who had held the job for 20 years, would pick each board candidate. "He would announce, 'Here's Joe and he's from Villanova' and everyone would applaud, he would sit down and that would be that," says Peters.

"Now, it's an independent group that brings up names, and there is a whole involved process to get people with the right skill sets. A new director then meets me, and I spend a few hours with him or her talking about my vision for the company."

In the post-Enron era, a CEO must go beyond being a good manager, says Michael Kendall, a partner in the law firm of McDermott Will & Emery LLP based in its Boston office. "The concept is crisis management instead of risk spotting," he says. "You have to manage the crisis before it consumes you."

Peters's way of managing a crisis is notifying his board of directors as soon as he identifies a problem. "You tell the board right away," he says. "And if there are documents involved, you don't shred them, you don't delete e-mails, and you don't touch a thing."

The problems at Enron have highlighted to many companies the importance of implementing a code of ethics. Enron actually had a lengthy code of ethics but it was largely ignored.

One thing Peters has learned from the corporate scandals is that ethics comes from the top down. "A CEO has to make clear to people who work for him or her that ethics are non- negotiable," he says.

For example, the bank discovered an employee who used bank stationary to dispute personal claims with the Internal Revenue Service. He was fired, says Peters. "That might seem extreme, but it was against our code of conduct."

However, many executives today rail against what they see as the more onerous parts of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. A group called the Free Enterprise Fund is mounting a constitutional legal challenge to part of the act. It particularly wants to ease the financial burden on small- and medium-size companies.

"Sarbanes-Oxley was designed to prevent" the kind of fraud that brought down Enron and its top managers, says Bebel, the former federal prosecutor.

DOJ_NMG_0029627

Peters can certainly relate to the added cost of running a company in the post-Enron era. Today, it costs the company about $300,000 per year to manage its new responsibilities. "Hopefully, we get some good benefits from it," says Peters.

Verdict On An Era: Arrogance And Recklessness At Enron (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Guilty of crimes — and a whole lot more.

Regardless of whether the jury verdict against Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling is upheld, testimony from 56 days of trial has sealed what is sure to be history's judgment — one that is unlikely to be vulnerable to appeal.

The Enron case will forever stand as the ultimate reflection of an era of near madness in finance, a time in the late 1990's when self-certitude and spin became a substitute for financial analysis and coherent business models. Controls broke down and management deteriorated as arrogance overrode careful judgment, allowing senior executives to blithely push aside their critics.

Indeed, it could be argued that the most significant lesson from the trial had nothing to do with whether the defendants, both former Enron chief executives, committed the crimes charged in their indictments. Instead, the testimony and the documents admitted during the case painted a broad and disturbing portrait of a corporate culture poisoned by hubris, leading ultimately to a recklessness that placed the business's survival at risk.

"Enron is one of the great frauds in American business history," said James Post, a professor of management at Boston University. "But it is also a symbol of a particular era of management practice. The excesses of Enron point pretty clearly to what was going on in mainstream companies across the business landscape in the 1990's."

That may go a long way toward explaining how corporate America became infused in the late 1990's by what appeared to be a near endless amount of greed and criminality, leading to scandal at an array of corporate giants, from Enron to WorldCom, from Adelphia to HealthSouth.

It was not simply that the ethics of the corporate world changed overnight; the ever-rising bubble of market prices created a sense of invincibility among corporate executives, who read market delusions as proof of their own genius. Arrogance gave way to recklessness, which in turn opened the door to criminality.

That message was repeated throughout the trial of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay. Paula Rieker, an executive with the company's investor relations group, testified to her fear of correcting Mr. Skilling when he made what she considered to be false statements to investors. Vince Kaminski, a top risk analyst, spoke of how Mr. Skilling became increasingly difficult to contradict as Enron won plaudits from the marketplace. And Ben F. Glisan Jr., the treasurer, portrayed an "Emperor's New Clothes" culture, where no one was willing to challenge the rule-bending and recklessness as the company's executives charged into one ill-considered business line after another.

"I would think that most observers of this trial would be shocked and surprised that Enron was such a poorly run company for so long," said Stephen Meagher, a former federal prosecutor who now represents corporate whistle-blowers. "But as long as the checks kept coming in and the stock price kept going up, it was easy to look the other way and ignore the obvious clues that there were deep problems there."

Attention to the mundane details of business — debt maturity schedules, available cash, companywide risk — appeared to be almost second thoughts among the senior ranks of the company, if thought about at all. Instead, the focus was centered on marketing the image, not only of the company, but of its senior executives. It was an approach that met widespread success and was emulated throughout corporate America.

"This was the era of the story, the shtick, the celebrity," said Mr. Post of Boston University. "Lay and Skilling delighted in that, they loved becoming business and civic celebrities. They created the model for that kind of superexecutive C.E.O. in the 1990's. Meanwhile, they left all the details to people who were being driven by a troubled culture."

In the end, although many in the public seem to believe this was a case about the collapse of Enron, that had little to do with the criminal charges. In the closing arguments, the government made sure to separate allegations of criminality from responsibility for Enron's collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0029628

The testimony suggested that the bankruptcy was much more about a company gone out of control, with executives pushing to the financial edge on deals that received little attention and supervision once the transactions closed. But as that recklessness rotted the company from the inside, the jury found, Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay falsely portrayed a corporate ship where everything remained steady.

The testimony and evidence suggested that Enron executives could not even agree on what the company's business was. There was no doubt that Enron made the bulk of its profits from trading natural gas contracts. But trading companies rarely win stratospheric stock prices; the risks and requirements for credit in such businesses temper potential market enthusiasm. So some executives argued that Enron was not a trading company, but a logistics business — one involved in every step of the production and delivery of commodities — and therefore deserved its once-lofty stock price.

Putting new labels on the old wine didn't change the financial underpinnings of the business. Most trading companies, because of the knowledge that a sudden market bump can cause available cash to disappear maintain credit ratings of A and above to protect them in the downdrafts. Enron chose instead to maintain a credit rating just notches above junk, apparently in the belief that a bad day would never arrive.

That freed capital and allowed for borrowings that otherwise would not have been available, driving Enron's supposed "growth" strategy into new business lines, which almost all proved to be debacles. Throughout the trial, there was repeated testimony about Enron's disastrous forays into international power plants and water operations, which led to the company's acquiring billions of dollars in assets that lost huge value, becoming a financial albatross.

A result, when Enron finally faced a crisis, was that it was financially unable to weather the storm. Credit lines were largely tapped out, few assets had the equity necessary for additional borrowings and the liquidity needed for the trading business rapidly dried up. Those factors combined to push Enron toward collapse.

The trial underscores that neither defendant fully accepted what happened at the company. Mr. Lay testified that the collapse was largely caused by short sellers, critical articles in The Wall Street Journal, and a resulting panic in the marketplace.

But short selling, negative press and market concerns are issues that scores of companies deal with every year, without collapsing. Indeed, to some degree, Mr. Lay's argument was a bit like blaming a match for igniting a basement filled with gasoline. In this case, the accelerant was the poor condition of Enron's financial structure.

Those lessons about the importance of quality management and strong finances in avoiding scandal, experts said, have not been lost on the audiences that perhaps matter most: the managers of corporate America and the government regulators who keep an eye on them.

"Some people say this is the end of an era, but I don't think it is," said George A. Stamboulidis, a partner with Baker & Hostetler who was appointed a monitor at Merrill Lynch as part of that firm's settlement of an Enron-related case. "This fuels the government and boards and investors to continue to push for more accountability, more transparency and better management."

Those continued efforts, coupled with the changes of the past, should mean that the kind of troubles that emerged at Enron are less likely to appear on the corporate landscape.

"Hopefully," Mr. Stamboulidis said, "the ways businesses are run in 2006 are very different from the ways the businesses were run in the 1990's."

But others expressed fear that as long as huge sums of money can be earned by executives for cutting corners and being dishonest, collapses and scandals like Enron will continue to be part of corporate America.

"One of the things we know from social psychology is that incentives and greed really blind" corporate executives, said Arthur P. Brief, a professor at the A. B. Freeman School of Business at Tulane University. "And those incentives are still with us."

Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (AP)

By Kristen Hays, AP Business Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

Jury Convicts Former Enron Chiefs Kenneth Lay, Jeffrey Skilling of Conspiracy, Fraud

HOUSTON (AP) -- Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were convicted of conspiracy and fraud Thursday by a federal jury that laid blame for one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history squarely on Enron Corp.'s two former top executives.

DOJ_NMG_0029629

Jurors found that the men, who received tens of millions in pay and stock options, repeatedly lied to cover up accounting tricks and business failures that led to the company's 2001 demise. The collapse wiped out more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

The verdict came in the sixth day of deliberations following a criminal trial that lasted nearly four months. Lay was also convicted of bank fraud and making false statements to banks in a separate, non-jury trial before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake related to Lay's personal finances.

The conspiracy conviction was a major win for the government, serving almost as a bookend to an era that has seen prosecutors win convictions against executives from WorldCom Inc. to Adelphia Communications Corp. and homemaking maven Martha Stewart. The public outrage over the string of corporate scandals led Congress to pass the Sarbanes-Oxley act, designed to make company executives more accountable.

"The jury's verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies" said Rep. Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation. "Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

Lay was convicted on all six counts of conspiracy, securities and wire fraud against him in the corporate trial and all four in the personal banking trial. Former Chief Executive Skilling was convicted on 19 of the 28 counts in the corporate trial, including one count of insider trading, and acquitted on the remaining nine.

Lake set sentencing for Sept. 11. The charges against Lay, who is 64, carry a maximum penalty in prison of 45 years for the corporate trial and 120 years in the personal banking trial. The charges against Skilling, 52, carry a maximum penalty of 185 years in prison.

As Lake read the verdict from the bench, Lay tossed his head at hearing the first "guilty" on the conspiracy count. He clutched his wife's hand as he heard that word over and over again.

Lay sat with his wife, Linda; his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team; and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn. As Lay clutched Linda Lay's hand, the three women leaned forward and began to sob quietly.

After Lake left the courtroom, Lay's family and some friends gathered around him as the ex-chairman, red-faced and fighting back tears, hugged them and thanked them for their support.

Skilling, sitting with his brother, Mark, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

The sentencing will come five years almost to the day after Skilling sold 500,000 shares of Enron stock for $15.5 million, for which he was convicted of insider trading.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," Skilling told reporters outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works."

"We're going to stand behind him," his lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said. "As I told him, we've just begun to fight."

Skilling's $5 million bond, which restricts him to the continental U.S., remains in effect. Lay, who surrendered his passport, posted a $5 million bond secured with family-owned properties at a hearing following the verdict.

The Enron founder was also ordered to stay in the Southern District of Texas or Colorado, avoid contact with any victim of the offense charged, report to pre-trial services regularly and must not own a gun or use alcohol excessively or drugs.

"I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me," Lay said following the hearing. "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed he does work all things for good for those who love the lord."

Jurors found through their verdict that both men had repeatedly lied to cover a vast web of unsustainable accounting tricks and failing ventures at Enron.

Both men testified in their own defense. But the panel rejected Skilling's insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives skimming millions in secret side deals, and that bad press and poor market confidence combined to sink the company.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying, very much so, and there were pieces in the testimony where I felt their character was questioned," juror Wendy Vaughan said after the verdict was announced.

Lay was a campaign benefactor who President Bush nicknamed "Kenny Boy" when the two were up-and-comers in Texas. The Center for Public Integrity, a Washington-based nonprofit group, said the Lays had given $139,500 to Bush's political campaigns over the years.Those donations were part of $602,000 that Enron employees gave to Bush's various campaigns, making the company the leading political patron for Bush at the time of the company's bankruptcy in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0029630

Early in 2002, the White House disclosed that Lay sought help from two Cabinet members shortly before the company collapsed, but neither offered aid.

Speaking for the president on Thursday, White House press secretary Tony Snow congratulated the Justice Department on "successfully concluding a highly complex conviction."

The government's victory caps a 4 1/2 year investigation that garnered 16 guilty pleas from ex-Enron executives, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow and former Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey.

All are awaiting sentencing later this year except for two, who either finished or are still serving prison terms.

"You can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interests. No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules," prosecutor Sean Berkowitz told reporters outside the courthouse.

He expressed sympathy for the Enron employees who lost their life savings when the company collapsed.

"Nothing that happened today is going to bring that back for them. ... What we do hope is that today's verdict lets them know that the government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it."

Former employee Sherri Saunders, who lost $1 million in retirement savings when the company collapsed, found a bit of closure.

"To me, God has spoken to him with this verdict," Saunders said. "I guess it gives me a little comfort, but it doesn't put back my retirement money."

Prosecutor John Hueston, who sparred with Lay on the stand, said the founder had missed "a golden opportunity to save Enron.

"He made that choice to put his own interests ahead of that of the shareholders and investors. And he did that by choosing not to tell the unvarnished truth and he did it by choosing not to ask the hard questions."

Asked what was next, Berkowitz joked, "We're probably going to step aside and go get a well-deserved drink and an afternoon off."

The Enron case tested the government's ability to prove complicated corporate skullduggery. Its implosion and the subsequent scandals scared off investors, increased regulatory scrutiny over publicly traded companies and prompted Congress to stiffen white collar penalties.

The vast federal investigation seemed to stall until Fastow pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy and paved the way for prosecutors to secure indictments against his bosses. Fastow also led investigators to Causey, who was bound for trial alongside Lay and Skilling until he broke ranks with their unified defense and pleaded guilty to securities fraud just weeks before the trial began.

Philip Hilder, a former federal prosecutor who represents ex-Enron finance executive Sherron Watkins, said the convictions were "absolutely a comprehensive government victory," particularly given the speed of the jury's decision. Watkins tried to warn Lay of financial problems in the fall of 2001.

Hilder said that both men likely face "north of 20 years" in prison.

"This verdict encourages us ... to continue to combat corruption wherever we find it," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, at the Justice Department in Washington. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was recused from the Enron case because he once was a partner at Houston law firm Vinson & Elkins LLP, which represented Enron.

Associated Press writers Mike Graczyk, Erin McClam and Angela K. Brown in Houston and Mark Sherman in Washington contributed to this report.

Enron Jurors Find Lay, Skilling Guilty (HC)

By Mark Babineck, Mary Flood And John Roper

Houston Chronicle, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029631

A federal jury convicted former Enron chiefs Ken Lay on all counts and Jeff Skilling on most counts today, marking the climax of one of the most notorious corporate scandals in U.S. history and nearly ensuring prison time for two of Houston's best-known executives.

The jury heard 16 weeks of testimony and arguments and made its announcement early on its sixth day of deliberations. The eight-woman, four-man panel found Lay guilty of all six counts. They convicted Skilling on 19 of the 28 counts against him.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake set a sentencing date of Sept. 11. The two men remain free on bond.

In Lay's separate personal banking fraud trial, Lake found Lay guilty on all four counts.

After the verdict, Skilling and his attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, talked to the media outside the downtown courthouse and promised an appeal.

"Obviously, it did not come out the way we hoped. It doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron and it certainly doesn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence," he said. "As I told (Skilling), we've just begun the fight."

When asked whether he could admit that he had broken the law, Skilling replied, "No. I didn't."

"We fought the good fight," Skilling said. "Some things work; some things don't."

Shortly before 3 p.m., Lay also made a brief statement to the media outside the courthouse: "Despite what happened today, I'm still a very blessed man. At my left is this beautiful lady that's my wife. I have a very warm, loving family. And, most of all I believe God, in fact, is in control and that, indeed God works all things good for all who love the lord. We love our lord, all this will work for good."

The jury panel spent 16 weeks listening to often diametrically opposed testimony, with the government calling 25 witnesses plus three more on rebuttal. Several had struck cooperation agreements with the government and acknowledged crimes, and most claimed Lay and Skilling were part of a conspiracy to profit personally by duping the world about Enron.

"We stole. We all benefited financially at the expense of others," said former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, who is expected to serve a 10-year prison sentence after admitting he masterminded fraudulent bookkeeping schemes and bled Enron to the tune of $45 million in the process.

The defense impugned Fastow's character and told jurors he was a liar then and he's a liar now, implying he fabricated evidence and testimony that Skilling approved of "bear hug" deals with Fastow's LJM partnerships to hide Enron debt and guarantee Fastow wouldn't lose money.

The defense called 31 witnesses, including Skilling and Lay, many taking the stand in brief stints to rebut specific points raised by the prosecution. Of course, the most important men to testify were Skilling and Lay themselves.

Skilling, 52, went first on April 10 and testified over eight days, much of it on direct examination by his Los Angeles-based defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli.

Petrocelli, a career civil attorney trying his first criminal case, methodically took Skilling through each charge in four days of direct examination. Skilling had a reputation for being controlling and abrasive, but he seemed relaxed and downright professorial while telling jurors he committed no crimes, that most of Enron's dealings were legitimate and that the real criminal was Fastow.

One of Skilling's dramatic moments came on April 13, when Petrocelli seized on bubbling emotion and engaged his client in powerful exchange about what Skilling perceived as abuse of power by the Justice Department.

"We are innocent. And by 'we' I mean Enron Corporation," Skilling said. "It was a fine company. I am innocent of all of these charges, and I will fight for that for a long time."

Enron Task Force Director Sean Berkowitz began cross-examination the next week, and Skilling surprised many by keeping his cool despite pointed questioning that sometimes turned embarrassing and personal, such as his $180,000 stake in an ex-girlfriend's Internet startup company called Photofete that did business with Enron.

"Would you agree with me that this may be a conflict of interest, at least within the (company's) code of ethics?" Berkowitz asked.

"It may be," Skilling replied, appearing humbled.

Defense lawyers cited Photofete as a prime example of prosecutors seeking to smear Skilling and Lay, who also was an investor, by throwing information at the jury that is not part of the indictment.

"Don't come to Houston, Texas, and lie to us," Lay attorney Chip Lewis shouted at prosecutor John Hueston during closing arguments, referring to Photofete.

Lay, 64, took the stand April 24 and testified over six days. Contrary to Skilling's calm demeanor, Lay seemed easily irritated by defense attorney George McCall 'Mac' Secrest. Secrest was substituting for lead defender Michael Ramsey, who bowed out for much of the trial because of surgery.

Lay's demeanor turned from grouchy to hostile once Hueston began questioning, with fireworks popping as soon as cross-examination began when the prosecutor accused Lay of trying to contact potential trial witnesses to get their "stories straight."

Lay, sometimes snarling into the microphone, shot back at Hueston.

"I don't have a story. I have my recollection of the facts and they are totally different than Mr. Fastow's," Lay said.

In closing arguments, Berkowitz seemed to agree jurors should pay close attention to what Lay and Skilling said in the ninth-floor courtroom and contrast it to what they were told actually happened on the 50th floor of the Enron Building, a few blocks down Smith Street.

"They lied to investors and omitted critical facts," Berkowitz said. "And they lied to you, ladies and gentlemen, from the stand."

Berkowitz also reminded the jurors that justice for Lay and Skilling, who invested at least $38 million combined in their united defense, should not be bought.

Ramsey, who recovered in time to make some closing arguments, warned jurors that only they could judge the facts and not the host of politicians, columnists, jilted investors and prosecutors who want to see Lay and Skilling behind bars.

"There may be a court in America that bends to political pressure but it's not this court! There may come a day when an American jury yields to a media mob, but it's not this jury," said Ramsey, one of Houston's most-respected criminal lawyers. "We're going to have a fair jury here."

The attorneys and Lake took one day to pick the jury that heard the case. Many among the panel knew little about Enron, although some confided in questionnaires and in court that "greed" or misdeeds took the company down.

Tuning out Enron has been a neat trick in the Houston area over the past five years as the ruination of what was dubbed the nation's seventh-largest company has remained the dominant U.S. corporate scandal among a flurry of such implosions around the turn of the century. Scandal also enveloped companies like Worldcom, Tyco and Adelphia, but Enron always has been at the forefront.

That's especially so in Houston, where thousands of employees lost their jobs — 4,000 at once the day after Enron filed for bankruptcy on Dec. 2, 2001. Many lost their retirement savings, which was invested in near-worthless Enron shares.

SLICK EXECS TAKEN DOWN (NYPOST)

By Andy Geller

The New York Post, May 26, 2006

May 26, 2006 -- Former hot-shot execs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, who guided Enron through its spectacular rise and crashing fall, were convicted yesterday of orchestrating a massive fraud that made the energy company the symbol of corporate deceit in America.

After four months of testimony, a Houston federal jury, on the sixth day of deliberations, found Lay and Skilling guilty of fraud and conspiracy for lying about Enron's crumbling fortunes - to investors, employees and government regulators.

Lay, 64, the firm's ex-chairman, and Skilling, 52, its former CEO - who together spent close to $70 million on their defense - could spend the rest of their lives behind bars.

Enron's collapse in December 2001 wiped out $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

It led to a crackdown on corporate crime in which federal prosecutors won convictions against CEOs and domestic diva Martha Stewart. And Congress passed a law to make company executives more accountable.

Jurors said they didn't believe the claims of Lay and Skilling, who testified for a total of 131/2 days, that they were kept in the dark about Enron's problems.

DOJ_NMG_0029633

"To say you didn't know what was going on in your own company was not the right thing," said Freddy Delgado, an elementary-school principal.

"I think both defendants said they had their hands firmly on the wheel, so they didn't know what was going on?" he added. "Personally, I can't say, 'I don't know what my teachers are doing in the classroom.' I'm still responsible if a child gets lost."

Juror Wendy Vaughn agreed.

"I felt like in the position they were in, it was their duty to know what was going on and they should have gone farther to know what was going on," she said, adding that Lay's attitude on the witness stand may have worked against him.

He had "a little bit of a chip on his shoulder," she said. "It made me question his character at that point, how controlling he might be."

Lay - called "Kenny Boy" by his pal President Bush, to whom he made hefty campaign contributions - was convicted of six counts of securities fraud, wire fraud and conspiracy. In a related bench trial, he was also found guilty of bank fraud and making false statements to banks.

He faces a total of 165 years in prison.

As Judge Simeon Lake pronounced the first "guilty," Lay slumped, sighed heavily and shook his head.

As the judge repeated the word nine more times, Lay clutched the hand of his wife, Linda, and she leaned forward and began weeping.

Two other women sitting with Lay - his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team, and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn - also began sobbing.

After the judge left the courtroom, family and friends gathered around Lay, whose face was red and who was fighting back tears.

Lay, the son of a Baptist preacher, hugged them and thanked them for their support, saying, "God's got another plan right now."

He then clasped hands with them and they stood in a circle to pray.

"We'll all come through this stronger and more reliant on God," he told them.

Later, he proclaimed his innocence, declaring, "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed he does work all things for good for those who love the Lord."

Skilling, who was Lay's protégé, was convicted of 19 counts of securities and wire fraud, conspiracy, making false statements to auditors and one count of insider trading. He was acquitted of nine other counts of insider trading.

He faces 185 years behind bars.

Skilling, sitting with his brother, Mark, appeared shaken at the verdict and left the courtroom quickly.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," he said outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works."

His lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said he would appeal.

"We've just begun to fight," he said.

"We've had a trial, and obviously it did not come out the way we hoped. It doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron. And it certainly doesn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence," he added.

The prosecution was jubilant.

"The government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it," said lead prosecutor Sean Berkowitz.

"You can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interests. No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules."

The defendants will be sentenced Sept. 11 - almost five years to the day that Skilling sold 500,000 shares of Enron stock for $15.5 million, for which he was convicted of insider trading.

Lake allowed Skilling to remain free on $5 million bond, rejecting a prosecution request to place him in home confinement.

Lay, who also remains free, was ordered to surrender his passport.

"I'm not letting him leave this building until his passport is surrendered," the judge said.

The former Enron chief was also ordered to post a $5 million cash bond.

DOJ_NMG_0029634

It was a stunning reversal of fortune for Lay and Skilling, who transformed Enron from a sleepy natural-gas company into the nation's seventh-largest corporation and the world's largest energy-trading company.

Enron was one of Bush's biggest backers, with company employees donating $602,000 to Bush's political campaigns. Lay and his wife donated $139,500.

Then came the fall.

In December 2001 the company filed for bankruptcy, revealing it was little more than a house of cards that used accounting tricks and off-the-books partnerships to hide billions in losses and company debt.

In the wake of the collapse, the feds cracked down on corporate crime.

CEOs of WorldCom, HealthSouth, Adelphia Communications and Rite Aid were prosecuted for accounting fraud or looting company treasuries.

All were convicted of fraud except HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy, who now is on trial in Alabama on unrelated bribery charges.

Public outrage led to the passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, designed to make company executives more accountable.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), the lead author, said "we should punish the bad apples and that's obviously what happened in Texas. They undermined confidence in our markets."

"The jury's verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies," agreed Rep. Michael Oxley (R-Ohio), the co-author. "Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

In presenting their case, prosecutors did not accuse Lay and Skilling of creating the off-the-books partnerships and accounting tricks.

Instead, they argued that the two men knew about them and repeatedly lied to cover them up.

In Lay's case, one of those lies was a lie of omission. When he urged employees to buy Enron stock in September 2001, he failed to tell them he had sold $70 million in stock back to the company.

And just before the bankruptcy, he used stock proceeds to pay off the mortgage on his home.

Those facts infuriated juror Don Martin.

"I thought that was a disgrace," he said. "It was horrible. People had all their money tied up [in pensions] and they can't touch it and he's out paying his house payment."

Delgado added, "It was very much the character of person he was. He cashed out before the employees did."

The witnesses against Lay and Skilling included a parade of ex-Enron executives.

Former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow testified that Skilling encouraged him to set up the partnerships to hide losses, "juice" the company's earnings and help meet quarterly forecasts.

The feds' investigation seemed to stall until Fastow pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy, paving the way for prosecutors to win indictments against his bosses.

Skilling impressed the jury - and hurt his defense - when he stepped off the witness stand and used a complicated chart to explain Enron's trading activity.

"I would have always had questions if they had not taken the stand," said juror Kathy Harrison, an elementary-school teacher. "That helped reaffirm it for me."

Added Delgado: "To say he's [Skilling] not involved, that's not credible."

In the end, the jurors said they were convinced by the tales of the witnesses that Lay and Skilling knew more than they were willing to admit.

"There was too much evidence interlinked," Delgado said. "Even if the government persuaded them, twisted their arm, whatever, you cannot get all of them to say the same thing and point to the same evidence." With Post Wire Services

Lay, Skilling Convicted Of Fraud That Doomed Enron (Update9) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029635

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, who built Enron Corp. into the nation's seventh-largest company and then drove it into bankruptcy, were convicted of orchestrating a fraud that made the energy trader the symbol of corporate deceit in America.

Jurors in federal court in Houston deliberated six days before finding Lay, Enron's former chairman, and Skilling, its former chief executive officer, guilty today of fraud, conspiracy and other charges for lying to investors about the company's finances. The panel heard four months of testimony before reaching its verdict.

``The government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it," said Sean Berkowitz, head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, which conducted the prosecution. ``You can't lie to shareholders and put yourself in front of your employees' interests."

Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, face at least 25 years each in prison after being convicted of using off-the-books partnerships to disguise Enron's debts. Skilling faces additional jail time over his conviction for using inside information to sell Enron stock. Lay was also convicted on bank fraud charges after a trial that U.S. District Judge Sim Lake held without a jury while the panel in the main case deliberated.

``Obviously I'm not real happy with this," Skilling said in the courtroom after the verdict. ``It is what it is." Skilling maintained his innocence and his lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said he would appeal.

Surrender Passport

Lake said he would sentence the defendants on Sept. 11. Skilling is allowed to remain free on $5 million bond and doesn't have to be put in ``home confinement" as prosecutors sought, Lake said.

Lay surrendered his passport after the judge said he wasn't allowed to leave the courthouse until he did so. Lay posted a $5 million bond, co-signed by his wife and children. He's restricted to living in Colorado and the southern district of Texas, and the routes to and from those places.

``I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me," Lay said outside the courtroom. ``We believe God in fact is in control and he does indeed work all things for the good."

Both men face spending the rest of their lives in prison if they are given maximum sentences. After the verdict was announced, the color drained from Lay's face and his wife and daughter burst into tears. Skilling's wife wasn't in the courtroom.

``We've had a trial, and obviously it did not come out the way we hoped," Petrocelli said. ``It doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron. And it certainly doesn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence."

Government Crackdown

Enron, once the world's largest energy trading firm, had more than $68 billion in market value before its December 2001 bankruptcy filing wiped out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight. Investors suing over the company's collapse claim accounting fraud at the Houston-based firm caused at least $25 billion in losses.

``I think investors can feel validated in that the legal system worked here," said Mark Ross, partner at Sichenzia Ross Friedman Ference. ``On a bigger picture, it will instill confidence back in the capital markets in America."

In the wake of Enron's meltdown, government prosecutors cracked down on corporate crime. CEOs of WorldCom Inc., HealthSouth Corp., Adelphia Communications Corp. and Rite Aid Corp. were prosecuted for accounting fraud or looting company treasuries. All were convicted of fraud except HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy, who now is on trial on unrelated bribery charges in Alabama.

Punish Bad Apples

We should ``punish the bad apples and that's obviously what happened in Texas," said Senator Paul Sarbanes, a Maryland Democrat. Sarbanes is the co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, passed to improve corporate reporting. ``They undermined confidence in our markets."

The eight-woman, four-man jury convicted Skilling on 19 of the 28 charges against him while finding Lay guilty of all of the six counts against him. The government presented a total of 25 witnesses against the men, including a parade of former Enron executives.

DOJ_NMG_0029636

``It's safe to say each of them is facing north of 20 years real jail time," said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and co-author of Federal Sentencing for Business Crimes. The calculation of the size of the fraud will play a part in determining the exact sentence. ``There's going to be a mini- trial on sentencing issues."

`Kenny Boy'

Prosecutors should feel vindicated as well, said Behre, now a partner at Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker in Washington. ``This case epitomizes a new paradigm of corporate criminal prosecutions. We now hold the highest-level executives responsible for the misconduct of the company. These two guys are as high as they get."

Enron contributed nearly $6 million to federal parties and candidates between 1989 and 2001, more than two-thirds to Republicans, according to OpenSecrets.org, the Web site of the Center for Responsive Politics.

More than $2 million of that money came during the 1999-2000 election cycle, when the company became one of the biggest backers of President George W. Bush's bid for the White House. Lay personally raised at least $100,000 for the campaign, and Bush used to refer to him by the nickname ``Kenny Boy."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said today the Justice Department was to be congratulated for concluding a ``highly complex" case. ``The administration has been pretty clear, there's no tolerance for corporate corruption," Snow said when asked about the guilty verdicts.

Fastow Testimony

Former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow told jurors Skilling helped orchestrate a scheme to use off-the-books partnerships to hide billions in losses and debts racked up by the company. Other executives said Lay took over the effort to deceive investors about Enron's finances after Skilling stepped down as CEO.

Lawyers for the two men argued that prosecutors sought to criminalize normal business practices and that their clients were victims of thieving subordinates like Fastow.

Fastow, who pleaded guilty to fraud charges stemming from Enron's collapse, told jurors that Skilling encouraged him to set up the partnerships to ``juice" the company's earnings and help meet quarterly forecasts. Fastow agreed to serve 10 years in prison for committing fraud at the company.

The defense sought to discredit Fastow, noting he'd stolen more than $20 million from Enron in partnership-related deals and had hidden his actions from Skilling and Lay.

Glisan Effective

Former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan testified that Skilling endorsed using the partnerships to overvalue assets and disguise losses and touted them because they allowed the company to ``circumvent accounting rules." Glisan pleaded guilty to fraud charges and is serving five years in prison. After the verdict was announced, a juror said the jury referred to Glisan's testimony throughout its deliberations.

Glisan said Lay assigned him in August 2001, after Skilling left as CEO, to lobby credit-rating companies to allow the company to write off more than $1 billion in losses without suffering a debt rating downgrade.

Other witnesses, including former Enron investor relations executives Mark Koenig and Paula Rieker, testified that Lay misled analysts about the performance of some of the company's units as the firm deteriorated in the fall of 2001.

Lay and Skilling took the witness stand to try to convince jurors they hadn't presided over fraud at Enron and that prosecutors strong-armed their former colleagues into testifying against them.

Life on the Line

Skilling, who told jurors his ``life was on the line" in the case, said the government investigation of Enron became a ``witch hunt" that resulted in the charges against him and Lay.

Skilling denied being part of any effort to manipulate earnings and dismissed Fastow as a thief and a liar. He sparred with prosecutors, accusing them of twisting facts about Enron's performance to blame the company's demise on him and Lay.

Lay, whose father was a Missouri farmer and a Baptist preacher, earned a masters degree in economics from the University of Missouri in 1965. After a stint with Humble Oil in Houston, he joined the Navy in 1968 and worked as a purchasing officer at the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0029637

After the Navy, Lay worked at the Federal Power Commission and then the Department of the Interior. After that he joined Florida Gas Co., eventually becoming president. He moved to Transco Energy Co. in 1981 and joined Houston Natural Gas Corp. in 1985, where he was chief executive officer.

In 1985, Houston Natural Gas merged with Omaha, Nebraska- based InterNorth Inc., another pipeline company, and Enron was born.

Great Fall

`It's a stunning verdict," said John Carney, a former federal prosecutor now at Baker & Hostetler. ``It's the end of a chapter but not the end of a book. Enron was an icon of American business. Ken Lay was one of the most revered and respected CEOs in the country. To see him go like that is probably one of the greatest falls in business history."

Skilling joined McKinsey & Co., a management consulting firm,, after his 1979 graduation from Harvard Business School. McKinsey counted Enron's predecessor, InterNorth, as a client, and Skilling joined Enron in 1990. He became president and chief operating officer in 1997 and chief executive officer in February 2001, upon Lay's initial departure from the company, only to quit in August.

``I've had my fingers, my legs and everything else crossed hoping this verdict would come down in the manner and form that it has," said Raymond Plank, chairman of Houston-based oil and gas producer Apache Corp. ``I feel justice has been served. My primary interest is to see them serve a long, long sentence."

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Lay And Skilling's Day Of Reckoning (CNNM)

By Shaheen Pasha And Jessica Seid, CNNMoney.com staff writers

CNN/Money, May 26, 2006

Enron ex-CEO and founder convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges; sentencing slated for September.

HOUSTON (CNNMoney.com) - Enron former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling and founder Kenneth Lay were both found guilty Thursday of conspiracy and fraud in the granddaddy of all corporate fraud cases.

On the sixth day of deliberations, a jury of eight women and four men convicted the former executives of misleading the public about the true financial health of Enron, whose collapse in late 2001 symbolized the wave of corporate fraud that swept the United States early this decade.

Ex-Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling walks away from reporters in Houston after a jury found him guilty of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, false statements and insider trading.

Skilling was found guilty on 19 counts of conspiracy, fraud, false statements and insider trading. He was found not guilty on nine counts of insider trading.

Lay was found guilty on all six counts of conspiracy and fraud. In a separate bench trial, Judge Sim Lake ruled Lay was guilty of four counts of fraud and false statements. (Click here for the defendants' reactions)

Both Lay and Skilling could face 20 to 30 years in prison, legal experts say. And Lay will also face an additional hefty term in prison for his conviction in the bank fraud case.

"I think absent a successful appeal, they will both die in prison," said Jamie Wareham, global chairman of litigation at the international law firm Paul Hastings. "When you're a judge that's concluded that two men have lied to you for hours and hours and hours, light sentences aren't going to flow."

Judge Lake set sentencing for Sept. 11 and ordered Lay to surrender his passport and post a $5 million bond. No home confinement was ordered but homes owned by Lay and his children were used as an assurety for the $5 million bond.

Skilling's attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, told reporters outside the courthouse, "We will have a full and vigorous appeal."

"The jury saw it differently," Petrocelli said, referring to his client's maintaining his innocence. "We'll take it from here."

Wareham said the defendants don't have a large amount of appeal platforms, but he expects lawyers will try to raise the issue that both men were tried in Houston, the epicenter of Enron's implosion. Defense attorneys had attempted unsuccessfully to have the venue changed prior to the trial saying it was impossible to get a fair trial in Houston.

Jurors react

DOJ_NMG_0029638

All 12 jurors and three alternates speaking to reporters after the verdict insisted that the decision was one of the hardest they had to make, given compelling arguments from both sides. But ultimately, they agreed that the evidence, corroborated by the line of witnesses presented by the prosecution, proved too strong to ignore.

"This is undoubtedly the most difficult, heart-wrenching experience I've ever had in my life," said Kathy Harrison, an elementary school teacher who served on the jury. "I performed my duty as an American citizen. I've never fought on a foreign battleground (but) I fought on this battleground for American justice."

Jurors said of the 22 witnesses for the prosecution, the first witness, Mark Koenig - who served as Enron's head of investor relations - and Ben Glisan, the former treasurer of Enron who is the only executive currently serving time in jail, were the most persuasive given their knowledge of details at the company.

But Andrew Fastow, Enron's former financial chief who was long considered to be a star witness for the prosecution, was less effective, jurors said.

"Fastow was Fastow," said Donald Martin, an electrical designer who served on the jury. "We knew where he was coming from."

The defense has long contended that Fastow's treachery brought down the company and he cut a deal with the prosecution, requiring him to testify against his former bosses, to receive a lighter sentence.

Wendy Vaughn, a juror who owns two businesses, said that from the beginning she admired both Lay and Skilling's brilliance and talent as businessmen building up Enron. But she said "it was sad to see in the end, it wasn't accomplished in a respectful manner."

She added that Lay's demeanor on the stand ultimately worked against him.

"He seemed very much wanting to be in control," she said. "He seemed to have very much of a chip on his shoulder... it made me question his character."

And the jurors said both men seemed to be hands-on executives, making their testimony that they relied on the advice of others questionable.

"Both said they had their hands on the wheel," said Freddy Delgado, an elementary school principal. "I can't say I don't know what my teachers are doing. To say that they didn't know what was going (on, it) wasn't right they said that."

Delgado added that the jury pored through the facts and he didn't believe anyone could question the fairness of the Houston jury.

"Houston should be proud," he said.

Tears in the courthouse

Skilling stood stone-faced as he was convicted on most of the counts he faced. Skilling's wife and children were notably absent.

Petrocelli had his hand on his client's shoulder, bracing him.

As Lay's verdict was read, his daughter Elizabeth Vittore, who has been one of his attorneys during the case, began to sob uncontrollably. His wife, Linda, clutching his hand, wiped tears away silently. All of his children sat in the front row with other members of the family. One of his sons put his face in his hands and wept.

Lay clutched his wife's hand and looked straight ahead.

Speaking to reporters outside the courthouse, Lay expressed shock at the verdict and continued to maintain his innocence as his wife Linda stood by his side.

"I firmly believe I am innocent of the charges," he said. "Despite what has happened I'm still a very blessed man."

Outside the courtroom after court was adjourned, Skilling said, "We fought a good fight. Some things work. Some things don't."

"Obviously I'm disappointed, but that's the way the system works," he added.

Enron employees rejoiced at the verdict. (Click here for full story.)

A huge scandal

The verdict is a major victory for the government, and marks the end of one of the most scandalous chapters in the history of corporate America.

The Enron government task force exited the courthouse at 2 p.m. ET and was greeted with applause. In a statement to the press, lead government prosecutor Sean Berkowitz said, "The eyes of the world have been on this courthouse and they have seen the justice system at work."

"No matter how rich you are, you have to play by the rules," he added.

Berkowitz said that he was proud of everybody on his team and the personal sacrifice they had made, adding they would all "go out and get a drink."

In Washington, Department of Justice officials praised the Enron prosecutors and said the conviction will encourage the government to go after more such cases.

"Our laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as against street criminals," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. "No one is above the law."

The White House had no comment on the verdicts except to congratulate the Justice Department for winning convictions in a "highly complex" case. Lay was a major fund-raiser for President Bush, who gave him the nickname "Kenny Boy."

"The administration has been pretty clear - there is no tolerance for corporate corruption," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Houston-based Enron, once one of the hottest companies on Wall Street, imploded in a matter of months after Skilling abruptly resigned as CEO in August 2001. Lay, who was chairman at the time, postponed his retirement plans to return to the helm.

Enron's collapse marked the first of the high-profile corporate scandals that rocked the nation, followed by WorldCom, Global Crossing, Adelphia and Tyco. The wave of fraud led to passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law that tightened oversight of how American companies are audited.

After a government investigation that took 4-1/2 years, prosecutors presented evidence that Lay and Skilling orchestrated a conspiracy to artificially inflate profits, hide millions in losses and misrepresent the true nature of the company's finances.

The long-awaited trial began Jan. 31 in Houston.

Enron's bankruptcy, the biggest in U.S. history when it was filed in December 2001, cost 4,000 employees their jobs and many of them their life savings. Investors lost billions of dollars.

Over 16 weeks, the government presented 22 witnesses, including former top executives, who testified that Skilling and Lay fostered a culture that put the company's image and stock price above everything else, at any cost.

Sixteen people pleaded guilty for crimes committed at the company, and five others, including four former Merrill Lynch employees, were found guilty at trial. Eight former Enron executives testified against Lay and Skilling, their former bosses.

Jurors: Ex-Enron Execs Not Credible (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling said they always relied on the lawyers and accountants who signed off on Enron's earnings statements. Jurors said they should have relied on the truth.

In a decisive conclusion to an epic trial here Thursday, a federal jury convicted the two men of lying to investors five years ago about the financial health of Enron, the company they both led as CEOs.

By convicting the pair of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and related crimes, the 12 jurors rejected Lay and Skilling's primary defense: that they believed Enron's earnings statements were fair and accurate because those statements had been blessed by internal accountants and lawyers.

Instead, the jury agreed overwhelmingly with government prosecutors, who argued that the men used their power to bully and cajole subordinates into painting an artificially positive picture of Enron's earnings for investors.

“The defense was built around a reliance on auditors, attorneys and staff, and trying to get people to believe that as CEOs, they knew absolutely nothing about fraud when they were getting paid millions,” says Lynn Turner, former chief accountant of the Securities and Exchange Commission. “Other executives are going to understand that this type of defense isn't plausible anymore.”

DOJ_NMG_0029640

The guilty verdict in the biggest criminal case to emerge from the wave of corporate frauds that rattled investors from 2001 through 2003 is a significant triumph for the Enron Task Force. That team, formed in January 2002 to investigate wrongdoing after Enron's sudden collapse, has secured 16 guilty pleas from former Enron employees but has failed to win convictions of several prominent former executives.

It is also a significant victory for the Justice Department's push to restore integrity to the corporate boardroom. Last year, a federal jury in Manhattan convicted former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers of encouraging his subordinates to cook his company's books. The year before, former Adelphia CEO John Rigas was convicted of fraud and misuse of investor funds. Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau won a conviction last year of former Tyco CEO Dennis Kozlowski and his CFO, Mark Swartz.

The only significant failure in the Justice Department's campaign against corporate fraud occurred in Alabama last year, when a federal jury acquitted former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy of masterminding a $2.7 billion fraud, even though five former CFOs testified against Scrushy.

In discussing that case after the verdict, several jurors seemed confused about what the government was trying to prove against Scrushy. In the Enron trial, government prosecutors wanted to avoid the same mistakes.

After Enron's collapse in 2001, Lay and Skilling became poster boys for corporate misbehavior and were widely blamed in the media for the fraud that was found at Enron.

But to win criminal convictions in federal court, prosecutors needed actual proof of guilt against the two men. And, because there were no e-mails tying Lay and Skilling directly to the fraud, prosecutors made a strategic decision to focus the trial on whether Lay and Skilling told the truth in public, not if Enron's accounting was illegal.

To that end, perhaps the biggest single break for the prosecutors occurred in December, a month before the trial was to begin, when Richard Causey, the former chief accounting officer of Enron, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud.

Originally, the government was going to put Causey on trial alongside Skilling and Lay. That would have made the case more difficult to win because it would have required the Enron Task Force to delve deeply into Enron's convoluted accounting, which could have confused the jury. Prosecuting Causey would also have added two months to the trial, which could have exhausted the jury.

Instead, with Causey out of the picture in a plea deal, prosecutors could focus their case against Lay and Skilling exclusively on whether the two men were honest in statements to employees, analysts and investors.

In his opening statement on Jan. 31, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Hueston said the government's case was not about accounting but the choices Lay and Skilling made when speaking to the public in 2000 and 2001.

Defense lawyers tried to divert the case into the thicket of accounting rules, but prosecutors wouldn't budge. Throughout February and March, the government elicited testimony from 22 witnesses, many of them cooperators who had pleaded guilty to lesser charges in exchange for the promise of more lenient prison sentences. With almost every witness, prosecutors banged away at the same theme: Lay and Skilling lied to the outside world about what was going on at Enron.

In April, when the defense put on its case, it was clear both Lay and Skilling had to testify. Ultimately, jurors said, the testimony of the two men wasn't as credible as what came from all the government witnesses, whose stories corroborated one another. “I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying,” said juror Wendy Vaughan after the verdict. “At the beginning of the trial, I admired both men. I thought they were brilliant. It was sad to see in the end it wasn't accomplished in a respectful manner.”

According to the jury, Skilling was undone by his own brilliance, which was evident on the stand. In two weeks of testimony, the former McKinsey consultant who revolutionized the energy industry by turning the mundane business of delivering natural gas into a wildly successful futures market, instructed jurors about the intricacies of Enron's businesses. At one point, he told in detail how Enron used a statistical risk model, dubbed VaR for “value at risk,” to insulate itself from gyrations in commodities markets.

“For a man who knew every aspect of the business, why didn't he know what was going on?” asked juror Doug Baggett, legal department manager at a Houston company.

DOJ_NMG_0029641

As for Lay, jurors said they were impressed with the many civic and charitable contributions he made in Houston, but his outward generosity didn't excuse what happened at Enron. “Outside the company, he was a very nice person,” said juror Don Martin.

“Mr. Lay did many great things,” added Kathy Harrison. “All of this is a tragedy. Bad choices and bad decisions don't take away from what he did for the community.”

For Lay to win an acquittal, he was going to have to convince the jury that he wasn't aware of any wrongdoing at Enron. His attorneys also wanted him to tell the inspiring story of rising from humble roots in rural Missouri to the pinnacle of American business. But in telling his story on the stand, Lay sounded angry, blaming prosecutors for turning his life into a nightmare, and even snapping at his own attorney on occasion.

“He seemed very much to want to be in control,” said Vaughan. “He commanded the room.” Lay also seemed “to have a chip on his shoulder,” she said. “It made me question his character at that point.”

Worse than Lay's demeanor on the stand, jurors said, was evidence presented by the government that while Enron was collapsing, he quietly sold $70 million in stock back to Enron while urging employees to buy more.

On the witness stand, Lay explained that he had accumulated about $100 million in bank debt, secured largely by his Enron stock holdings. As the value of that stock dropped through 2001, he received margin calls from the banks and, therefore, sold his stock back to Enron to pay off his debts.

But when prosecutors confronted him with a statement he made to employees declaring that he was buying stock himself, Lay said he didn't consider “forced” sales of stock to be the same as “discretionary” sales. The distinction seemed lost on the jury.

Martin labeled the secret sales “disgusting” and “horrible,” while Baggett said they provided evidence of Lay's “intent.”

Michael Moran, an Enron retiree who serves as co-chairman of a special employee committee created by the bankruptcy court, said he was satisfied with the verdict: “It brings to closure one of the final chapters of the Enron saga. I would have been extremely disappointed had the jury come back and found Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling not guilty.”

The Enron Task Force is currently trying to convict several executives from the company's broadband unit and has asked that three British bankers be extradited from the UK to face charges that they were part of one fraudulent scheme at Enron. But for all practical purposes, the conviction of Lay and Skilling is likely to end the Justice Department's investigation of fraud at what was once the USA's seventh-largest corporation.

It's standard practice for prosecutors to declare, even after a victory, that an investigation into wrongdoing is “ongoing.” Thursday, basking in the glory of a big win outside the federal courthouse, prosecutor Hueston wouldn't go that far. Instead, he said, “The investigation may be ongoing.”

Trial Fails To Answer Many Questions About Spectacular Collapse (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Some of the most tantalizing questions about what really happened at Enron Corp. remain unanswered -- and in all likelihood will stay that way.

The convictions of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay1 and former President Jeffrey Skilling2 on a majority of the conspiracy and fraud charges against them cap a long drive by the government to prosecute crimes associated with the Houston company's spectacular collapse into bankruptcy. As the Enron prosecutorial effort winds down after four years of forensic digging, it has become clear that the government moved quickly in the wake of the 2001 scandal to demonstrate to an angry public that a cop was on the beat, the guilty would be punished and the system purged of corruption.

Yet none of the trials produced new pieces of evidence that could be termed "smoking guns," despite the fact prosecutors had broad subpoena powers and access to Enron records and internal documents that weren't available to the public. Some of the big questions linger, seemingly beyond the reach of the trials.

The questions involve Enron's finances and tactics, and the motivations of many former employees. For example, it still isn't clear how much Enron made or lost off its vaunted energy-trading, energy-services and broadband units. It also isn't known how much money Enron reaped by exploiting the California electricity market during the 15-month crisis that began in the spring of 2000. Even after all the trial testimony, it isn't clear how long Enron could have continued to operate, absent the scandal that engulfed it in 2001, or just how much Messrs. Skilling and Lay knew about the company's off-balance-sheet partnerships.

DOJ_NMG_0029642

"A criminal trial is not designed as a search for the truth," said Joseph Beeler, a partner at Ferrell Law in Miami and past president of the American Board of Criminal Lawyers. The mission is to "dispense justice in an individual case, and those who expect more are bound to be disappointed."

Instead of answering important social or philosophical questions, trials are adversarial contests in which prosecutors attempt to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendants committed certain narrowly defined crimes.

"The system is designed to focus on relevant and material information," and exclude nearly everything else, said Mark Biros, a former federal prosecutor who is now managing partner of the Washington office of Proskauer Rose LLP. "That's why people walk away somewhat dissatisfied."

The just-completed trial of Messrs. Skilling and Lay is a case in point. Because a third defendant, former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey12, pleaded guilty just before the trial began, the case against Messrs. Skilling and Lay became simpler and less focused on the nitty-gritty of how Enron operated. So, while the defendants insisted Enron was a healthy energy-trading company that fell victim to a "run on the bank," there was little detailed exploration of the roots of Enron's problems -- including how it became so dependent on paper trading gains that had little real cash attached to them and so vulnerable to credit calls that made it incapable of riding out a crisis.

Indeed, more than four years after the Enron scandal began, it is still impossible to say what was real at Enron and what was smoke and mirrors.

Enron was permitted to book profits through means that were volatile and risky, but that, apparently, broke no laws. It was allowed to rack up "mark-to-market" gains on its trading book rather than use "accrual" accounting that is based on the flow of actual money. A reliance on such accounting may be acceptable, in some circumstances, so long as there is real cash coming from somewhere. In the real world, companies need hard cash to pay employees and cover expenses.

It still isn't clear how much of Enron's profits came from outright financial chicanery and how much from exploiting accounting constructs such as mark-to-market accounting and the use of derivative instruments that remain legal and largely unregulated today. Prosecutors go after illegal conduct, not foolhardy business practices.

Leslie Caldwell, the former head of the Enron Task Force who is now at Morgan Lewis & Bockius in New York, said she thought it was "very smart" of prosecutors "not to get bogged down" in accounting intricacies. It might have answered some questions about the company, but it would not have advanced the case.

Nor should one expect revelatory insights from defendants. "Your own trial is not the place to engage in self-reflection," said Melinda Haag, a former federal prosecutor who is now a partner at Orrick Herrington & Sutcliffe in San Francisco. "For that, you have a clergy person, a friend or a therapist."

Trials generate mosaic pieces that can be combined with other bits of information to create the big pictures that ultimately give meaning to the judicial exercise and explain the significance of the Enron saga.

"What trials aren't about is the resolution of great issues," said Anton Valukas, a former U.S. attorney for Chicago who is now a partner at Jenner & Block there.

White-Collar Crime's New Milestone (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters And Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

If there was one case the government had to make to define this as the era of corporate accountability, it was Enron.

But the Enron Corp. tale was complicated, with labyrinthine partnerships and intricate accounting entries, and no documents directly tying the guys at the top to the decisions carried out by others. It was a tough case to be a must win.

When the jury returned its verdicts -- guilty on 25 of a combined 34 counts -- it was a clear win. Jurors refused to let slide the two former chief executives who had become synonymous with corporate corruption, and who tried to blame underlings, advisers, institutional investors and the media for the Houston energy company's spectacular 2001 collapse.

"The jury says, you're the boss," said white-collar defense attorney Charles A. Stillman.

DOJ_NMG_0029643

The convictions of Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling cap the Justice Department's five-year battle to hold top executives responsible for a flood of accounting fraud and corporate failures that undermined investor confidence, put tens of thousands of people out of work and hit the savings of millions of ordinary people.

Enron's 2001 bankruptcy exposed failures across the system of corporate governance, from audit companies that lacked true independence and board members who failed to ask skeptical questions to lawyers and bankers who blessed questionable deals in exchange for whopping fees. It also resulted in major changes to the regulatory system, including a federal law that requires top corporate executives to attest to the accuracy of financial statements.

When Enron was followed by a wave of scandals at companies such as WorldCom Inc., Tyco International Ltd. and Adelphia Communications Corp., it was not clear whether prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission would be able to cope with the complexity and sheer numbers of the cases. But government lawyers slowly built their evidence and, after initial setbacks, learned to streamline their cases for juries. They won convictions of WorldCom chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers, Adelphia Chairman John J. Rigas, domesticity entrepreneur Martha Stewart and the top executives of Tyco.

But none of them equaled the importance of Enron, where it all started and which involved the most complicated financial and legal schemes.

"The ordinary investor uses the word Enron to scare their kids," said University of Texas law professor Henry T.C. Hu. "These convictions are the end of a particularly important morality play. Everyone always thought that the Enron-Skilling-Lay trial would be harder for prosecutors . . . and yet the prosecutors won. That really helps in terms of deterrence."

Although the Enron convictions serve as a high-water mark for the government's efforts to crack down on high-level corporate lawbreaking, legal analysts cautioned that the case does not mark the end of white-collar crime. "Where there's money, there's going to be crime," said former U.S. Attorney David N. Kelley. "You never know what's going to surface."

For corporate executives still under scrutiny, the verdicts yesterday underscored the peril of defendants taking the witness stand in white-collar fraud cases.

As in many of the recent top corporate trials, prosecutors had few documents linking Skilling and Lay to the accounting maneuvers that hid billions of dollars in losses from investors. The case therefore came down to weighing the two men's credibility against that of the other Enron executives, who swore Lay and Skilling were involved.

That made the two men's performances on the stand that much more critical, and both of them fell short. Lay in particular came across as an irritable control freak, while Skilling strained credulity with his complicated explanations and convenient memory lapses, jurors said.

The results mirrored those of other high-profile cases: The jurors who convicted Ebbers also said they didn't believe his testimony that he was unaware of the accounting schemes in that case, and former investment banker Frank P. Quattrone torpedoed his case when he was caught in an apparent misstatement on the stand. Quattrone's obstruction of justice conviction was later reversed, and he is currently negotiating with prosecutors to avoid another trial. Most legal observers credit the lone prominent acquittal, that of Richard M. Scrushy of HealthSouth Corp., to the months he spent cultivating the black and religious communities in Birmingham, where his case was tried.

"It's Shakespearean. The CEOs who have gone down are people who literally lost touch with reality," said Yale University law professor Jonathan Macey. "Ken Lay had so internalized the idea of an imperial CEO that he blamed everyone but himself. He could not conceptualize that he should take responsibility."

More than any other case, Enron symbolized the collapse of the 1990s stock market bubble and the revelation that many of the nation's highest-flying companies were far less substantial than they seemed. "This was the stock market's 9/11. How could the seventh-largest company collapse?" said Samuel W. Buell, a former federal prosecutor who worked on the early stages of the Enron case. "The knowledge that there is going to be punishment in egregious cases has to restore investor confidence."

"The fact that significant and highly credible companies engaged in misconduct of the rankest sort, pulling the wool over the eyes not just of investors but of analysts, journalists and regulators, is a very sorry chapter in our history, and one that deserves the right type of burial," said Harvey L. Pitt, a former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0029644

Energized after Enron's December 2001 bankruptcy filing and the fall of WorldCom months later, Congress overwhelmingly passed legislation that forces companies to set up stronger internal controls and holds chief executives, finance chiefs, board members and auditors more responsible for financial reports.

The aftermath of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act spawned new standards by the major U.S. stock exchanges and prompted courts to review such cases more stringently, experts said.

"The failure of Enron . . . fundamentally altered the corporate governance movement forever," said University of Delaware professor Charles M. Elson. "It greatly accelerated changes in the form of more responsibility for corporate boards and auditors, and it led to a great skepticism on the part of the investing public as to the business practices in corporate America. Regardless of what happens, they have been inadvertent change agents."

Even now, however, groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce are attacking the law in the courts and in the halls of the SEC. Another trade organization, the Free Enterprise Fund, has mounted a legal challenge to the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board as too costly and invasive. The board is a watchdog body created by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act to police the accounting industry. Advocates of increased oversight warn that if that case is successful, the entire law could be thrown out.

But the law's supporters said they hope the string of prosecution victories will give would-be fraudsters pause and remind Americans of the need for corporate accountability.

"Now we have a greater appreciation of the role of watchdogs," said Anthony M. Sabino, a law professor at St. John's University. "Sarbanes-Oxley was a good idea, is a good idea. Leave it alone. We need it to prevent the Enrons of the future."

Lay, Skilling May Have Paved Their Way To Prison (AP)

By Kristen Hays, AP Business Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — Kenneth Lay may have paved his way to prison when he testified in his own defense against fraud and conspiracy charges, snarling at a prosecutor and telling a jury of middle-class men and women that he couldn't turn off his rich lifestyle "like a spigot," despite $100 million in personal debt.

Jeffrey Skilling may have guaranteed himself a string of convictions when he couldn't counter incriminating testimony from prosecution witnesses with more than, "It's not true."

The epic undoing of the founder and former chief executive of what was once the seventh-largest company in the country and his hand-picked successor came in telling moments throughout the trial of more than four months.

Lay and Skilling entered the trial with a claim that shocked many: Not only were they innocent of wrongdoing, no fraud at all occurred at Enron. Skilling boiled it down with a statement at the end of his 7 1/2 days of grueling testimony:

"We are innocent. By 'we' I mean Enron Corp.," he said.

Prosecutors knew going in that both defendants would seek to exonerate not only themselves, but the company as well. Lay forecast that approach in a speech to Houston business and academic leaders in mid-December, while Skilling's legal team used a court filing to signal their intent.

But Enron fell so precipitously into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 from being the nation's seventh-largest company the year before that something had to be rotten, whether Lay and Skilling knew about it or not.

The government sought to show that rot, and how Lay and Skilling led an effort to hide it — a conclusion both continue to vehemently deny as they vow to appeal their convictions.

It wasn't easy. No one sat around a table in a dark, smoke-filled room and brazenly stated that they would commit crimes to fool investors into believing Enron deserved its powerhouse image.

No one even typed a memo, dashed off an e-mail or left a phone message indicating criminal intent, leaving prosecutors with little hard evidence.

Prosecutors presented their case like it was built over four years — brick by brick — with much emphasis on testimony from former executives who pleaded guilty to crimes rather than face their own trials, convictions and lengthy prison terms.

DOJ_NMG_0029645

Those division heads and others said they felt pressure — tangible or intangible — from Skilling and Lay to meet earnings targets or mask bad news at any cost and to maintain Wall Street's adoration.

The government also painstakingly worked to present its cadre of 25 witnesses as an ensemble cast without any stars, to be seen as a whole.

The media eagerly touted the testimony of former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, but his testimony was in the end no more important than that of other ex-executives. De-emphasizing the importance of the man held responsible for forging schemes that helped sink Enron was among the prosecution's smartest moves.

Fastow was an easy target for the defense. He roped his wife into his crimes. He likely could have prevented her from being indicted had he cut a deal with prosecutors within six months of being indicted himself, much as junk-bond pioneer Michael Milken copped a plea to keep the government from charging his brother.

Fastow endured his first public flogging during four days of brutal testimony and cross examination. He laid bare his shame. He never minimized his culpability and greed. And he insisted he and Skilling "committed crimes together," and Lay knew disaster was imminent in the fall of 2001 when he claimed publicly that Enron was fundamentally strong.

The key was, others provided equally damaging testimony about how Lay and Skilling knew Enron wasn't what it purported to be thanks to smoke and mirrors that masqueraded as proper accounting.

Those included former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. Now federal inmate No. 20293-179, Glisan is in prison for crafting fraudulent financial structures Enron used to hide losses and bad investments — structures Lay and Skilling insisted were proper.

But others with no criminal taint added fuel to the prosecution's fire. Vince Kaminski, a former top risk analyst whom Skilling respected, said the ex-CEO swept him and his staff from a risk assessment squad, complaining they acted too much like "cops" rather than deal facilitators.

Then came the defendants, the stars among the defense's 29 witnesses. Observers expected Skilling to live up to his reputation for being temperamental and abrasive, but it was Lay who bickered and bristled, even with his own lawyer.

Lay, known for making pious-sounding religious references, arrogantly defended his extravagant lifestyle, including a $200,000 yacht for wife Linda's birthday party, despite $100 million in personal debt.

"It was difficult to turn off that lifestyle like a spigot," Lay said.

Lay, a local mover-and-shaker dubbed "Kenny Boy" by President Bush, once told prosecutor John Hueston that Enron's "corpse was on the gurney" for the government to carve up.

Lay was convicted on all counts, while Skilling was acquitted on nine insider trading charges stemming from trades of Enron stock he made in 2000. The ex-CEO was convicted on 19 other counts of fraud, conspiracy, lying to auditors and insider trading.

"This whole thing of saying there was nothing wrong at Enron, it just strains the imagination," said Gary Brown, former special counsel for the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs in its investigation of Enron's December 2001 crash.

Sam Buell, a former federal prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who secured the indictment against Skilling, said the government had witnesses from myriad units — trading, finance, broadband, investor relations and retail energy — who told a story that hung together when viewed as a whole.

"I think the defense probably felt they just couldn't deviate from the playbook that says you have to give the jury an affirmative story of your own that explains the whole case — that it would be too risky just to play defense and poke holes in the government's case," Buell said.

However, the story that the government witnesses were liars or misunderstood what they thought was sinister "just wasn't plausible and undermined the credibility of everything they did and said," Buell said.

Jurors said they acquitted Skilling on the nine insider trading counts for lack of evidence. But they said when viewed overall, the government's case — despite its lack of hard evidence beyond the word of witnesses — pointed to the pair's guilt.

Enron Trial May Encourage Businesses To Adopt Low-risk Strategies (KRT)

By Greg Burns

Knight Ridder, May 26, 2006

CHICAGO - So much for the bold defense of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling.

The pair was convicted Thursday by federal jurors who listened to both former Enron Corp. executives spin a tale from the witness stand about a truly great company that was sadly misunderstood.

From the start, legal observers questioned the strategy of promoting Enron as a "shining star," since the rest of the world concluded long ago it had been misled about the one-time Houston energy giant.

Former insiders cooperating with the government swore under oath that the company had lost its moral bearings and manipulated its financial results to deceive a gullible public.

The outcome of the case, with Skilling and Lay facing long prison terms, is likely to encourage future corporate executives targeted in criminal investigations to adopt a lower-risk approach, some legal experts predict.

The convictions underscore the conventional wisdom among defense attorneys that testifying at trial is among the most perilous steps for any criminal defendant, even the polished and educated.

They also suggest that convincing a jury of a completely different story than the one advanced by the government is especially tough in complex corporate fraud.

The Enron defendants "felt they had to roll the dice on the `Big Sell,' because the traditional defenses were going to be met with great skepticism," said David Yellen, dean of the Loyola University law school in Chicago.

Merely saying, "We made mistakes, but they weren't criminal," or, "We didn't know about the fraud," would have been insufficient in this case, Yellen explained.

Yet by attempting to "shoot the moon" with their description of a wonderful company brought low by a "run on the bank" through no fault of theirs, the Enron defendants eroded some of their best defenses, said Samuel Buell, a former prosecutor on the government's Enron Task Force now teaching at the University of Texas law school.

"That undermines the credibility of even the good stuff you've got for poking holes in the government's case," he said. "It was highly risky."

The Enron prosecution was by no means a slam dunk for the Justice Department, despite public expectations that the former corporate leaders would be convicted. It lacked a blockbuster witness, or "smoking gun" evidence tying the defendants conclusively to the fraud.

Lay and Skilling were consistent in maintaining they not only did nothing wrong, but also almost everything right. Apart from their decision to waive conflict-of-interest rules for their corrupt finance chief, Andrew Fastow, the pair aggressively defended their time at the top of the ill-fated company.

On direct examination, as they described Enron's glory days, it almost seemed they wanted the poker-faced jurors to burst into applause. Then on cross-examination, Lay all but snarled at the prosecutor questioning him, while Skilling lurched between near-perfect recall of certain events and sudden amnesia about others.

The pair should have admitted more faults and errors, said Brian Wice, a Houston defense attorney who followed the trial. "You can't come in with a stiff neck and say, `I'm perfect,'" he said. "For these guys, it not only was business, it was personal, and that's a mistake. They wanted to be vindicated."

Asked on the day the jury began its deliberations if his client sought redemption, not just acquittal, Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, replied, "That's very true. Very true."

Daniel Petrocelli, who represented Skilling, said the defense needed to knock down the preconceptions of jurors steeped in years of adverse publicity about Enron.

Skilling sought redemption "only to the extent it was needed to unlock jurors' minds," Petrocelli said. "It's not an ego thing. It's really to undo these perceptions."

The defendants' campaign for absolution began immediately after Enron collapsed. Although Lay refused to testify before Congress, taking a pounding in grim silence, Skilling talked and talked.

He shared a witness table with Sherron Watkins, the Enron whistleblower who would testify against him and Lay at their criminal trial, presenting the "run on the bank" defense that became his most prominent theme.

DOJ_NMG_0029647

That impulse to blame the victims for their lack of faith in the company carried through to the trial. Far from bringing down a thriving enterprise, the "run" on Enron revealed the house of cards it had become, prosecutors pointed out to the jury. Enron lacked the wherewithal to raise enough cash to keep its operations going, even long enough to sell it at a bargain price.

The defense was seeking to "defuse the notion that this was a business that was rotten to the core from start to finish," said Buell. "Obviously, certain parts of the business were successful. That's beside the point. They had to explain how the collapse of Enron happened. It didn't work because the story was just implausible."

Symbol Of An Era Lay, Skilling Are Convicted Of Fraud (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller, Gary McWilliams And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON -- The convictions of former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth Lay1 and former president Jeffrey Skilling2 decimated their high-stakes argument that Enron was a law-abiding company done in by newspaper reports, short-sellers and market panic. The jury3's decision cemented the once-highflying energy company's legacy as one of the most egregious corporate offenders of the 1990s.

The verdicts yesterday against both men on numerous federal fraud and conspiracy charges cap a string of prosecutions in which hundreds of senior corporate executives at numerous companies have been held accountable for wrongdoing on their watches. 4

Once viewed as one of the biggest business success stories of the 1990s, Enron collapsed in 2001, the first of a string of corporate scandals. Its fall marked a dramatic end to the stock-market boom and the beginning of a wave of corporate and regulatory reforms, including the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law.

Juror Kathy Harrison, an elementary-school teacher, said after the verdicts that she hoped executives at other companies would realize that "those in charge have responsibility. There's too much hurt here. If something good can come out, companies can be aware that they must be conscientious." (Read more reactions5 to the verdicts.)

After delivering their verdicts, the Enron jurors said they had focused partly on the credibility of the two former executives. In a risky legal strategy, both men had argued that no crimes were committed at Enron, apart from a few largely irrelevant ones involving former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow6. Messrs. Lay and Skilling both testified during the trial, and both faced withering cross-examinations by prosecutors.

Judge Sim Lake7 read the string of guilty verdicts in a packed courtroom. Both defendants stood calmly as family members gasped and some began to sob.

Mr. Skilling, 52 years old, was convicted on 19 of 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading. He was acquitted on nine counts of insider trading. Mr. Lay, 64, was convicted on all six conspiracy and fraud counts he faced. After reading the jury verdicts, Judge Lake also found Mr. Lay guilty of all four counts in a separate banking-fraud case heard by the judge while the jury was deliberating.

After the verdicts were announced, Mr. Lay joined more than a dozen friends and family members in a circle in one corner of the courtroom to pray. One of Mr. Lay's supporters, Rev. Bill Lawson, could be heard invoking the story of Jesus, "who was convicted and even executed," he said.

"We'll all come through this stronger," said Mr. Lay, occasionally tugging at the hand of his wife, Linda, who had sat through the entire four-month trial. Later, Mr. Lawson said he advised Mr. Lay "to hang in there and trust God."

In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Skilling said that when he was pronounced guilty on the first count of conspiracy, "that floored me. God, there was no conspiracy." He said that the relatively short jury deliberations had raised his hopes. But "we were just on a tilted football field," he said, referring to going on trial in Enron's headquarters city.

The convictions came despite Messrs. Lay and Skilling putting on one of the most expensive criminal defenses ever, spending an estimated $60 million. Both men remain free pending sentencing, which is set for Sept. 11. Each faces many years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0029648

Attorneys for both men said they would appeal the verdicts, which came on the sixth day of jury deliberations that many observers had expected to stretch for weeks. The verdict "doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron, or of Jeff Skilling's innocence," said a clearly upset Daniel Petrocelli16, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer. "We told our story and the jury disagreed with it."

At a press conference after the verdicts, several jurors said that government witnesses, many of them former Enron executives testifying as part of plea bargains, had convinced them that illegal activities had occurred at Enron, and that the defendants were responsible.

Defense lawyers had decided to put both Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay on the stand. "I wanted badly to believe what they were saying," said juror Wendy Vaughan, a small-business owner. But "there were places in their testimony where I felt their character was questioned," she said.

"Both men said they had their hands firmly on the wheel" of the company, said another juror, elementary-school principal Freddy Delgado. For the two executives to later claim they didn't know about wrongdoing, said Mr. Delgado, was "not the right thing."

During the trial, defense attorneys repeatedly portrayed Enron as a fundamentally healthy and successful business. It was destroyed, they claimed, by irresponsible news articles in The Wall Street Journal and the manipulative stock-market activities of traders looking to profit from the company's declining share price. The political and media furor that followed Enron's collapse, they argued, caused the government to search for crimes where none existed. "This is not a case of 'Hear no evil, see no evil,'" Mr. Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead attorney, told the jury during his opening argument in early February. "This is a case of 'There was no evil.'"

In his closing argument earlier this month, Mr. Petrocelli told jurors that if they accepted the government's definitions of corporate wrongdoing, "we might as well put every CEO in jail."

The defense differed markedly from those used in the trials of former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers and former HealthSouth Corp. boss Richard Scrushy. Those defendants acknowledged that financial crimes had occurred, but said the wrongdoing had been hidden from them. Mr. Ebbers was convicted; Mr. Scrushy was acquitted.

Some Enron jurors said they were bothered by Mr. Lay's stock sales. Mr. Lay quietly sold about $70 million of Enron stock back to the company, some of it as Enron's financial crisis worsened in 2001. He did not have to publicly report those transactions for up to a year.

Juror Don Martin, an electrical designer, said the stock sales "defined the word 'intent.'" Mr. Delgado, another juror, said the sales reflected "the character of the person." Deborah Smith, the forewoman of the Enron jury, said she hoped that federal regulators would tighten rules governing how executives report stock sales.

Some jurors also said they rejected defense arguments that former Enron executives testifying for the government as part of plea bargains were lying to win leniency from prosecutors. Mr. Martin said that in spite of their incentives to cooperate with prosecutors, "it was hard not to lend credence to their testimony." Mr. Delgado, the school principal, added that "even if the government twisted their arms, you can not get everyone to say the same thing."

Detailed Notes

Jurors cited testimony by Enron's former treasurer, Ben Glisan, Jr.17, the only witness currently in prison for an Enron-related crime. Mr. Glisan had knowledge of Enron's finances and kept detailed notes of some key meetings. "We kept going back to Mr. Glisan's testimony to corroborate things," said Mr. Delgado, the school principal.

In a telephone interview, juror Douglas Baggett said that outside partnerships run by Mr. Fastow, the former financial officer, contributed to the jury's decision to convict. The government said that the partnerships, known as LJM118 and LJM2, had been used to manipulate Enron's reported financial results. Mr. Baggett called the partnerships "the first domino....Most every one of the counts went back to LJM." While the defense attacked Mr. Fastow for stealing money from Enron, it defended the company's transactions with LJM as proper.

Several jurors said they wished other witnesses had been called, particularly former Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey19. Mr. Causey's name came up repeatedly during the trial as someone deeply involved in the company's most controversial financial transactions. He had been a co-defendant in the case, but in December pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud. Both the government and the defense considered calling him to the stand, but both apparently decided the risks were too great.

DOJ_NMG_0029649

Mr. Causey "could have linked a lot more things together," said Mr. Baggett, the juror. But Ms. Smith, the jury's forewoman, said she didn't think his appearance "would have changed the verdicts."

The defense had frequently expressed concern that the overwhelmingly negative news coverage of Enron's collapse had tainted the jury pool here in Enron's hometown. Judge Lake's refusal to move the trial out of Houston is seen as a major issue in the expected appeal.

During questioning of potential jurors prior to the trial, one who wound up on the jury said he felt something had gone wrong at Enron, and described the two defendants as "greedy," though he added that wasn't a crime.

Some jurors said yesterday that they went into the case sympathetic to both Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling. "In all honesty, at the very beginning of the trial, I admired both men," said Ms. Vaughan. "I thought they were brilliant."

Jurors said their opinions shifted under the weight of the evidence and because of the defendants' demeanor on the witness stand. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling seemed "very controlling people at times," said Mr. Baggett, noting that at times they were "even telling their attorneys what to do" from the witness stand.

Mr. Lay's testimony was hampered by the absence of his lead attorney, Michael Ramsey20, for much of the trial due to health problems.

Defense lawyers had emphasized Mr. Lay's extensive civic involvement in Houston. Jurors said that didn't influence their decision. In his civic and charitable activities, "he was a very magnanimous person," said Mr. Martin. "He gave and donated a lot of money. But when he went into the company, he was a different person entirely."

Prosecutors argued that by 1999, Enron had begun to live a lie. To the public, it seemed one of the decade's great business success stories. Wall Street loved Enron, and the company's share price soared even by the inflated standards of the 1990s stock-market boom. Mr. Lay regularly rubbed shoulders with national and world leaders, including President Bush, who sometimes referred to him as "Kenny Boy."

Big Institutions Snared

Enron's 2001 collapse led to the demise of Arthur Andersen LLP, the company's outside auditor, and snared some of the nation's biggest financial institutions, including Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Merrill Lynch & Co., in litigation and regulatory actions.

It also sparked a raft of investigations, including a federal criminal probe by a specially created Enron Task Force. To date, the Task Force has filed criminal charges against 33 individuals and obtained guilty pleas or convictions against 23 of them, including Messrs. Lay and Skilling.

The case against Enron's only two chief executives prior to the bankruptcy was the Task Force's most critical. Both had made tens of millions of dollars while at Enron. Mr. Skilling allocated $40 million to his defense, a little less than half of it coming from Enron officers' liability insurance. Mr. Petrocelli, his lawyer, said all of that money had been spent before the trial began. Mr. Lay is estimated to have gone through more than $20 million. On most days, each defendant had at least a half-dozen attorneys in court. The government used a like number.

Despite the huge defense effort, the two men couldn't overcome major questions about what happened at Enron. Jurors said they didn't buy the defense argument that the LJM partnerships were legitimate outside entities that gave Enron additional financing flexibility. It appears that they didn't accept Mr. Skilling's insistence that he had quit as chief executive in August 2001, after only six months on the job, for personal reasons that had nothing to do with the company's health, which he and Mr. Lay declared at the time to be excellent. The company collapsed less than four months after he departed.

Jurors said that they were convinced that Enron had serious problems in 2001, and that defendants had to have known that when they publicly portrayed the company as healthy and growing. "There were red flags everywhere" about the company's problems, said Mr. Baggett. He cited internal company surveys, emails and the testimony of Mr. Glisan, the former treasurer, who said he had warned Mr. Lay in the fall of 2001 about a pending liquidity crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0029650

The jury acquitted Mr. Skilling on nine of the ten insider-trading charges against him. Jurors said there was reasonable doubt on most of the insider-trading counts. Ms. Smith, the jury forewoman, added: "Not guilty equals not proven. It does not equal innocence."

The sole insider-trading conviction involved Mr. Skilling's most controversial stock sale: a $15 million transaction on Sept. 17, 2001, involving 500,000 shares of Enron stock. Mr. Skilling had told federal securities regulators in 2001, only days after Enron's bankruptcy filing, that he made the sale only because of concerns about the general economy following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Prosecutors discovered that Mr. Skilling had attempted to sell 200,000 Enron shares a few days before those attacks. They used that fact to pound his credibility.

"Mr. Skilling used our nation's tragedy to cover his tracks," prosecutor Sean Berkowitz told the jury in his closing argument. "That's offensive and you shouldn't let him get away with it."

Enron Pair Found Guilty (TIMES)

By James Doran, Wall Street Correspondent

Times (UK), May 26, 2006

Former chief executive vows to fight verdict 'I'm still a blessed man,' says founder

KENNETH LAY, the founder of Enron, and Jeffrey Skilling, his former chief executive, face long terms in jail after a jury last night found the pair guilty of conspiring to commit one of the biggest frauds in US corporate history.

Lay, 64, was found guilty in a courthouse in Houston, Texas, on all six charges of fraud and conspiracy against him in the Enron case. He was also found guilty of four separate bank fraud charges that were heard in a trial without a jury.

He faces a maximum jail sentence of 165 years if given the full term for each guilty verdict.

Skilling, 52, was found guilty of 19 counts, carrying a maximum jail term of 185 years. He was found not guilty of a further nine charges of insider trading.

Judge Sim Lake, who presided over both the jury and non-jury trials, asked the pair to return to court on September 11 for sentencing. Legal experts expect both men to be sent to a medium- security facility for between 12 and 20 years, which — for Lay at least — could be a de facto life sentence.

Judge Lake asked Lay to surrender his passport. Lay signed documents in court to secure his $5 million bond with properties owned by his wife and children. He was also restricted from travelling outside the southern judicial district of Texas or Colorado. Skilling had previously submitted a $5 million bond.

Skilling looked down as the verdict was read. Lay sighed heavily and shook his head as his wife, Linda, took his arm.

Skilling, in a dark suit, white shirt and purple tie, appeared outside the court immediately to announce his decision to lodge an appeal. “Obviously, I am disappointed, but that is the way the system works,” Skilling said.

Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling’s lawyer, said that the verdict “doesn’t change our view of what happened at Enron . . . or Jeffrey Skilling’s innocence.”

Legal experts said, however, that the likelihood of a successful appeal was slim because the jury had obviously considered each count in turn, rather than returning a blanket decision.

Outside court after the verdict, Lay spoke to a jeering crowd that was kept at bay by several mounted police officers. He said that he was disappointed with the outcome, but, in an outpouring of his religious faith, added: “Despite this, I am still a very blessed man.”

Lay joined in a prayer circle being led near the courthouse by Steve Wende, his close friend and pastor of the largest Methodist church in Houston. Lay’s family wept as the former Enron boss said: “God has got another plan right now.”

Jurors who spoke to the media after the verdict was read said that the evidence of Ben Glisan, a former Enron treasurer, had been pivotal. One juror, Wendy Vaughan, a small business owner, said that the testimony of Lay and Skilling, who each spent a week on the witness stand, led her to return a guilty verdict. “There were pieces in the testimony where I felt their character was questioned,” she said.

The guilty verdicts mark the most significant victory yet for the US Justice Department in its fight against corporate crime. The Enron affair raised the curtain on an era of corporate scandals in the US in which dozens of executives have been convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0029651

Legal Observers Divided On Odds Of Successful Appeal In Enron Case (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, May 26, 2006

Former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling spent many years getting their way in the business world, but in the courtroom, where it really counted, the men and their skilled defense lawyers could not sway a jury hearing criminal charges against them.

On Thursday, a federal court jury in Houston found Lay guilty of all six criminal charges against him and found Skilling guilty of 19 of 28 charges against him. The jury found Skilling not guilty of nine insider-trading charges.

The jury's verdict sends an "unmistakable message" to corporate America, prosecutor Sean Berkowitz, director of the Enron Task Force, said after the verdict.

"You can't lie to shareholders," Berkowitz, an Assistant U.S. Attorney, told reporters shortly after the jury verdict was announced on Thursday.

"No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules," he said.

Fellow task force prosecutor John Hueston spoke similarly: "The jury has spoken. CEOs can't hide behind accountants, can't hide behind lawyers."

The jury of eight women and four men returned their verdict at 11 a.m. on Tuesday, in their sixth day of deliberations.

The verdict came in the 17th week of proceedings in the trial, which received considerable U.S. and international coverage. Enron, once the nation's seventh highest-grossing company, filed for bankruptcy in December 2001.

The breakdown of the verdict is as follows. The Houston jury found Skilling guilty on one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud; 12 counts of securities fraud; five counts of making false statements to auditors; and one count of insider trading. Jurors found Lay guilty of one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud; two counts of wire fraud for making false and misleading statements; and three counts of securities fraud.

Upon hearing the verdict, Skilling showed little emotion. Lay's daughter and wife cried as the verdict was read.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake set sentencing for Sept. 11. Berkowitz declined to say what kind of a sentence the government would seek for Lay and Skilling.

Skilling was one of the first people out of the courtroom after Lake excused the jury. Lay couldn't leave the courthouse until after he surrendered his passport and he and his family put up enough assets to back a $5 million bond. Lay and his wife, Linda, and three of his children put up deeds to property to secure the bond.

Outside the courthouse in downtown Houston, both Skilling and Lay continued to proclaim their innocence.

Lay said he was surprised and shocked by the verdict but that he is blessed by the support of a loving family and friends.

He spoke of his faith in God: "Indeed He does work all things for the good, for those who love the Lord."

Attorneys for Lay, including lead defense lawyer Michael Ramsey, a solo practitioner in Houston, did not comment on the verdict.

Skilling's lead defense lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, a partner in O'Melveny & Myers in Century City, Calif., answered questions at the courthouse with Skilling at his side. Both men looked tired.

"We've just begun the fight," Petrocelli told reporters, later adding, "We will have a full and vigorous appeal." Asked about how he would proceed with the appeal, Petrocelli said, "I'm going to sit down and take a look at everything."

About the jury, he said, "They gave it five full days, and they saw it their way."

Petrocelli impressed juror Freddy Delgado. Delgado said, "If I was ever a defendant, I would go with Mr. Petrocelli."

After the verdict, Delgado and the other 11 jurors as well as three of the four alternates met with reporters. Forewoman Deborah Smith, who works in human resources at a large oilfield services company, said jurors didn't have a target date to reach a verdict; they were prepared to stay as long as it took.

Delgado, an elementary school principal, said, "We looked at all the facts and looked at the documents, put in long, long hours."

Jurors said they were not bothered by the fact that many of the government's witnesses had struck plea deals.

One of those government witnesses was Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer.

"Fastow was Fastow," juror Don Martin said about the testimony of the former CFO, who pleaded guilty to two criminal charges and admitted on the witness stand that he stole from Enron. "We knew where he was coming from from the outset. We kind of discounted some of it."

Juror Doug Baggett said the jury listened to and considered the testimony of every witness. "We figured they were all there for a reason," he said.

Forewoman Smith and Baggett said the jury found Skilling not guilty of nine of the 10 insider-trading charges against him, because the government didn't bring enough evidence to the table to convict him of the charges. Smith noted that not guilty does not mean innocent.

One juror, Wendy Vaughn, said, "At the very beginning of the trial, I admired both men. ... It was sad to see that, in the end, it [the success of Enron] was not accomplished in a respectful manner."

Juror Kathy Harrison said of Skilling: "He was a hands-on individual. It was hard to believe such a hands-on individual would not know what was going on in the company." She later added, "Mr. Lay did many great things, but all this is a tragedy. ... No American is above the law."

Jurors said they didn't know why former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey didn't testify, and they wish he would have. Baggett said, "To me, he was a missing link." However, Smith said Causey's testimony wouldn't have changed the verdict.

Causey was a defendant in the case alongside Lay and Skilling, but he struck a plea deal with prosecutors in December 2005.

Lake presided over the 16-week jury trial, held in the Bob Casey U.S. Courthouse, located just a few blocks from the 50-story Enron Center skyscraper where Lay and Skilling once reigned as powerful executives.

In the jury trial, prosecutors alleged Lay and Skilling participated in a conspiracy to misrepresent the true financial condition of Enron.

The indictment in United States v. Jeffrey K. Skilling, et al. alleged Lay and Skilling "engaged in a wide-ranging scheme" to deceive investors, including Enron shareholders and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, about the true performance of Enron by manipulating public financial reports, making "false and misleading" public statements about the company's financial performance, and failing to disclose facts that would make those statements and representations fair and accurate.

Lay and Skilling had pleaded not guilty. They blamed Enron's problems on criminal acts by Fastow.

In 2004, Fastow pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud.

Also on Thursday, following a separate bench trial that began on May 18 and ended on Tuesday, Lake found Lay guilty of four bank fraud charges.

In 2005, Lay had asked for a separate trial from Skilling, but Lake only granted a separate trial on the bank fraud charges.

Lay was accused of violating a federal banking regulatory rule by using up to $75 million in loans from Bank of America, Chase Bank of Texas and Compass Bank, from 1999 to 2001, to buy stock.

According to the indictment, Lay signed loan forms known as Forms U-1, which would require him to state that he will not use loan proceeds to buy stock on margin. But the indictment in United States v. Jeffrey K. Skilling, et al. alleged he did so.

"WILLFUL BLINDNESS" INSTRUCTION

Joel Androphy, a partner in Berg & Androphy in Houston who has watched most of the trial, says he gives Skilling -- unlike Lay -- reasonable odds at a successful appeal.

Androphy says Lake's instructions to the jurors will help Skilling's appeal. Androphy believes the evidence was not sufficient against Skilling to justify the judge's instructions that the jurors should consider "willful blindness." The government had laid out a case against Lay that he specifically avoided learning details but not so against Skilling.

Androphy says two government witnesses were extremely important to the prosecutors' case: Ben Glisan, the former Enron treasurer who pleaded guilty in 2003 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison term, and Mark Koenig, the former head of investor relations at Enron who has pleaded guilty to aiding securities fraud at Enron.

Androphy's assessment is the jurors put little stock in the defense's arguments that the government's witnesses were tainted by deals they cut with prosecutors to avoid jail time.

"Jurors are becoming immune to witnesses making government deals. That should send shock waves to criminal lawyers all over the country," Androphy says.

Dan Cogdell, of the Cogdell Law Firm in Houston, watched the trial with the perspective of a lawyer who won the only acquittal for a defendant in an Enron case. Cogdell won an acquittal in 2004 for Sheila Kahanek, a former Enron employee who was charged in United States v. Daniel Bayly, et al., the so-called Nigerian Barge trial. A federal court jury in Houston found Kahanek not guilty of charges of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and to falsify books and records.

About the Lay and Skilling verdicts, Cogdell says, "I am surprised that there were blanket convictions." For such a long case, he says, the jury deliberated for a very short period of time.

Like Androphy, Cogdell too believes that the judge's instructions to the jury to consider "willful blindness" hurt the defense significantly. He does not believe, however, in any likelihood for a successful appeal for Skilling or Lay. He notes that the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals does not often reverse Lake. Moreover, Cogdell says, during the time he spent at the trial, Lake appeared to be bending over backward to give a fair trial to the defendants.

Thomas Ajamie of Ajamie LLP in Houston also believes a successful appeal of the verdicts is unlikely for Lay or Skilling. "Sim Lake is a very careful, methodical judge. He knows this case is being watched very carefully," says Ajamie.

Ajamie does not believe that the medical issues that forced Lay's lead lawyer Michael Ramsey to leave the trial had a significant impact on the outcome. "Ramsey is a great lawyer. But I'm not sure that the Lord himself could have turned these facts around. A Mack truck coming at you at 100 miles an hour is a hard thing to stop."

Lay himself hurt his case, Ajamie says. "He was terrible witness. I came away thinking he is a bad person. He wasn't forthright. But he was clearly a man who was in control."

Philip Hilder, a Houston criminal defense attorney who represented former Enron executive and prosecution witness Sherron Watkins, says the verdict was a "stunning victory" for the Enron Task Force.

"Jurors rarely come back as quickly as this one did in such a complicated case," Hilder says. "The legacy of the Task Force will be defined by this."

But juror Vaughn, a business owner, told reporters that due to expected appeals by Lay and Skilling, "I don't think it's over."

She said, "Will justice really prevail? Will the almighty dollar prevail again? We'll see."

Reporter Miriam Rozen contributed to this article.

Justice Department, White House React To Verdict (HC)

By Michael Hedges

Houston Chronicle, May 26, 2006

In Washington, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty called the verdict a triumph for the Justice Department, and the federal Enron task force that was created in late 2001.

"Lay, Skilling and their numerous coconspirators perpetrated an elaborate scheme to mislead analysts and investors about Enron's true financial picture. Their efforts to mislead the markets were protracted, deliberate and dishonest," McNulty said. "At a time when the company was foundering, these defendants perpetrated a lie that Enron was a robust and growing company in the strongest financial condition it had ever been in. And as they knew, the truth was something very different."

He added, "The message of today's verdict is simple: Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who had recused himself from the Enron investigation because of corporate donations he received as a Texas judge, did not comment.

But McNulty lauded the work of a task force he said, "worked thousands and thousands of hours. They've gone over millions of pages of documents. They have devoted years of their professional life, sacrificing time from families, all in the effort to try to hold individuals accountable for corruption."

McNulty left without responding to shouted reporter's questions.

DOJ_NMG_0029654

White House spokesman Tony Snow made brief comments about Enron during a scheduled press briefing that coincided with the jury's verdict.

"My only comment is that the Justice Department -- you know, we congratulate the Justice Department on successfully concluding a highly complex set of legal proceedings that led to the convictions today in the Enron case," Snow said. "The administration's been pretty clear there's no tolerance for corporate corruption. And furthermore, the Justice Department has been going aggressively after those who are involved in corporate corruption."

Asked if President Bush favored a compensation program for Enron victims, Snow said, "I honestly don't know."

Bush did not directly respond to Enron, and there was no hint of the company's name in a glowing statement he issued early Wednesday afternoon on the state of the economy: "America's economy is on the fast track. Today's revised report by the Commerce Department indicates our economy grew at 5.3 percent for the first quarter of this year. That is the fastest growth in two-and-half years and another clear sign that our economy is powerful, productive, and prosperous," Bush said.

Guilty Verdict Will Embolden Prosecutors (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

The conviction of Ken Lay and Jeffrey Skilling is the successful culmination of a legal strategy Department of Justice prosecutors have been fine tuning since the day, in 2001, when Enron, one of America's most respected companies, collapsed under the weight of a massive fraud.

That strategy called on law enforcement officials to indict and seek the conviction of chief executives of companies on fraud charges – often involving complex accounting schemes – even if there was little or no solid evidence that the executives intended to commit a crime or even knew the fraud existed.

In the case of Enron, says Michael Missal, a former attorney at the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart, the verdict will further embolden prosecutors to "go after the people at the very top", holding them responsible for wrongdoing at the companies they ran.

"If you look at what they were charged on, Ken Lay's fingerprints weren't on it – except that he knew the company wasn't in good shape and he lied about it," says Mr Missal.

Dan Small, a litigation strategy expert at the law firm of Duane Morris, also believes the victory will rejuvenate the justice department at a time when, he says, the legal community has been wondering whether momentum of prosecuting corporate fraud has slowed down.

"There will be a sense among other executives that if Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling couldn't pull it off, who can?" he says.

But one former senior counsel at the justice department disagrees. Timothy Coleman, an attorney at Dewey Ballantine, says the guilty verdict represents the end of an era that began and ends with Enron and that the political forces that put aggressive prosecution of white collar crime at the top of law enforcement's agenda will now subside.

"The government will continue to bring high-profile corporate fraud cases, but we are now entering a period of retrenchment and re-examination," Mr Coleman says.

He believes that the fact that the government is increasingly coming under fire for its tactics, including on issues involving waiver of attorney-client privilege and corporate payment of executives' attorneys fees, is evidence that the pendulum is swinging away from aggressive enforcement "in the court of public opinion".

Whether prosecutors continue to pursue indictments against executives as aggressively as they have in the era of Enron or not, the jury's decision proves that the justice department was capable of securing a conviction on a case that was exceedingly complex.

Columbia University Law School's John Coffee, an expert in securities law, says the government succeeded because it learned to follow what he calls the "kiss" rule: Keep It Simple, Stupid.

"[The jury's decision] shows that you can convict in a complicated factual case that resembles a Russian novel," Mr Coffee says.

DOJ_NMG_0029655

Stephen Cutler, the former head of enforcement at the SEC, says the decision to "streamline" the case also proved how far prosecutors had come since the early white collar crime trials, such as the first trial of Tyco's Dennis Kozlowski, which ended in a mistrial and was seen as having been presented to the jury in an overly complicated way by prosecutors.

"It is essential in these type of cases to boil it down to credibility. In this case, they boiled it down to: do you believe these men?" says Mr Small of Duane Morris.

He contends that the conviction was at least as much the result of defence errors as prosecution brilliance.

"The defence badly oversold the case: they went so far as to say there was no fraud against Enron; that's a bad mistake," he says. "They didn't have to do that."

It also proved that the "ostrich defence" of claiming ignorance – a strategy similarly used by WorldCom's former chief executive Bernie Ebbers – is one of which juries are sceptical.

"These are people who have spent their lives promoting themselves as masters of the universe, and suddenly to come into court and say they couldn't find the executive washroom without help – which was essentially the defence here – that's a very tough sell," says Mr Small.

Guilty Verdicts Provide 'Red Meat' To Prosecutors Chasing Companies (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The convictions of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2 culminate a crackdown on turn-of-the-century corporate malfeasance. They also will likely embolden the government to continue its campaign.

When it collapsed nearly five years ago, Enron became synonymous with executive wrongdoing. Since then, authorities have obtained convictions or guilty pleas on fraud and other charges against hundreds of corporate bigwigs, and lawmakers have imposed tough new regulations. While some business leaders brand these measures excessive, particularly the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act, few oppose prosecution of corporate misdeeds.

Yesterday's convictions serve as a reminder that while the economic and stock-market booms of the 1990s were among the greatest in history, they were tainted by greed and fraud. "We all get distracted by the benefits that flow from these great market advances when it's climbing up," said Robert Morvillo, a veteran defense attorney. "The distraction seems to have to await a seriously jarring issue when somebody gets hurt. Enron is a prime example of when people got hurt."

Messrs. Lay and Skilling now join a list of once-high-flying executives brought low. Among them: Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas; Tyco International Ltd. Chief Executive Officer L. Dennis Kozlowski; and former WorldCom Inc. CEO Bernard Ebbers.

With the Enron verdicts, those favoring aggressive tactics to protect shareholders and others have reason to feel energized, their stance endorsed in a landmark trial by a jury of 12 citizens. "Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said. "This verdict encourages us -- it encourages us to continue to combat corruption wherever we find it."

And George Stamboulidis, a former federal prosecutor, said: "I am confident that prosecutors have cases in the hopper ready to go." Among the possibilities: Two dozen or so companies under federal investigation into whether they improperly backdated stock-option grants to enrich executives. (Complete coverage3)

The Enron trial may provide a general template for future enforcement in complex accounting cases, though no two scandals are alike. In some previous trials involving complicated financial matters, prosecutors took a kitchen-sink approach, piling on arcane accounting evidence. Enron prosecutors took a simpler approach, reducing the risk that jurors would feel overwhelmed.

"Prosecutors have tasted the red meat," said Roman Darmer, another former federal prosecutor. "They have shown they know how to win these cases, and they now have more tools to work with."

A defeat for prosecutors would have provided fodder for the incipient pro-business backlash, which so far has had only limited success. "This may be the end of a case that came to symbolize the wave of corporate scandals, but by no means does this signal the end to investigators," said Arthur Jakoby, a defense attorney who used to work for the Securities and Exchange Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0029656

Flood of Accusations

The bursting of the stock-market bubble in 2000 was followed by a surge of accusations that executives used accounting shenanigans to artificially improve results, otherwise defrauded shareholders or improperly enriched themselves. As companies collapsed, investors lost untold sums, and tens of thousands of employees lost jobs. Class-action securities lawyers won billions of dollars in settlements against the companies involved and their investment bankers and accountants.

Enron, a giant Houston-based energy-trading company, was among the biggest and the first to go under, filing for bankruptcy protection in late 2001.

In January 2002, the Justice Department launched a criminal probe that led to yesterday's convictions of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, the latter a big supporter of President Bush. That July, Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which stiffened corporate-governance and accounting rules, and President Bush created the Corporate Fraud Task Force in the Justice Department. Since then, the Department says it has secured more than 1,000 convictions or guilty pleas of corporate fraud, including cases against more than 200 chief executives, company presidents and chief financial officers.

The sentences handed down have been of a length unheard of during the 1980s insider-trading and saving-and-loan scandals. Adelphia's Mr. Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison; Tyco's Mr. Kozlowski, convicted in state court, was sentenced to 8? to 25 years; and WorldCom's Mr. Ebbers to 25 years.

Wall Street got sucked into the scandals, too. In 2003, the New York attorney general's office and the SEC reached a $1.4 billion civil settlement with major Wall Street firms after discovering emails revealing that the firms had misled investors with overly rosy stock-research reports, and that they enriched favored customers in doling out hot initial public offerings of stock.

Not all prosecutions succeeded. Former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy was acquitted in Birmingham, Ala., last June on all 36 counts he faced, including an alleged Sarbanes-Oxley violation. That decision followed a nearly six-month trial, including 21 days of deliberation -- a lesson likely not lost on prosecutors in the Enron trial, which lasted less than three months. (Mr. Scrushy has been on trial since May 1 on unrelated charges that he bribed Alabama's governor for a spot on a regulatory panel.)

Much of the backlash against the government's crackdown focuses on concerns that Sarbanes-Oxley imposes costly requirements at the expense of innovative risk-taking. The law's most controversial provision requires a company's management to gauge whether internal controls aimed at preventing improper accounting are sufficient, and requires independent auditors to test those controls.

Relax and Unwind

Some are pressing the SEC and Congress to unwind aspects of Sarbanes-Oxley. Republican lawmakers have introduced bills to lessen its impact on small businesses, but they face an uphill fight. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has promised to try to make Sarbanes-Oxley less costly, but his changes are unlikely to satisfy the law's critics.

A free-market group filed a lawsuit against the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, saying its creation under the law violates the Constitution. The plaintiffs plan to use the suit to open up the whole law for review.

In some cases, the backlash has succeeded. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce sued the SEC over a rule requiring that 75% of a mutual fund's board, including its chairman, be independent -- a regulation prompted in part by revelations about funds allowing some clients to make trades that cheated other clients. An appeals court last month returned the rule to the SEC for further consideration. And a hedge-fund adviser has sued the SEC over a rule that requires such advisers to register with the agency; that case is pending.

The most significant setback for authorities was a 2005 Supreme Court decision overturning the criminal conviction of accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP, which had been accused of impeding the probe of Enron, a client. The conviction put Andersen out of business, costing thousands of employees their jobs, so its reversal opened the government to heavy criticism over the decision to prosecute.

DOJ_NMG_0029657

Since then, the Bush administration has shied away from indicting corporations. Yet on May 18, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, a law firm that made an industry of suing companies on behalf of wronged shareholders, was indicted along with two partners on charges of funneling kickbacks to plaintiffs in dozens of class-action cases.

Prosecutors continue to use the threat of indictment to force companies to cooperate with investigators and to accept so-called deferred prosecution agreements. These impose requirements aimed at keeping companies honest -- including that they hire independent monitors -- and leave them vulnerable to swift conviction if they falter. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Computer Associates International Inc. (now CA Inc.) and other companies have accepted such agreements.

That tactic is in line with recommendations laid out in a controversial 2003 memo by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. It said federal prosecutors should consider indicting corporations if their executives and directors don't swiftly and voluntarily cooperate.

Business groups and defense lawyers have become increasingly critical of the government's methods, which include pressuring companies to waive attorney-client privilege and to stop paying legal fees for employees under scrutiny. Congress has held hearings on the matter, and the American Bar Association, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and others have pushed the Justice Department to lighten up.

"The government should not be in the position of saying, 'If you don't do X, Y and Z, then we are going to nuke you out of business,' " said Marc Mukasey, a former federal prosecutor.

Enron Task Force Had Rocky Path To Big Victory (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON -- The Enron Task Force's uneven record looks sharply improved after it scored big wins in its defining case yesterday with the convictions of former Chief Executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2.

The high-profile convictions cap a series of cases that have, so far, produced a mixed record for the Task Force. While it has won some crucial court battles and pleas, one of its other high-profile cases, a conviction of accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP, was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court. (Messrs. Lay and Skilling will appeal their cases.)

The Task Force, created in the wake of Enron's Dec. 2001 collapse into bankruptcy, has brought criminal charges against 33 people and 16 of them have pleaded guilty to Enron-related crimes. With yesterday's verdicts, prosecutors have won convictions against seven individuals, while one person has been acquitted. A trial of several former executives of Enron's high-speed telecommunications unit ended with no convictions and acquittals on numerous counts. The Task Force is retrying the defendants on the remaining counts in three separate trials. A jury verdict in one of those trials, held recently in the courtroom next to the Skilling-Lay case, could come any day.

In bringing its battery of cases, the Task Force carried the governmental powers to issue subpoenas, fashion criminal charges, grant immunity and negotiate plea bargains. Despite those sweeping powers, the Enron Task Force suffered at times from communication problems, bureaucratic infighting and disagreements over tactics.

Communication issues became so bad that Task Force members had to rely on personal email accounts because the email system used by federal prosecutors doesn't fully mesh with the email system used by agents at the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Only around last summer, more than a year after Messrs. Lay and Skilling had been indicted, did investigators obtain the capacity to electronically search through the vast archives of Enron documents, say people familiar with the matter. These people blame the delays on a failure to marshal resources in a timely fashion. For instance, the Task Force went for long stretches with only one paralegal to help the attorneys.

"One of our greatest fears was, 'What else was out there?' " among the millions of Enron documents, said Sam Buell, a former Task Force member now teaching at the University of Texas law school. Another person close to the Task Force recalled one instance where prosecutors learned about potentially important documents in one of the Enron cases only when they were filed in court by defense attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0029658

Enron's failure sparked a media and political firestorm, partly because Mr. Lay had been a friend and major campaign supporter of President Bush. The formation of the Task Force enabled members to concentrate on one subject -- as opposed to the multiple cases that a typical prosecutor or FBI agent has to juggle.

The formation of the Task Force required unusually large amounts of travel time and time away from home. For instance, John Hueston3, one of the lead prosecutors on the Skilling-Lay case, has been living in Houston since late last year and has gotten home to Southern California for two days to see his family.

Partly as a result, the Task Force experienced lots of turnover. Of the attorneys currently on the Task Force, the longest serving is deputy director Kathryn Ruemmler, who joined the team in late 2003, about 18 months after the unit was founded. The Task Force is on its third director, Sean Berkowitz4. The first two, Leslie Caldwell and Andrew Weissmann, left for private practice.

Controversy surrounded the Task Force from its inception. Some wondered whether the Bush administration would vigorously pursue possible crimes involving a political supporter as big as Mr. Lay. Others wondered whether the Task Force would be too aggressive -- just to show that there wasn't any political favoritism. Following his July 2004 indictment, Mr. Lay argued that the charges against him looked "like part of a political campaign."

The Task Force drew heat for indicting Andersen for obstruction of justice in connection with destroying large amounts of Enron-related documents. Critics contended that the Task Force unfairly penalized thousands of innocent Andersen employees for the alleged crimes of a few. Andersen's conviction helped put the large accounting firm out of business.

Other, less-noticed strategy calls produced disputes within the Task Force. Several people familiar with the unit have questioned the decision to allow civil suits by Enron shareholders to go forward at the same time as the criminal probe. Criminal defense attorneys have used those civil proceedings to depose many prospective witnesses and get a window into potential testimony. The Task Force didn't move to stop the civil proceedings, a block that often happens in criminal probes, because prosecutors thought it would be unfair -- and politically untenable -- to slow efforts to recover money for Enron shareholders, say people familiar with the matter.

There was debate within the Task Force over whether to include Mr. Lay in the case against Mr. Skilling, which at the time included Enron's former chief accounting officer, Richard Causey5 (who reached a plea bargain with prosecutors). Although all three were part of the same alleged conspiracy, Mr. Lay's purported role was largely confined to a several-month period after Mr. Skilling quit Enron in August 2001. Some prosecutors worried that adding Mr. Lay to the case could distract or confuse jurors, says one person familiar with the matter.

Plus, it was widely believed that the case against Mr. Lay was a tougher one to prove than the one against Mr. Skilling.

Enron Convictions Solidifies Corporate America's Reform Movement (KRT)

By David Greising

Knight Ridder, May 26, 2006

CHICAGO - Enron. The very word encapsulates an era.

It conjures images of too-cozy board rooms, all-powerful CEOs, compliant accountants, greed-struck employees and, ultimately, out-of-luck investors.

And now, thanks to the convictions of former chief executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, Enron finally can stand for something else.

It stands for justice, thanks to the jury's unequivocal verdict.

The convictions also likely will embolden the sheriffs in town - federal prosecutors, the Securities and Exchange Commission, ambitious district attorneys and even a few private investors - to forge ahead in the challenging, ongoing effort to battle business corruption.

Some argue that a guilty verdict was not needed to exact justice. A flurry of post-Enron reforms, highlighted by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, had done that, they say.

"Even if there had been an acquittal, that would have been ok," said Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "The changes that this case has brought are a victory in their own right."

DOJ_NMG_0029659

But Andrew Weissmann disagrees. Weissmann laid the investigative foundation for Thursday's verdict as head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. Before he stepped down nearly a year ago, he sifted through the grubby entrails of the corrupt Enron enterprise.

Weissmann also led the prosecution of Arthur Andersen. And since the Supreme Court threw out the Andersen guilty verdict because of the judge's flawed jury instruction, he has seen how a final verdict can muddle the public's perceptions of right and wrong.

An acquittal would have changed the conversation. Inevitably, people would have focused us on the ways the prosecutors blew the trial, or that the government overreached, in much the same way that people now muse about Andersen's demise.

Apologists might even have emerged. Some might even have embraced the preposterous Skilling-Lay defense - that a cabal of journalists and short sellers doomed a complex but legitimate enterprise.

"A huge part of the justice system is holding people accountable," Weissmann said Thursday. "In terms of the larger picture - what Enron meant to corporate America - this is a real sea change, a paradigm shift in the way corporations view their obligations to the public."

To appreciate how far the verdict takes us, first consider how far we've already come.

In their hey days, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling straddled the world. Lay was George W. Bush's "Kenny Boy," a source of civic pride to Houston, an architect of Dick Cheney's energy policy and a leading voice in corporate America.

Skilling was slicked-back and whip-smart. He was the brain and the bustle behind Enron's transformation from a company that traded electricity to a new kind of corporate colossus that made billions trading just about anything.

Had Lay and Skilling been acquitted, they might have become objects of pity, or at least puzzlement. Convicted, they become object lessons instead.

Any executive, anywhere, who might want to cut a corner or break a law, must keep Lay and Skilling in mind. And government enforcement officials, everywhere, should take note, too, and vow not to let things get quite so Enron-bad before they step in. The conviction is a signal that there's still plenty of work to do.

For example: Hedge funds are powerful and mysterious, just as Ivan Boesky and Michael Milken were in their heyday. Prosecutions around the fringes of that industry are an encouraging sign that regulators are beginning to keep tabs on the derring-do of hedge funds, and are trying to sort out the legal from the illegal before a crisis occurs.

An acquittal for Lay and Skilling could have set vigilance back. It could have emboldened critics who say reforms such as Sarbanes-Oxley have gone too far. Acquittal might have encouraged the SEC, or the Justice Department, to ease up, to quit bringing criminal cases. If you can't convict on Enron, the argument might go, then you just can't convict.

So when the Enron jury spoke on Lay and Skilling, they did more than call the former Enron executives guilty. They gave voice to the notion that the reform movement in corporate America still has plenty of room to run.

Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (CHIT)

By Greg Burns

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

Embracing a prosecution that focused on simple lies instead of complex accounting, a federal jury Thursday convicted Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling of criminal charges stemming from their leading role in the Enron Corp. scandal.

The panel found Lay guilty of all six fraud and conspiracy counts against him, while Skilling was convicted of 19 counts, including one of insider trading, and acquitted on the remaining nine for lack of evidence.

The decisive conviction of Enron's top brass brings closure to one of the most devastating frauds in American business history, and it represents a major victory for the government crackdown on corporate crime.

"It's been a long, long time coming," said Chicagoan Sean Berkowitz, lead prosecutor of the government's Enron Task Force. "The system worked."

The collapse of Enron nearly five years ago wiped out 5,000 jobs and billions of dollars in wealth, shaking the public's confidence in financial markets and leading to the indictment and liquidation of Chicago's Andersen accounting firm. Enron's shocking demise also led directly to legislation that changed and strengthened the rules of accountability for senior executives.

DOJ_NMG_0029660

After failing to win convictions in several other prominent white-collar cases, federal prosecutors sought to keep it simple in Houston. Rather than focus on the nuances of a highly complex corporation, at one time the nation's seventh largest, they emphasized how Lay and Skilling repeatedly deceived the public.

"They lied to their investors, they omitted critical facts, and at times they put their interests ahead of their shareholders," Berkowitz told jurors in his final argument last week. "They lied from the stand."

The key was presenting a "clear and focused" case, said Sheldon Zenner, a veteran trial attorney at Katten Muchin Rosenman in Chicago. "Jurors could understand without getting bogged down in the minutiae of the accounting."

The eight-woman, four-man jury deliberated for more than five days, embracing the testimony of a parade of former Enron executives who said Lay and Skilling condoned the use of accounting tricks to boost reported profits and hide debt.

The defendants' decision to take the stand didn't particularly help their case, said a juror interviewed after the verdicts were delivered.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying," said business owner Wendy Vaughn. But "there were places in their testimony where I felt their character was questioned."

Lay's sale of $20 million of Enron stock in 2001, just months before the company collapsed, also weighed heavily with jurors. One expressed disgust at the transaction, which came as Lay publicly urged Enron employees to buy more of the plunging shares: It was "a disgrace," said electrical designer Doug Martin.

Lay also was convicted Thursday of bank fraud and making false statements in a separate non-jury trial.

The 64-year-old Lay and 52-year-old Skilling face steep penalties, potentially including life in prison. Sentencing is set for Sept. 11.

Lay's charges carry a maximum penalty of 45 years in prison for the corporate trial and 120 years in the personal banking trial, according to The Associated Press. Skilling's charges carry a maximum penalty of 185 years.

]Much discretion rests with U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, a no-nonsense jurist who has a history of imposing lengthy terms. The likely sentences easily could stretch for two decades, legal experts said.

As Lake read the verdicts from the bench, Lay tossed his head at hearing the first "guilty" on the conspiracy count. He clutched his wife's hand as he heard that word over and over again.

Lay sat with his wife, Linda; his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team; and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn. As Lay clutched Linda Lay's hand, the three women leaned forward and began to sob quietly.

After Lake left the courtroom, Lay's family and some friends gathered around him as the ex-chairman, red-faced and fighting back tears, hugged them and thanked them for their support.

Skilling, sitting with his younger brother, Mark, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," Skilling told reporters outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works."

His chief defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, vowed to file a "full and vigorous" appeal.

"We're going to stand behind him," Petrocelli said. "As I told him, we've just begun to fight."

Skilling's other brother, Tom, chief meteorologist for the Chicago Tribune and WGN-TV, who attended portions of the trial in Houston, could not be reached for comment Thursday.

The verdicts were perhaps the government's most important victory in its high-profile war against corporate corruption.

"The jury has spoken, and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country: You can't lie to shareholders," Berkowitz said. "No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules."

Prosecutor John Hueston, who sparred with Lay on the stand, said the ex-chairman had missed "a golden opportunity" to save Enron.

"He made that choice to put his own interests ahead of that of the shareholders and investors," Hueston said. "And he did that by choosing not to tell the unvarnished truth, and he did it by choosing not to ask the hard questions."

Enron's implosion prompted a wave of outrage, leading to sweeping new regulations, including the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law aimed at curbing corporate wrongdoing and restoring confidence in financial statements.

DOJ_NMG_0029661

Lay and Skilling, who have insisted they were made scapegoats for Enron's shocking 2001 collapse, became the headline targets of the crackdown on the boardroom that also resulted in charges against executives at WorldCom Inc., Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and other giant companies.

Enron's auditors were among the first casualties, with Andersen going out of business mere months after its client's collapse.

Testimony at Andersen's criminal trial on an obstruction-of-justice charge showed that its employees shredded mounds of Enron-related documents after the federal investigation was launched. The U.S. Supreme Court in July overturned the company's 2002 conviction because of faulty jury instructions.

Lay and Skilling attempted to have their trial moved to a location less saturated by media coverage of Enron's crash, but there were few places in America where the news hadn't penetrated.

"Just the mention of the name Enron evokes images of duplicity and greed," Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of enforcement for the Securities and Exchange Commission, said at the time of Lay's July 2004 indictment.

An Oscar-nominated documentary film and a handful of mass-market books were spawned by the scandal. Enron whistle-blower Sherron Watkins, in addition to co-authoring a book and testifying against her former bosses, launched a lucrative second career lecturing on business ethics.

An investigation by the Enron Task Force, created by the Department of Justice shortly after the company's bankruptcy filing, has resulted in charges against more than 20 people. Enron's collapse took with it more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension assets and 5,600 jobs.

Reaction to the verdict among ex-Enron employees ranged from elation to indifference. Sherri Saunders, who lost her job and $1 million in retirement savings, said the verdict "gives me a little comfort."

She's hoping for stiff sentences because Lay and Skilling never took responsibility or showed remorse, she told The Associated Press. "If Ken Lay gets 20 years, he'll probably die in jail. So 20 years would be good."

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation, said, "Enron was the canary in the mineshaft, and subsequently a lot of other companies were found to have engaged in practices which abused the trust that had been placed in them."

Added Michael Oxley (R-Ohio): "The verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies. Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

The Los Angeles Times, a Tribune newspaper, contributed to this report, as did Tribune news wires.

For Ex-Enron Employees, Verdict Is Personal (HC)

By Purva Patel

Houston Chronicle, May 26, 2006

For those with ties to Enron, the announcement of the verdict shortly after 11 a.m was something they felt personally. Sherron Watkins

Former Enron vice president Sherron Watkins, who warned Lay of accounting problems at the company was attending her daughter's first grade graduation when she heard the news.

"I think the jury has sent a message that they will hold leaders accountable for what takes place in their organization. I think CEOS need to be more than effectively public relations heads. They bear responsibility to know what's going on in their company and ensure the value system is firmly in place. Fred Philipson

Fred Philipson, who used to work in Enron's business development department before being laid off, said he was relieved when he heard the guilty verdicts. But he didn't always think Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling were guilty.

"I think I gave them the benefit of the doubt initially. That there is at least a possibility that they weren't guilty, but as the trial wore on and evidence was brought out, I did believe they were guilty."

Philipson, 43, now works for the Harris County Toll Authority, after being unemployed for a year after Enron filed for bankruptcy. Erica BessDuncan

DOJ_NMG_0029662

Erica BessDuncan, 34, who did marketing and communications work for Enron, said she says she never doubted that Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling were guilty.

"I'm happy," she said. "A part of me feels bad for their families because obviously they're probably going to go away for a long time, but I'm relieved because I do believe Skilling and Lay are guilty. Ultimately Lay was responsible for what happened.His saying he didn't know what was going on and trusted what his underlings told him is not an excuse. The same goes for Skilling ."

BessDuncan said she's glad she can put it behind her because she's worked hard moving on. Even though sentencing is months away, she says she's just happy it's over and isn't too worried about what punishment each will receive.

"I think obviously returning all their ill gotten money and putting it in the fund to be dispersed to former employees and shareholder is more appropriate than prison time given their age for both of them. But more than anything I think this is a m oral victory. I don't really care what ultimately happens to them." John Olson

John Olson of Sanders Morris Harris Group, an outspoken analyst who was forced out of a previous firm after writing negative reports about Enron that prompted Ken Lay to pressure his employer, told CNBC immediately after the verdict was read , "These two gentlemen rode the edge quite a bit. I feel personally sorry for the families but these people, I think, were just operating in a different dimension than the rest of us."

While Olson said he knew Enron was manufacturing paper profits, because the company did not make proper disclosures to the SEC it was tough to find a smoking gun.

"I couldn't even get to that level really because you really would hear this from people — that it was built on a house of cards — but you couldn't go look at the 10Ks or 10Q s (SEC documents) and say this is wrong because it was cosmetically covered." Rod Jordan

The verdict will likely bring relief to many former employees, said Rod Jordan, co-founder of the Severed Enron Employee Coalition.

"I think it was the right verdict," Jordan said. "I always have been disappointed that men of that potential quality would step over the line. I think it's vindication as former employees that the top people were found guilty and had their day in court. They were picking at people in the middle and now they've reached the top. It's good that justice was served."

He added he hoped the guilty verdicts would help restore trust in the country's justice system.

He also thinks both Lay and Skilling should spend at least 12 years in jail, two more than Andy Fastow received in exchange for his plea deal.

From The Ex-Employees: Revenge, Shock, Sadness (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

"I am in such an excellent mood," former Enron Corp. employee Ken Horton gushed from Houston yesterday.

Friends started calling Horton about 10:30 a.m. central time after news broke that a verdict had been reached in the trial of former Enron executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Within a half-hour, the guilty verdicts began rolling in, the culmination of a 16-week trial, a four-year investigation and a nearly five-year saga for the 30,000 former employees of the energy company, many of whom lost jobs they loved and retirement savings they counted on.

Some, like Horton, were happy. Others were saddened.

Horton, who followed the trial closely, worked under Richard Buy, then Enron's chief risk officer. Enron's risk assessment division conducted sophisticated, minute-by-minute mathematical analyses that assessed the risk presented to the company by its various deals.

Horton joined Enron in 1998 and was one of the thousands of employees who boxed up their belongings and marched out of the gleaming Enron tower around the time the company declared bankruptcy in December 2001.

Like many employees, Horton felt betrayed by leaders of a company he loved.

"If I had to do it all over again, I would work at Enron again," he said. "I just would have invested a little differently."

DOJ_NMG_0029663

Like many Enron employees, Horton also filled his retirement account with Enron stock. His loss "was in the six figures," he said. "It set my retirement back a few years."

Horton called working at Enron an "intense" experience.

"One of the really strong characteristics of the company was how much it was driven by deals," he said. "The people managing these deals had enormous bonuses riding on the deals and rode everybody hard."

Adam Plager's reaction to yesterday's verdicts was shock.

"I never thought" the jury would reach a guilty verdict, said the former Enron software engineer. "I thought it was too complicated of a case."

As the chief executive of his own small software company, which he founded shortly after exiting Enron in December 2001 ("or after it exited me," he said), Plager said he believes top executives should be held accountable for the failures of their companies. But he was afraid the guilty verdicts would take attention from others culpable for the company's downfall: Wall Street banks that loaned the company money while underwriting its deals and stock analysts who touted the Enron stock without asking the company tough questions about its financials.

Plager lost his 401(k) plan, which was filled with Enron stock, but had prudently diversified the rest of his portfolio based on Enron's spendthrift ways. Smart companies don't spend money "like water," he thought.

"I went to England once, flew first-class and stayed at a hotel across from Buckingham Palace for a project that never should have required me to be there," he said. "With a little more planning, I would not have had to be there."

Rod Jordan was a manager in the much-maligned Enron Energy Services business, which contracted with companies, such as J.C. Penney Co., to manage their energy needs. The division inflated its earnings by booking long-term anticipated profits on current earnings reports.

Jordan bought his first Enron stock in 1991 at $11 per share. He joined Enron in 1998 with a five-year plan to retire from the company with profits from his Enron stock, which soared as high as $90 per share in August 2000. Jordan projected that it would top out at $120 per share by 2003 and he'd be set. Instead, he found himself part of the exodus of Enron employees in December 2001.

The verdicts yesterday stung Jordan a little. He said justice had been done, but he admitted to have been pulling, at least early on, for a Lay acquittal.

"I wanted someone high up that I could still believe in," Jordan said. "That hope sort of faded away after the stuff started coming out" during the trial, he said.

After he lost his job, he started the Severed Enron Employees Coalition, a Web network that kept former employees in touch and served as a resource for those looking for jobs.

Jordan recently surveyed the 1,200-member coalition about life after Enron and got more than 200 responses, he said. About 60 percent of the respondents said they believed Lay was guilty, while all but two respondents felt that way about Skilling.

"There was a lot more animosity toward Skilling in the company," Jordan said.

Skilling, who joined Enron from McKinsey & Co. in 1990, led Enron's conversion from a pipeline company to the industry's leading energy trader. He was the company's chief executive from February 2001 to August 2001, when he abruptly resigned, citing personal reasons. Lay, who founded Enron and preceded Skilling as chief executive, took over after his resignation and helmed the company until its bankruptcy.

Tracy Randall is one of the former Enron employees saddened by the verdicts.

An IT staffer from 1997 to 2003, she followed the company into reorganization. She still harbors warm feelings for Lay.

"I just can't believe they said he was guilty," she wrote via e-mail from Houston. "He might be accountable for some mistakes, but I don't think he should go to prison. He hired the best of the best to run things for him, and they failed him."

Many Who Lost Savings, Jobs Pleased (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029664

Roy Rinard was up in the bucket of his service truck, working on a power line for Portland General Electric on Thursday morning when his wife, Vicki, called on his cellphone to say the verdicts were coming in half an hour.

The 57-year-old Rinard, who lost $470,000 in 401(k) savings when Enron collapsed, quickly finished his work, got down and flipped on the radio.

News that former Enron CEOs Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay were guilty on nearly all counts left him ecstatic, a feeling shared by others who lost jobs, retirement money or both in the collapse of what was once the nation's seventh-largest company.

"It restores our faith in the system," says Rinard, "that people don't get away scot-free just because they have money for good defense lawyers."

Since 1980, Rinard has worked in Oregon for the Portland electric company, which was purchased by Enron in 1997. Most of his retirement savings were in his company's 401(k) program at the time of the sale, when it converted to Enron stock.

After Enron went bankrupt in 2001, he and his wife, Vicki, had to sell their home and buy a much smaller one. Like many other former Enron employees, they gave up plans for travel, retirement and helping the grandkids.

The verdicts, he says, "brought a small sense of closure to a very difficult five years."

Enron's collapse resulted in the loss of $60 billion in market value on Wall Street, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

Tom Padgett, 63, was about to retire in 2001 when he was laid off from the Enron plant where he worked as a senior lab technician. He lost about $700,000 in retirement savings — and it took a year and a half for him to find another job.

He, too, was pleased with the verdicts. "They got exactly what they deserve," says Padgett.

Gary Kemper, 62, who worked for an Enron company for more than 29 years, says he lost $280,000 in his 401(k). A fitting punishment in Kemper's opinion would be to "put (Lay) on the streets of Houston without a penny in his pocket like he did with the Enron employees."

Many of the former employees are involved in shareholder lawsuits that seek some redress for their losses. But most don't expect to see much of their savings back.

"I feel good about the verdict, but my retirement is still gone," says Sherri Saunders, 58, who worked as an executive secretary for Enron for 24 years and lost about $1 million in retirement savings.

Saunders now has a new job she loves: head secretary to a top executive at Methodist Hospital in Houston: "We're rebuilding, slowly plodding along."

Schwarzenegger Strategists Gain Confidence (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

SCHWARZENEGGER STRATEGISTS gain confidence, but challenges remain.

Scrambling to avoid termination, California governor ditches conservative 2005 script and tacks toward center. In campaign, led by former Bush strategists, he criticizes unpopular president on climate change, Medicare and immigration. A new poll by Public Policy Institute of California pegs ex-movie star's approval at 36%, up from 32% six months ago.

Seven in 10 back his 10-year $222 billion infrastructure-spending plan. But Schwarzenegger only runs even against lesser-known Democratic challengers Steve Westly and Phil Angelides, who square off in June primary. Like Democratic Gov. Davis in 2002, he'll run "a strongly negative" campaign, predicts Berkeley analyst Bruce Cain.

"Arnold has improved his position tactically," cautions Democratic strategist Bill Carrick, but faces "hostile" electorate.

OUTLOOK REMAINS MURKY for next tax steps.

In bill extending expiring provisions, lawmakers from Louisiana and New York seek more tax breaks for disaster zones. Sen. Santorum of Pennsylvania pushes bill encouraging charitable donations, but Finance Chairman Grassley insists on crackdown on charitable abuses.

DOJ_NMG_0029665

Grassley looks for compromise on estate tax, but some in both parties prefer pre-election stalemate. Majority Leader Frist plans base-pleasing June vote on full repeal but lacks strength to overcome filibuster. Kyl of Arizona hopes failure will jump-start talks on preserving "death tax" only for richest families.

WHITE HOUSE BACKS Bernanke as Fed faces heat.

Inflation-wary investors want more interest-rate boosts, while election-minded politicians complain. But "the Fed knows what's best," says Bush economic adviser Al Hubbard. Markets seek clues to Fed thinking in next week's release of May 10 policy-meeting summary.

After lackluster April job growth, forthcoming report on May employment becomes important signal. A strong number will please Bush but increase pressure on the Fed to tap monetary brakes.

Analyst Tom Gallagher calls Bernanke's apology for talking to CNBC's Bartiromo a mea culpa, "not a Maria culpa."

BOTH PARTIES DOUBT Enron verdicts will have large political impact. "The public verdict is already in on CEO greed at the expense of the company's own employees," says ex-Clinton strategist Stan Greenberg. Adds Republican pollster Neil Newhouse, "There could have been a public backlash had the verdicts not come in guilty."

TURNING TABLES: At House panel hearing on runaway executive compensation, Republicans highlight fees for plaintiffs lawyers, who are big Democratic donors. "Trial lawyers are the ones who are sopping up investors' wealth," argued Rep. McHenry, North Carolina Republican. Democrat Watt, also of North Carolina, called the argument "bizarre."

PELOSI'S DEMAND that embattled Louisiana Rep. Jefferson quit tax-writing committee angers Black Caucus, since he hasn't yet been charged in bribe probe. Matt Bennett of centrist Democratic group Third Way calls Pelosi "dead right" because "this is politics."

AMERICAN DIPLOMATS WORK toward proposal on restricting nuclear technologies to Iran and other countries. The proposal aims to assure those seeking nuclear power, but not weapons, that they can gain necessary feedstock under safeguards. Among potential beneficiaries: Indonesia and Ukraine.

'NET NEUTRALITY' backers gain -- for now.

House Judiciary Committee passes a bill, supported by the likes of Google, embracing government role in assuring that phone and cable companies don't play favorites. Bad news for Internet firms fearing discrimination: Only one-fourth of committee Republicans backed the bill.

Partisan split bodes well for phone and cable firms. House leaders normally bury legislation that most Republicans oppose. At hearing on separate Internet-gambling bill, Chairman Sensenbrenner asks members to say "woof" or "no" in support of amendment on horse and dog racing.

The amendment failed, but the bill passed, 25 woofs to 11.

MINOR MEMOS: As Gore promotes global-warming movie, a Hillary Rodham Clinton adviser taunts, "Run, Al, run!!" ... College Republicans ridicule the movie with Global Warming Beach Parties. ... After column promoting antimalaria mosquito nets for Africa generates $860,000 for U.N. Foundation, Sports Illustrated's Rick Reilly says, "I had no idea how many people read me...(and that) they had this much money."

Kenny Boy, Meet Brownie (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, May 26, 2006

May 25, 2006 - If you want a date to mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era in American life, you may as well make it this one: May 25, 2006. The Enron jury in Houston didn't just put the wood to Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling. The jurors took a chainsaw to the moral claims of the Texas-based corporate culture that had helped fuel the rise to power of President George W. Bush.

First, caveats. There's no evidence that the president or anyone in his entourage knew about or benefited financially from the house of cards that Lay and Skilling built—and that a federal jury now has found to have been an edifice of fraud.

The Bush Crowd was old school in the energy bidness and viewed Lay & Co. as hustling parvenus who had no real interest in finding and pumping oil—what real men in Texas do.

DOJ_NMG_0029666

Most of what Enron concocted was assembled in the go-go Clinton years. Bush's idea of an oilman was his old Bible-study buddy, the upright, clean-as-a-whistle Don Evans. As the Enron scam was falling apart, Lay frantically sought help from Evans—by then the Commerce secretary—among others (including Democrats such as former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert Rubin). He got nowhere, and had the chutzpah to be bitter about it.

Ultimately, Bush's Justice Department pressed the case against Enron—and won.

Still, when the history books are written, the debit side of the Bush-era ledger will include a line labeled "Kenny Boy." That's the nickname Bush gave the guy he later claimed he barely knew.

As Texas governor from 1995 to 2000, Bush and consiglieri Karl Rove cultivated the Enronites for their vast connections and money; more than that, Bush linked arms with Lay in the belief that market forces alone should guide the production, distribution and use of energy. But the theory ran riot at Enron, giving license to corporate buccaneers who blithely screwed consumers, employees and shareholders alike. The old saying applies to Enron: you lie down with dogs, you get up with fleas.

Once A Friend And Ally, Now A Distant Memory (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

He started as "Kenny Boy." Then he was a "supporter," an acquaintance who had not talked to President Bush in "quite some time." Now he is a man convicted of conspiracy and fraud, and a symbol of corporate corruption.

This is former Enron chief Kenneth L. Lay's transformation in the words of President Bush and his spokesmen -- going from a personal and political ally to someone the White House sought to keep as distant as possible as his role in the multibillion-dollar collapse of the energy giant became clear.

In the 1980s, when Bush was working in the Texas oil industry, his firm invested in a drilling partnership with Lay's company, a predecessor to Enron. In 1992, Lay was co-chairman of the Republican National Convention in Houston that re-nominated President George H.W. Bush.

Later, Lay was a major fundraiser for George W. Bush's political career. He delivered more than $300,000 for his two gubernatorial campaigns, according to Texans for Public Justice. In 1997, Bush wrote to Lay: "Dear Ken, One of the sad things about old friends is that they seem to be getting older -- just like you! 55 years old. Wow. . . . Laura and I value our friendship with you. . . . Your younger friend, George W. Bush."

In the 2000 presidential race, Lay remained a steadfast ally. Lay was a Bush "Pioneer" who raised at least $100,000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Enron also made its jet available and contributed to inaugural festivities.

Lay later wrote to the new president and the first lady that he was "so proud of you and look forward to seeing both of you in the White House." But Lay also found influence in the administration.

Vice President Cheney invited Lay to take part in his secret energy task force meetings. Cheney also talked to the Indian government about a debt it owed Enron for the rebuilding of a power plant. Numerous administration officials held Enron stock. Lawrence B. Lindsey, Bush's chief economic adviser at the time, had sat on Enron's board, receiving $50,000.

These connections came to light as Enron collapsed under the weight of a broad accounting fraud. It was also revealed that Enron executives had sought the counsel of administration officials as bankruptcy loomed.

Responding to public outrage, the White House promoted corporate accountability and put space between itself and Enron. Bush said only that "Ken Lay is a supporter," and that he "first got to know Ken" in 1994 when "he was a supporter of Ann Richards," the Democratic governor Bush ousted. Dan Bartlett, the White House communications director, said the administration "is leading the investigation, not being resistant."

White House press secretary Tony Snow congratulated the Justice Department yesterday on winning the case, adding: "The administration's been pretty clear there's no tolerance for corporate corruption."

U.K. Banker Fighting Extradition Calls Enron Case `Terrifying' (BLOOM)

By Megan Murphy

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029667

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- A British banker fighting extradition to the U.S. on Enron Corp.-related charges said he was ``terrified" by today's convictions of the company's former Chairman Kenneth Lay and ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling and questioned why the men chose to fight the case.

``It was either an incredibly brave or foolhardy thing that they did, and I guess they're paying the consequences now," David Bermingham said in a telephone interview from his home outside London. ``They had both hands tied behind their back, and they were up against the 400-pound gorilla. The deck was completely stacked against them."

Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew, all former employees of Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, are wanted in Texas for allegedly pocketing millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership.

They are among the 33 individuals, including Lay and Skilling, the U.S. government has prosecuted in connection with the energy trader's implosion, which wiped out thousands of jobs and more than $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight.

A jury in a Houston federal court deliberated six days before convicting Skilling, 52, of 19 of the 28 charges against him and Lay, 64, of all six counts. Both men face at least 25 years in prison, while Skilling may receive additional jail time after being found guilty of using inside information to sell Enron stock.

`NatWest Three'

Bermingham said today that while he didn't have any opinion on whether Lay or Skilling were guilty of the fraud and conspiracy charges against them, the fact that both men may spend the rest of their lives in prison only reinforced the importance of the bankers' ongoing battle against extradition.

The ``NatWest Three," as Bermingham, Darby and Mulgrew are known in Britain, were charged with seven counts of wire fraud in 2002 for allegedly skimming $7.3 million by duping their former employer over the value of an Enron partnership known as ``Swap Sub." The indictments were the first criminal fraud charges to emerge from the U.S. Justice Department's probe into the energy trader's collapse.

If they lose their fight against extradition, now on appeal to Britain's highest court, the men are likely to be forced into some sort of plea arrangement with U.S. prosecutors, Bermingham said.

``We can't defend ourselves in Houston," Bermingham said. ``Our government knows that, and the U.S. government knows that. If someone feels there is a case to answer, let us fight our case in London. At least then it will be a fair fight."

Human Rights

Bermingham, Darby and Mulgrew say that as British citizens accused of defrauding a British bank, any charges brought against them should be brought in the U.K. They also claim that their extradition, which is being pursued under new ``fast-track" legislation designed to clamp down on terrorism and other cross- border crime, would violate their human rights.

The House of Lords, Britain's highest court, is expected to decide within the next few weeks whether to hear a series of legal challenges to Britain's new extradition arrangements with the U.S., including the NatWest Three case.

``I don't see today's verdict as having any direct bearing on our case, but I certainly feel sorry for them," Bermingham said. ``The government had effectively stopped them from bringing any real defense, by having so many cooperating witnesses on their side. In retrospect, you've got to wonder if they made the right decision."

Wives, Ex-wives Faced Trials Of Their Own (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell And Mindy Fetterman

USA Today, May 26, 2006

In courtroom wrangling over white-collar crimes, the way family support is perceived can be important. In the Enron trial, it was often about the wives.

Linda Lay, the former secretary turned second wife to Enron ex-chairman Ken Lay, stood by her man every day of the four-month trial that ended in her husband's conviction Thursday.

Usually, she sat in the first row of the spectator gallery, about 20 feet from her husband. But as the clock approached 11 a.m. in Houston Thursday, the hour of judgment for Ken Lay, she moved into the front part of the courtroom to be beside him.

Linda Lay maintained the same tight grasp on her husband's hand that she's had in all the trips to and from the courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0029668

That wasn't the case with Rebecca Carter, former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling's second wife and former corporate board secretary. She did not attend every day of the trial and was not in the courtroom when it was time for a verdict. Outside the courthouse, after being convicted on all counts, Skilling thanked his family, especially his three children, but didn't mention his wife.

Beth Bonora, a jury consultant in San Francisco, says it's important for those on trial to have family members in the courtroom to "convey that other people care about you and believe in you. … People are curious about relationships, the dynamics" of family members in the courtroom.

The Enron wives were under a lot of pressure, says Mike Paul, a New York public relations consultant who advises clients facing charges.

"You have these wives who themselves probably were lied to for many, many years and who probably knew things that they turned their heads away from, and they're trying to be loyal and be there for their husbands," says Paul. "They're thinking: 'I guess this is the kind of loyalty you're supposed to have.' "

But it's hard to disguise strong emotions in a courtroom, he says. "It's about fear mixed with anger; all those hidden emotions are right on top," he says. "I never tell clients to hold their wife's hand if they truly can't show empathy, because it will backfire."

Skilling's wife and his ex-wife made his legal predicament darker with their own stock trades. Before they were married, Carter sold more than $1 million in Enron stock in October and November 2000. His ex-wife, Susan Skilling Lowe, exercised Enron options for $14 million that October, about the time Enron's desperate attempt to unload unprofitable international assets fell through. Skilling testified the sales were coincidental.

Linda Lay had a more public role as the scandal unfolded. On the Today Show in January 2002, she tearfully told of the family's financial plight and the stress of having her husband's life scrutinized. She opened a consignment shop which sold hers and others' goods because of what she called a "liquidity crisis."

In the courtroom, Linda Lay favored brightly colored, yet conservative, pantsuits. Carter kept a low profile in court, often dressed in black.

The key to dressing, experts say, is to not look arrogant, overdressed, tacky or wealthy. "If they were my clients, I'd tell them that the perception is that you are these flashy, Texas, Southern women who had access to friendships with the president, the governor, with top celebrities," says Paul. "All of that is gone now."

As Skilling left the courthouse with his lawyer, the Lays joined hands again — this time with supporters inside the courthouse in a prayer circle.

Outside the courthouse, Lay, facing life in prison, described his life as "blessed." Among the reasons: "On my left is this beautiful woman who is my wife."

Books, Film, Memorabilia Not Drawing Attention (USAT)

By David Lieberman, Theresa Howard And Laura Petrecca

USA Today, May 26, 2006

NEW YORK — Enron's legacy includes several well-regarded books, an Oscar-nominated documentary, a mountain of memorabilia and — based on sales of those items — lots of yawns.

Publishers, who made the biggest bets on public interest in Enron, hope for a few more sales off the verdict, but don't expect much.

"There were a lot of (Enron) books and relatively few readers," says Michael Cader, editor of industry newsletter Publishers Lunch. "It was a complex case and the extent to which it meant anything to general readers was elusive."

For example, Kurt Eichenwald's Conspiracy of Fools: A True Story has sold 122,000 hardback and paperback copies since its release last year, says Nielsen BookScan (which does not include Wal-Mart).

"Kurt will be called upon to do a number of interviews about the verdict, and that helps drive sales," says Broadway Books spokesman David Drake. Eichenwald last week was on PBS' The Charlie Rose Show.

DOJ_NMG_0029669

The Smartest Guys in the Room: The Amazing Rise and Scandalous Fall of Enron by Fortune magazine's Bethany McLean and Peter Elkind has sold 105,000 hardback and paperback copies since 2003, according to Nielsen BookScan.

They also are hitting the talk show circuit, but even with the case resolved, Will Weisser, associate publisher at Penguin's business imprint Portfolio, calls the prospect of an updated edition "a longer-term question."

Producers of the film based on the book, Enron: The Smartest Guys in the Room, a runner-up for this year's Best Documentary Oscar, don't plan a big push for the upcoming DVD. The film earned about $4.5 million in theaters worldwide since April 2005, according to BoxOfficeMojo.com.

"We'll try to get retailers to try to put it in main locations so visibility is high," says Eamonn Bowles, president of distributor Magnolia Pictures. He also might re-release the film in Houston.

Meanwhile, auctioneers don't expect a surge of Enron-mania for souvenirs. "Some of the wind is out of the sails because of the length of time of the trial," says Dennis Kruse, president of the National Auctioneers Association.

This week, 66 Enron items have sold on eBay, says eBay spokesman Dean Jutilla, while bidders snapped up 1,285 items tied to American Idol winner Taylor Hicks.

The Enron winning bids averaged $21. Coveted items included Enron cycling jerseys and stock certificates. Getting less interest: Enron's 64-page Code of Ethics.

Among big-ticket Enron items that have sold is the giant neon version of Enron's tilted "E" logo, which went for $44,000 at a company auction in 2002. Jimmy Luu, a Houston computer salesman who made the winning offer on behalf of his boss, says he thinks it would go for more now but is unlikely to be sold. "His main intention was to get that for his personal collection."

The Enron Verdicts . . . (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

If anyone still thinks corporate chieftains are above the law, yesterday's 29 guilty verdicts against former Enron CEOs Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay should put that myth to rest. The two former masters of the Houston universe will make long-shot appeals, but the odds are that both will spend much if not all of their remaining years in a federal prison.

Sentencing is scheduled for September 11, of all dates. Yet this is somehow fitting since Skilling initially tried to blame a suspicious attempt to dump his Enron stock on the climate of uncertainty following the 9/11 attacks. He was flatly contradicted by records showing he had actually tried to sell on September 6, 2001.

More broadly, Skilling and Lay may have lost their case from the start when they hung their defense on the dubious assertion that Enron was a fundamentally sound company tripped up only because speculators were abetted by critical articles on the front page of this newspaper. "This is not a case of hear no evil, see no evil. This is a case of there was no evil," said Skilling's lead attorney.

But that was after former CFO Andrew Fastow had already pleaded guilty and admitted to helping cook the company's books. Fastow and a string of former execs testified against the two CEOs. And in the end, jurors clearly understood that companies with real assets and sound balance sheets don't just go poof as the result of a little bad press. We appreciate the free advertising, but the Journal isn't that powerful.

Meanwhile, the damage done from this fraud was terrible: tens of billions of dollars in market value, $2.1 billion in pension obligations, and 5,600 jobs lost in the December 2001 collapse. With each of the guilty verdicts carrying potential penalties of at least five years, Skilling and Lay may well spend more time in prison than Fastow, the fraud mastermind.

By way of comparison, WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers is now facing 25 years, John and Timothy Rigas of Adelphia Cable 15 and 20 years respectively, and Tyco's two top former officials 25 years apiece. That's a pretty impressive cleanup job by the Justice Department and (in the Tyco case) Manhattan District Attorney. We think these convictions of individuals -- some 30 in the Enron case alone -- will do more to deter future corporate crime than anything in Sarbanes-Oxley. At the same time, the U.S. economy has snapped back nicely, meaning that assertions of widespread corporate fraud back in 2001 and 2002 were way overblown.

The Enron verdicts are proof, if more were needed, that lying to employees, shareholders and the public about corporate finances is a serious crime that will be punished.

DOJ_NMG_0029670

And Justice For All (NYT)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, the former chief executives of Enron, had their day in court. Both had high-priced legal talent to defend them and the chance to take the stand and tell their side of the story to the jury. Yesterday, that jury found both of them guilty of criminal conduct for their part in the spectacular collapse of Enron, the first in a series of corporate scandals that shook the country's faith in its business leaders.

Mr. Lay was convicted on six counts of fraud and conspiracy and four counts of bank fraud. The jury, which acquitted Mr. Skilling on nine counts of insider trading, convicted him on 18 counts of fraud and conspiracy and one count of insider trading. These onetime corporate superstars could very well end up dying behind bars. The thought of aging men withering away in jail cells is a sad one, but no sadder in this case than in any other.

We as a society have a destructive tendency to think of crimes like holding up a convenience store or selling drugs as very serious and destructive to the social fabric, while looking more tolerantly at corporate malfeasance as simply businessmen being a little overzealous. Just because there isn't a gun doesn't mean there isn't a crime.

It is easy to see Enron as a symbol of an era of corporate lying, cheating and stealing. From the company's implausible rise to its cozy political connections to its crooked E logo, the energy giant and its cast of colorful characters always appeared to be the stuff of theater. But this was no morality play. This was about the real costs for normal people who suffered because of the machinations in the executive suites at Enron.

For one example, think of the employees at Portland General Electric, an Oregon utility company acquired by Enron four years before it went bankrupt. Many longstanding employees there lost huge chunks of their retirement funds and still face an uncertain old age. All because their business was snatched up by a company with a rotten core.

We hope the jury's verdict deters other corporate kingpins from breaking the rules. As Paul McNulty, deputy attorney general, put it in a news conference shortly after the verdict was announced, "No one, including the heads of Fortune 500 companies, is above the law." At the same time, white-collar criminal cases can be difficult, paper intensive and hard to explain to juries. We expect the verdict in the Enron case to encourage prosecutors to pursue them.

Not Just Bad Apples (WP)

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

WAY, WAY back, before dot-coms became dot-bombs, Kenneth L. Lay was part rock star, part high priest among rival energy executives. His company, Enron Corp., had seized opportunities created by deregulation and the Internet to transform the energy business, turning itself into America's seventh-biggest public company in the process. At an industry conference in 1999, Mr. Lay was asked how he could top the ninefold expansion of Enron's market capitalization over the previous decade. According to The Economist, Mr. Lay responded coolly: "We'll do it again this coming decade."

Not long after that forecast, Enron admitted that its profits for the years 1997 to 2000 had been overstated by $591 million. That confession began a downward spiral that ended in Enron's 2001 bankruptcy. But yesterday a Houston jury accepted the government's contention that Mr. Lay's bragging was deliberately dishonest rather than merely hollow. Along with Jeffrey K. Skilling, his right-hand man at Enron and briefly his successor as chief executive, Mr. Lay was found guilty of misleading investors about the true state of his firm. The sentencing phase of the trial will begin in September. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling may spend the rest of their lives in prison.

These convictions follow those of bosses from other firms that imploded around the same time, such as Tyco International Ltd., WorldCom Inc. and Adelphia Communications Corp. But Enron was the first and most famous of the corporate failures, and the Lay and Skilling verdicts are the most symbolically significant. The government's prosecutors, who were up against a defense team that cost almost $70 million, deserve credit. The criminals' victims -- investors who lost savings, and workers who lost both their jobs and their savings because their retirement plans were invested in Enron stock -- may now feel some emotional redress. Meanwhile, many plan to sue for financial redress as well.

There is a danger in this verdict, however. In the wake of Enron's bankruptcy, some argued that the problems of corporate America were the work of a few bad apples. That argument lost, for the good reason that fully 250 U.S. public companies had to restate their accounts in 2002, up from 92 five years earlier. Corporate America's problems reflected lax oversight of auditors, conflicts of interest at audit companies, accounting rules with too many inviting loopholes and so on. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002 to fix these systemic weaknesses, now faces a backlash from firms that complain of stiff compliance costs. Although some tweaks in the way the law is implemented may be justified, the welcome Enron verdict should not color the regulatory question. This decade's business scandals were not just about bad apples, and putting those apples in jail is not going to change that.

DOJ_NMG_0029671

Enron's End Game (USAT)

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Since Enron collapsed in 2001, other major accounting fraud cases have come and gone. But Enron always remained the most celebrated case, the one that epitomized an era, the one that the federal prosecutors absolutely had to win.

Now that they did, with the guilty verdicts Thursday against former CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, public attention to issues of corporate fraud and governance might wane. That would be a shame because much more remains to be done before shareholders and employees can be confident that senior managers are acting in their company's best interest, not their own.

To be sure, the verdicts accomplish a number of important objectives. They send a clear message to executives that the most flagrant forms of fraud will not be tolerated. And they send a message to defense attorneys that American juries are not stupid. The Enron jurors did not buy the "ostrich defense" that Lay and Skilling had their heads in the sand and did not see the company's problems. Nor did they buy the absurd argument that Enron was in good shape until it was undermined by news reports and investors betting the stock price would drop.

But the verdicts do not compensate the company's 5,600 employees who lost their jobs, more than $2 billion in pensions and, in many cases, much of their savings. They don't compensate investors for their $60 billion in losses when the company collapsed. They don't change the culture on Wall Street, where analysts, accountants and attorneys remain under enormous pressure to speak well of the companies they examine.

And the verdicts do nothing to thwart the looting of public companies in the form of outrageous pay packages. Executive compensation has surged in recent years as managers have figured out they needn't break the law to enrich themselves. They need only a compliant board of directors.

In a way, the business world has learned little from Lay, the central figure in the Enron saga. Lay, 64, was once a pillar of Houston society, a friend of the first President Bush and a major contributor to the current President Bush, who called him "Kenny Boy." He suffered a colossal fall and now could be sent to prison for the rest of his life.

Other executives see Lay as an oddity, a bad apple in good batch. But it is not hard to see at least a little of Lay in some of them: the greed, the arrogance, the contempt for shareholders. It's all there, everything but the comeuppance.

The Enron verdicts are good news for investors. They show how the wheels of justice can move, albeit slowly. But they will have the most positive effect if they are seen as a beginning, not an end.

Convictions Drive Home The Point Again (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling are right about one thing: The games they played at Enron were no different than the games being played at hundreds of other big public companies during the late 1990s. So in that respect, it is unfair that Lay and Skilling (and their partner in crime, Andy Fastow) have been singled out for criminal prosecution. Unfair -- and totally necessary.

The point of criminal prosecution of corporate crime is not really retribution or restitution. Former Enron shareholders and employees are not better off because of yesterday's verdict. And to the degree that there is monetary compensation to be had, civil suits are sufficient for the task.

Rather, the point of these prosecutions -- like those of executives at WorldCom, Tyco and Adelphia -- is to burn into the consciousness of all those other masters of the corporate universe that they, too, could wind up in the federal pokey if they try to enrich themselves at the expense of shareholders, creditors and employees.

DOJ_NMG_0029672

For all the nuance and sophistication of our legal system, the convictions of Lay, Skilling, Bernard Ebbers, Dennis Kozlowski, the Rigases and the Arthur Andersen accounting firm amount to nothing more than old-fashioned hangings in the public square. They are the way by which a capitalist society gets its most powerful economic actors to abide by the rules that make free markets work. They are less about justice than they are about sustaining a system that fundamentally rests on a foundation of trust. And as we've seen time and again -- during the junk-bond scandal, the savings and loan debacle, the Asian financial crisis and the bursting of the Internet bubble -- when that trust evaporates, entire businesses and markets can quickly collapse.

The defense of selective prosecution, like Churchill's famous defense of democracy, is that the alternatives are even worse.

Relying simply on civil prosecution -- the approach favored by much of the business community -- would provide only a modest deterrent. After all, the hundreds of millions of dollars in fines extracted from Fannie Mae or the old Computer Associates, for example, is merely money out of the pockets of the shareholders who were the biggest victims. And in those cases in which corporate executives are forced to disgorge all their ill-gotten gains, the unspoken message is that the worst that can happen if you get caught stealing cookies from the jar is that you only have to put back what took.

On the other hand, it's simply not possible to prosecute every company and every executive during those frothy periods when corporate misbehavior becomes commonplace. It took dozens of lawyers and FBI agents more than four years to investigate and prosecute the fraudsters at just one company, Enron. And there aren't enough jail cells in all of Christendom to hold all the corporate executives who engaged in "earnings management" during the late 1990s.

So, we are left with the imperfect justice of selective prosecution. That was certainly the case in the 1980s, when Michael Milken, Ivan Boesky, Dennis Levine and Drexel Burnham Lambert had to pay for the sins of legions of junk-bond traders and corporate raiders. That was followed by the S&L crisis, when Charles Keating took the criminal heat for countless executives and directors before his conviction was overturned on appeal.

And, by and large, it worked. After a rocky start, junk bonds are now a staple of corporate finance and a part of many diversified investment portfolios. And despite a prolonged period of loose money and surging real estate prices, there have been almost no failures of banks or thrifts. And even while debate continues on the wisdom and fairness of the criminal prosecution of Arthur Andersen, I think you'd have a hard time today finding a partner at one of the remaining big accounting firms who would risk turning a blind eye to a suspicious off-balance-sheet transaction.

There is, however, one set of professionals up to their knickers in corporate misdeeds who have not only escaped responsibility, but may have actually profited from the prosecution of others. I refer, of course, to the lawyers.

By hiding behind attorney-client privilege and insisting that they are subject only to discipline by captive and incompetent state regulators, few lawyers, if any, have been held to account for their prominent role in blessing and hiding corporate fraud. Four years ago, the American Bar Association asked that lawyers be allowed to police themselves. Now that self-regulation has failed so miserably, the lawyers who run the Securities and Exchange Commission need to set aside their professional loyalties and bar a few $750-an-hour attorneys from providing any more advice and services to publicly held companies.

Masters Of The Universe, Unite! (NYT)

By James P. Othmer

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, we have a verdict. And, if you care about the very future of American business, we also have a bit of a problem.

Because this is about much more than the fate of Kenny Boy Lay and Jeff Skilling. This is about us. The Masters of the Universe. The all-knowing, type-A power mongers in crimson suspenders with bottomless expense accounts. This is about the fate of the prickly, unapologetic, rule-averse tough guys like you and me who run this country, not because we're particularly talented or charming, but because we have the gift of arrogance. And, until noon Eastern Standard Time yesterday, we were able to wield it like a sword, a pink slip or a box full of Internet stock options, circa 1997.

But now the arrogance card — our arrogance card — is being threatened by so-called rules and accountability and an eight-woman, four-man jury's interpretation of the truth. Some might say this is not a good day for those of us with the corporate jets, the wardrobe and decorating allowance, the "other" set of books. Some might say this is not a good day for creative accountants, for selling stock while telling your shareholders it's a bargain, and for everyone with the good old American audacity to ignore their lawyers' advice to take the Fifth.

DOJ_NMG_0029673

Indeed, some might even say this is not a good day for those entertaining clients with the corporate card in the V.I.P. room, or for the strippers whose livelihoods depend on them.

But not me. No sir. Are we to give up the very arrogance that got us here just because a few insanely rich, pathologically correct men have fallen? Some might say our friends at Enron fell because they had it coming. But the truly arrogant, we know better. We say it would never happen to us, because we'd never have gotten caught. And if by some fluke we did, we would have handled it differently.

So, on this somewhat troubling day, I implore you, fellow universe shapers, do not squander your audacity, your pomposity, your God-given right to make bear-hug deals. I urge you to hold fast to your smug demeanor, your all-knowing smirk. Hold fast to your arrogance, or before you know it we'll be outsourcing that to Bangalore, too.

Shed no tears this morning for Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. Keep your chin up — way up — and as an affirmation of our way, do something to make the most out of our special gift. Rather than giving in and playing along with someone's idea of a code of ethics, may I suggest telling your secretary that you've got to go out for "a very important meeting" and getting an early start on this long weekend, on the company. Maybe go antiquing for "office furniture." Or charge a big old lunch with a fictional client. Or head over to the V.I.P. room of the nearest upscale gentleman's sports cabaret and run a tab on the corporate plastic. Do it for capitalism. Do it for America. Do it for Kenny Boy.

James P. Othmer is the author of the forthcoming novel "The Futurist."

Editorial: Enron Fraud: Guilty As Charged (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, May 26, 2006

Guilty, guilty, guilty. Ken Lay, Jeffrey Skilling and the political-economic scam of deregulation all received proper verdicts Thursday.

The convictions of former Enron execs Lay and Skilling provide some justice for Washingtonians bilked by the Western energy crisis. Even within perhaps the worst-led Justice Department in U.S. history, enough capable, dedicated, honest prosecutors remain to win difficult convictions. Jurors saw through the defense's attempts at explanations, evasions and excuses.

A judge set a Sept. 11 sentencing date for Lay and Skilling. They deserve something on the order of the 25-year term awaiting former WorldCom head Bernard Ebbers for another financial fraud.

While their prison terms will be a measure of justice, the public will never receive anything close to adequate recompense for tens of billions lost in the energy crisis of 2000-01. Manipulation by energy trading companies, withholding of supplies by energy producers and California's failed deregulation plan all contributed heavily to the enormous run-up in prices. What was once explained as a "perfect storm" of events now looks more like a series of political sellouts, misjudgments and not-so-perfect crimes.

The Enron convictions should provide a lifetime worth of lessons for corporations, aspiring executives and business schools. Investors also ought to be more cautious about investing in clever trading schemes rather than services. Just don't count on it.

The 1990s' boom brought a renewal of a longstanding U.S. tendency for politicians to let down their guard about corporate influence. Some of the blame goes to Clinton Democrats who curried corporate favor by going along with right-wing dogma of deregulation.

But the larger and continuing scandal belongs to Republicans and the Bush administration, which still runs an Enron-approved energy program. President Bush took Lay's word on whom to appoint as his first head of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Vice President Dick Cheney has covered up the details of how he let Enron, oil companies and other big contributors design Bush's energy policy.

DOJ_NMG_0029674

Since the energy crisis, U.S. Sen. Maria Cantwell, Rep. Jay Inslee and other leaders from this state have fought to restore fairness to utility regulation nationally. The verdicts in Texas show the rightness of their cause, even if a political victory for consumer justice remains unlikely with today's Congress and administration.

Fannie Mae Board Reverses; CEO Mudd Won't Head Probe (DOW)

Dow Jones, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Reversing course Thursday, Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen B. Ashley said chief executive officer Daniel H. Mudd won't lead the company's investigation into who should be fired or punished because of the housing giant's $10.6 billion accounting scandal.

Instead, Ashley said that four independent board members who have joined Fannie Mae (FNM) in the last 18 months would spearhead the probe.

"The board and myself have developed our thinking further for how a review of the personnel mentioned in the OFHEO report would be handled," Ashley said in an interview.

Ashley said the board decided to change its plans on Wednesday, one day after he said on an analyst call that Mudd would lead the review.

He said the decision was "internal" and didn't come from pressure by regulators or lawmakers.

The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight and the Securities and Exchange Commission fined Fannie Mae (FNM) $400 million Tuesday for "deliberately and systematically" creating earnings "illusions" to hit targets from 1998 through 2004.

Reaching these targets triggered millions of dollars in bonuses for senior Fannie Mae (FNM) executives.

Mudd, who was chief operating officer at the time, received $14.5 million in bonuses and rewards tied to Fannie Mae's (FNM) ability to hit the earnings targets.

Ashley said the board's decision to retain Mudd does not exempt him from a review of the bonuses he earned and possible disgorgement.

"Yes, he'll be treated like everyone else," Ashley said.

Coinciding with the fine, the mortgage giant's board vowed to review all the current employees and directors mentioned in a 340-page report issued by OFHEO.

When Ashley originally said Mudd would lead the review, it sparked allegations that his oversight would be tainted because of his senior role when the reported accounting manipulation occurred.

"It's hard to imagine that someone who was working at a senior level - during the time that many of these unethical practices took place - can really lend an unbiased eye to the situation," Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H., said in an interview Thursday.

Mudd's name appeared in the report nearly 90 times, more frequently than any other executive still with the company.

The board's probe will now be led by directors Dennis Beresford, former head of the Financial Accounting Standards Board, Greg C. Smith, vice chairman of Ford Motor Co., Bridget A. Macaskill, principal of BAM Consulting LLC, and John K. Wulff, chairman of Hercules Inc.

All have joined Fannie Mae (FNM) since December 2004.

Ashley would not comment on whether the report should lead to anyone being forced from the company.

"I'm not going to comment on that at all," he said. "That would front-run the work of the committee."

He said, though, that the board was not going to rethink its Tuesday decision to retain Mudd as chief executive officer. After Ashley offered his unwavering support for Mudd during the analyst call, Robert J. Lacoursiere, an equity research principal at Banc of America Securities, said it seemed premature.

"It has the appearance of a summary dismissal of OFHEO's concerns," he said in an interview. "We think this is more reminiscent of the old, kind of arrogant Fannie Mae (FNM), as opposed to the new, humbler Fannie Mae (FNM)."

Armando Falcon, the former director of OFHEO who started the Fannie Mae (FNM)investigation, agreed.

"The board's quick absolvement of Dan Mudd doesn't seem in the spirit of the agreement," he said.

Ashley conceded the process was expedited but said it was measured.

DOJ_NMG_0029675

He said board members met Monday, one day before the report was released, and reviewed the findings, specifically focusing on Mudd's role during the accounting scandal. Each report had red stickers that marked the pages where Mudd's name was mentioned.

The report does not appear to implicate Mudd as being directly involved in the accounting manipulation, but it does fault several of the decisions he made as one of the company's top executives.

For example, the report said Mudd and another Fannie executive launched a " flawed investigation" into an employee's concerns about bad accounting.

In that case, the report said "Mr. Mudd did not comply with Fannie Mae's (FNM) Code of Business Conduct" in the way he handled the situation.

Referencing the anecdote at a press conference Tuesday, OFHEO acting director James B. Lockhart said this was something Fannie Mae's (FNM) board "has to look into."

The report also cited an e-mail from Mudd describing conversations he had with an unnamed Treasury Department official "what to do if OFHEO is not falling in line."

The board also conferred Monday with former Sen. Warren Rudman, who compared the OFHEO report with a lengthy report he released three months earlier.

Rudman, who worked with a team from Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, said there was very little new material in the OFHEO report regarding Mudd that had not already been brought to the board's attention.

He acknowledged, though, that his review did not include any analysis of Fannie Mae's (FNM) lobbying efforts and that his team did not know Mudd had contacted the Treasury Department official.

"That one issue was something I learned of for the first time reading the OFHEO report," Rudman said.

Ashley said the board had already conducted extensive reviews of Mudd - even searching his home computer - when they were considering whether to install him as chief executive officer last year.

"At the conclusion of the review, I was satisfied that I could give my full confidence in Dan's leadership, and that was the consensus of the board," Ashley said.

After discussing Dan's role in the report during an hour-long executive session later Monday, the board decided Mudd would stay, Ashley said.

"Given the importance of this company in the credit market, in the housing market, and with our shareholder community - and with the employees, the 5,000 plus employees of the company, it is in my mind...very important to bring closure to the Dan leadership question and do it quickly, but appropriately," he said.

He would not say if any board members questioned Mudd's leadership or asked for more time during the closed-door meeting.

"I'm not going to go into the discussion within the board room with you," he said.

Mudd, who serves on the board in addition to being CEO, was not allowed to attend the internal discussions when his future was debated.

An OFHEO spokeswoman would not comment for this story, but during a press conference Tuesday, Lockhart said Fannie Mae's (FNM) board would have to report the findings of its review back to the agency.

"The board of directors, as part of the agreement, will be looking at present management that is also mentioned in the report," he said. "As said, if the company doesn't do it, OFHEO will do it, and I'm sure the SEC will be working on other aspects of what this previous management did."

Lockhart said Mudd was "doing a good job of trying to turn around this operation," but would not comment on Mudd's role in the accounting scandal.

The SEC and Justice Department are both looking into the roles individuals played in the accounting scandal. Tuesday's agreement only settled allegations against the company.

Under the agreement, Fannie Mae's (FNM) board has 30 days to notify OFHEO which officials are under review and then another 120 days to conduct its review.

DOJ_NMG_0029676

"Such report shall include plans to seek restitution, disgorgement or other remedies to recover funds" from individuals, said the agreement, which Mudd, Ashley and Lockhart signed.

. . . And The Beltway Version (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Some are calling yesterday's Enron verdicts the end of the corporate scandal era, but there's at least one big case still pending: Fannie Mae.

The mortgage giant's regulator issued its long-awaited, 340-page report on the company's $10.8 billion accounting woes this week, and the news is that the internal rot is even worse than we ever imagined. This is the Beltway's Enron, yet the political class still hasn't fixed the core problem, which is Fannie's political protection.

For years, Fannie's backers sneered at critics -- including such worrywarts as Alan Greenspan -- by claiming the company was so good at what it did that there was no reason to fret about its accounting, much less any "systemic risk" to the larger financial system. However, the Ofheo (Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight) report makes clear that Fannie's core expertise was manipulating its earnings and rigging the politics. The management of credit risk that was supposed to be its stock-in-trade was way down the list.

This should worry us all, especially taxpayers who will be on the hook if Fannie or its sibling Freddie Mac get into trouble. For years Fannie boasted of steady profits and consistent growth. But the report makes clear that Fannie Mae's officers made those numbers up in order to pad their own compensation.

This is not merely an "accounting problem," as some of Fannie's friends would have it. The earnings manipulation became necessary because the underlying business was not making its targets. What's more, Fannie underinvested in the systems and technology that any company concerned about staying on top of the largest privately issued pool of debt in the country would want to have.

The company also tied the compensation of its internal auditors to the same earnings per share targets that determined executive bonuses -- which is the definition of a conflict of interest. And people like then-COO (and current CEO) Daniel Mudd failed to react to questions raised inside the company about its accounting practices. In one revealing internal memo after everything began to unravel, Mr. Mudd acknowledged that the "political reality was that we always won, we took no prisoners, and we faced little organized political opposition."

Fannie Mae also took steps to ensure that a nominally independent board of directors was nothing of the sort. Frederick Malek, a supposedly independent director between 2002 and 2004, was a business partner with then-CEO Franklin Raines. Kenneth Duberstein, White House chief of staff at the end of the Reagan administration, was both a board member and a paid lobbyist for the company.

Over the years covered by the report, Fannie's board and executive ranks featured some of the most prominent names in Democratic Party politics, as well as a few big-name Republicans. Jamie Gorelick, most recently of 9/11 Commission conflict-of-interest fame, was made Vice Chairman of the Board the same year she left the Clinton Justice Department. James Johnson, who was Fannie's CEO through much of the 1990s, had been a close adviser to former Vice President Walter Mondale and was also an adviser to Presidential candidate John Kerry in 2004. On the other side of the aisle, Board member Anne McLaughlin Korologos was a Reagan-era Labor Secretary.

What these men and women all have in common is that their main expertise wasn't financial but political. They had the experience and contacts to maintain the taxpayer subsidy and weak regulation that fueled Fannie's growth and made its executives super-rich.

Looking ahead, Ofheo calls on the board to claw back the tens of millions in bonuses that executives like Mr. Raines reaped through earnings management. But on the evidence of manipulation in the report, that will be the least of it. The Justice Department is continuing to investigate, and criminal charges shouldn't be ruled out.

Ofheo also called for all current employees named in the report to be investigated by the company. But Chairman of the Board Stephen Ashley quickly expressed his confidence in CEO Mudd, despite Mr. Mudd's repeated and unflattering appearances in the report. It's hard for us to see how Mr. Mudd can be a credible reformer. Ofheo has also done the right thing in demanding that Fannie freeze the growth of its portfolio of mortgage-backed securities, which have been the main source of both its growth and, we now know, its accounting woes (because it hedges the risks of those MBSs with derivatives it had no clue how to account for).

DOJ_NMG_0029677

The larger story here is that Fannie Mae is less a corporate outrage than a political one. It is the tale of a company that has grown rich off an implicit taxpayer subsidy and then plowed those profits back into buying political protection in Congress and feckless regulation from the executive. Ofheo only rose to the occasion thanks to the prodding of a few souls in Congress and the press, and only after Freddie Mac's own accounting blew up. Even now, a bipartisan coalition in the House and Senate is protecting the companies from genuine supervision. That's the real scandal.

House Committee Holds Heated Session On Corporate Execs' Pay Packages (LAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, The Associated Press

AP, May 26, 2006

Lawmakers on Thursday addressed an issue that rankles company shareholders and the public -- executive pay packages and perks -- at a time when revelations of excess surface almost daily.

A senior Democrat, Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, wants Congress to give shareholders a greater say over executive compensation.

"There have clearly been abuses," Frank said at the start of a hearing by the House Financial Services Committee. The session became an impassioned debate between Democrats and Republicans over the morality of lavish compensation, an argument portrayed by panel members as a clash between faith in capitalism and advocacy of socialism.

Frank had earlier used a parliamentary rule to force the majority Republican leaders of the committee to convene the hearing.

The partisan rhetoric flew, as befits an election year. Countering Frank's legislative proposal, Republicans disclosed that they have a bill of their own in the works: one that would rein in trial lawyers, a group that is a perennial ally of Democrats and generous contributor to their campaigns.

Don't blame the corporate executives, said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. By targeting companies in lawsuits, "Trial lawyers are the ones who are sopping up investor wealth in this country."

Business interests reject Frank's proposal for shareholder input.

"If we adopted a system where small groups of activist shareholders used the process to politicize corporate decision-making, the consequences could very well be destabilizing" for companies, testified Thomas Lehner, director of public policy for the Business Roundtable, a group representing CEOs of major companies. "... We should not ruin our free-market system because of a few rogues. We strongly believe that the current system has worked well and should not be changed."

Lehner's view was echoed by several Republican members of the committee.

The subject clearly hits a nerve with Americans, who hear reports almost daily of excessive pay and perks for executives while their companies stumble, lay off employees or renege on billions of dollars in pension obligations for workers' retirement. The chasm between executives' salaries and the pay of rank-and-file employees continues to widen.

"Marie Antoinette would be embarrassed," Nell Minow, who heads the Corporate Library, a business governance group, told the hearing.

It was held the same day that a federal jury in Houston convicted former Enron Corp. chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling of conspiracy and securities fraud in one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history, involving a company that became a notorious symbol of corporate greed.

Meanwhile, the number of public companies ensnared in a federal investigation into the timing of stock option grants to their executives continues to grow. More than a dozen companies -- from high-flying technology names to a pharmacy benefits manager -- have received inquiries from federal prosecutors in New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission seeking details on how they grant stock options.

DOJ_NMG_0029678

The companies -- the biggest so far is UnitedHealth Group Inc. -- are being examined to determine whether they boosted executives' payoff from stock options by backdating the grants to coincide with a point where corresponding stock prices had dropped to lows.

But the lawmakers reserved their greatest scorn for Lee Raymond, the recently retired chairman of Exxon Mobil Corp., who received a package of nearly $400 million, including salary, bonus, stock options and a one-year $1 million consulting deal.

"We've got a problem here," said Rep. David Scott, D-Ga., noting that Raymond's compensation works out to more than $144,000 a day while angry consumers pay over $3 a gallon for gasoline and are outraged by his pay package.

"It is important for the sanctity of the markets" for companies to disclose executives' pay, Scott said.

The SEC proposed in January the biggest changes since 1992 in rules governing disclosure of executive compensation. The rule changes would require companies to disclose far more details about their executives' pay packages and perks.

"I have a feeling that when people are forced to undress in public, they'll pay more attention to their figures," SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said recently.

But Frank insists that the SEC plan doesn't go far enough. His proposed legislation would call for disclosure of more information on executive pay packages. It would also require shareholder approval of executive compensation plans.

The bill's legislative prospects, however, are in doubt because it has drawn most of its support from minority Democrats.

On Thursday, Home Depot Inc.'s chief executive, Bob Nardelli, did little to quell an uproar among some shareholders over his pay, stifling debate at the company's annual meeting as the board members who approved the compensation didn't show up to defend themselves. Nardelli has received $123.7 million in compensation, excluding stock option grants, since taking over as CEO in December 2000. The company's stock price has dropped 9 percent over that period on a split-adjusted basis.

Former Wal-Mart Exec Faces Fraud Sentence Aug. 11 (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcus Kabel, Ap Business Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

(AP) - SPRINGFIELD, Missouri-A federal judge has set a sentencing hearing Aug. 11 for Thomas Coughlin, the former No. 2 executive at Wal-Mart Stores Inc., who pleaded guilty in January to fraud and tax charges for stealing money, gift cards and merchandise from the world's largest retailer.

Coughlin, 57, faces a maximum of 28 years in prison after pleading guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of filing a false tax return. He also could be fined $1.35 million (â,¬1 million).

U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson, who accepted Coughlin's guilty plea in January, set the sentencing hearing for Aug. 11 in his courtroom in Fort Smith, Arkansas.

Prosecutors have recommended a sentence but Dawson sealed the plea agreement pending a presentencing report.

Wal-Mart referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin allegedly had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary cocktail mix. Wal-Mart estimated losses at up to $500,000. (â,¬392,000).

Wal-Mart Chief Executive Lee Scott has called the ordeal "an embarrassment" for himself and for the company.

Coughlin was a protege of company founder Sam Walton. As vice chairman, he received a base salary of $1.03 million (â,¬807,500) in his final year with the company. He received more than $3 million (â,¬2.35 million) in bonuses and other income in the same period and held about $20 million (â,¬15.7 million) in Wal-Mart stock, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings.

In documents filed with the court, Coughlin specifically admitted defrauding the company to pay for the care of his hunting dogs, lease a private hunting area, upgrade his pickup truck, buy liquor and a cooler, and receive $3,100 (â,¬2,430) in cash.

Coughlin retired as Wal-Mart vice chairman last year and gave up his spot on the company board in March after Wal-Mart referred him to prosecutors. The matter was taken up by a grand jury in Fort Smith.

In November, former Coughlin subordinate Robert E. Hey Jr. agreed to plead guilty to wire fraud and testify for the government in return for parole instead of prison time.

DOJ_NMG_0029679

Besides giving the case to federal prosecutors, Bentonville, Arkansas-based Wal-Mart filed suit last year to end Coughlin's multimillion-dollar retirement agreement and to recover money.

However, that lawsuit was dismissed by an Arkansas judge who said both sides had signed a pledge as part of Coughlin's retirement deal not to pursue any claims against each other for any reasons. Wal-Mart has appealed the dismissal of its lawsuit to the Arkansas Supreme Court.

No mention was made in Coughlin's public filings with the court of his earlier claim that he used money obtained from Wal-Mart to pay for anti-union activism. Wal-Mart has said there was no such project.

$363M Is Average Pay For Top Hedge Fund Managers (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, May 26, 2006

NEW YORK — James Simons, a mathematician turned money manager who prefers hiring Ph.D.s over MBAs, inched out oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens Jr. as the world's best-paid hedge fund manager in 2005, collecting an estimated $1.5 billion, according to rankings released today by Institutional Investor's Alpha magazine.

In rising to the top of what amounts to a who's who list of the secretive hedge fund world, Simons, of Renaissance Technologies, unseated 2004's top earner and first-ever billion-dollar man, Edward Lampert of ESL Investments, who is best known for buying Kmart and masterminding the blockbuster deal to buy Sears. Lampert's earnings dipped to an estimated $425 million last year, down from $1.0 billion in 2004.

“These are staggering numbers,” said Alpha editor Michael Peltz in announcing its fifth-annual list of Top 25 earners. “It took $130 million to make the list.”

Pickens also topped $1 billion, earning an estimated $1.4 billion. The average pay of the 26 (there was a tie for 25th place) on the list was $363 million, up 45% from $251 million in 2004.

Other big-name managers with big-time reputations in the top 10 included: financier George Soros, who was named “the man who broke the Bank of England” in 1992 after a winning bet against the British pound netted him more than $1 billion; Steven Cohen of SAC Capital Advisors, whom BusinessWeek called “the most powerful trader on Wall Street you've never heard of” in a July 2003 cover story; and legendary trader Paul Tudor Jones II. “These top earners are the best of the best, the real superstars,” says Ryan Pearson, senior vice president at hedge fund consultancy Greenwich-Van Advisors.

The surge in pay comes amid an explosive growth in the industry, which now has roughly 8,000 funds and $1.2 trillion in assets. A lucrative business model for hedge fund managers, which, on average, entitles them to 2% of assets under management and 20% of the profit, makes these large paydays possible, Peltz says. A $10 billion fund would earn $200 million from the 2% management fee alone. Super-successful managers charge even more. Simons, the No. 1 earner last year, charges a 5% management fee and 44% of profits, Alpha's Peltz says.

Simons, whose firm, Peltz quips, has enough “rocket scientists to run their own space program,” makes its money trading “often and frequently” with the help of computers, trying to capture small price movements. Pickens profited from the boom in energy prices.

The managers didn't just line their own pockets. “I suspect they have made more money for their clients than themselves,” says Charles Davidson, hedge fund director at Standard & Poor's.

Charity Invites Donors To 'Kick The Tires' And Squeeze The Cash Register (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. — As slides with bullet points and pie charts flashed behind his head, Thomas Tighe meticulously laid out the financial affairs of the charity he runs, Direct Relief International.

"We are a public corporation," Mr. Tighe told the audience of more than 200 donors. "No one has a stronger interest in our doing good than you, because you've invested in it."

DOJ_NMG_0029680

For the last four years, Direct Relief, which provides donated medicine and medical supplies to communities around the world, has held a "shareholders' meeting" for contributors to demonstrate its accountability and to burnish its relationship with its donors.

One donor, Jude Blau, says he likes the meeting because it is informative and different from the typical interaction he and his wife, Mary Jane, have with other charities.

"The trouble is that a lot of them are locked into these very expensive fund-raisers and benefits and so forth," Mr. Blau said. "Direct Relief does something different, and I think organizations that do well and have innovative thinking like this are great. It's better than sending out address labels."

H. Art Taylor, president and chief executive of BBB Wise Giving Alliance, a watchdog group, said if more charities adopted this approach, "there would be a lot less questions about what nonprofits are doing with their resources and a lot less skepticism about the sector in general."

Last year, Direct Relief received $15.7 million in cash, stock and investment income and $121.5 million in donated supplies. "For every $1 we spent," Mr. Tighe said, "$25.50 in aid went out the door."

The charity began holding the shareholders' meetings to expand its appeal to donors locally and beyond. They were the brainchild of Barry Kravitz, a money manager who was then on the board.

"I told them it was really important for people to be able to come here and kick the tires," Mr. Kravitz said. "What you're doing as contributors, you really are investing in this company, and so you're interested in what your investment is doing."

Direct Relief invites representatives of the organizations it has supported to attend the meetings and explain how the charity has assisted them, as well as to offer primers on the challenges they face in providing health services in impoverished and conflict-ravaged countries.

Dr. Jerome Sulubani, a pediatrician at the Mansa General Hospital in Zambia, told donors how a premature baby who weighed roughly one pound at birth had survived as a result of an incubator donated by Direct Relief, the first his hospital had. "Today, that girl is in primary school," Dr. Sulubani said.

Direct Relief works with pharmaceutical companies and medical equipment manufacturers to get products needed by medical professionals like Dr. Sulubani who lack the basic tools to do their jobs.

"We're kind of a Costco for poor countries' health services," said Mr. Tighe (pronounced TYG, as in tiger).

The money it receives, from $3 million to $4.5 million in an average year, is used for overhead costs and to transport supplies. Donors like the idea that their money helps more than $100 million of donated goods get to needy people. "It's a huge selling point, that the money is so well used," said Kate Firestone, a donor and board member.

Ms. Firestone was among the board members who elected to cover many of the costs Direct Relief incurred in responding to the tsunami that struck the Indian Ocean rim at the end of 2004.

Donors provided $14 million for the tsunami victims — roughly three times what the charity raises in a normal year. The board decided that every penny should go into the relief effort, in part because that was what donors expected and in part to build long-lasting relationships.

The board covered the costs of bank charges, credit card fees, processing receipts for donors, additional accounting and other expenses related to managing the tsunami-related gifts. Direct Relief did not pay any part of its staff salaries from them.

"This was cash in excess of what we traditionally get, so we had to think through what we should morally, ethically and responsibly do with it," Mr. Tighe said. "As one board member said at the time, 'This is not our money.' "

At the shareholders' meeting, Mr. Tighe reported that about 9 percent of the donors who gave to Direct Relief for the first time after the tsunami later gave it money or in-kind donations for its routine operations.

"For probably most of our history, we were primarily supported by people living in Santa Barbara," said Mr. Tighe, who joined Direct Relief in 2000 from the Peace Corps, where he was chief of staff and chief operating officer. "We had never had an ability to get in touch with folks outside our very local area."

That all changed before the tsunami, when Google gave the charity one of its coveted Google Grants, essentially free advertising on the search engine's Web site. Mr. Tighe said the organization's national reach, while still small, has increased ever since.

DOJ_NMG_0029681

It received $4.73 million designated for victims of Hurricane Katrina, even though it is mainly known as an international relief organization, and it used the money to get medicine and medical supplies to doctors on the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The tsunami and Hurricane Katrina put the charity in the business of providing grants to local organizations. In Sri Lanka, such money bought five ambulances for a local charity and trained 16 emergency medical technicians and 20 first aid responders to operate them.

In Mississippi, it bought coats.

"I knew Direct Relief dealt with medicines and physicians, but I called Chris anyway," recalled Rhonda McNair, executive director of the Reuben T. Morris Wellness Foundation, referring to Chris Brady, Direct Relief's vice president for programs. Direct Relief gave the Wellness Foundation $82,061, about $500 of which was used to buy coats.

"Today is when we get the connection between our money and what happens to it," said Nancy Walker-Koppelman, a donor. "I had no idea that we gave money to buy coats."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Orders FBI-Congress Documents Sealed (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, May 25, 2006

President Bush stepped into a confrontation between the Justice Department and Congress on Thursday, ordering that documents seized in an FBI raid on a lawmaker's office be sealed for 45 days.

His spokesman also labeled as "false, false, false" charges that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' department had tried to intimidate Republican House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

In an effort to defuse an intensifying, election-year dispute between the Republican-led Congress and his administration, Bush, facing growing complaints from lawmakers in both parties that he has abused presidential powers, called for a cooling-off period.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," he said in a statement. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

Republican officials who spoke on condition of anonymity said Vice President Dick Cheney had become involved as the administration worked to ease the anger of the speaker, who has enormous control over the president's legislative agenda.

Bush granted one of Hastert's demands, directing the FBI to surrender documents and computerized records taken last weekend from the office of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La. He ordered Solicitor General Paul Clement, who has a separate office in the Justice Department, to take custody of them.

The president said no one is above the law and that he continued to support the investigation of Jefferson. The eight-term congressman is accused of accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars to facilitate a telephone investment deal in Africa.

"Those who violate the law — including a member of Congress — should and will be held to account," the president said. "This investigation will go forward and justice will be served."

Within minutes, the heads of the battling institutions stood down and began talking about solutions.

Hastert said the order would "give us some time to step back and try to negotiate with the Department of Justice."

Gonzales said the move provides "time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

The FBI said it would comply with Bush's order.

Jefferson called the order "a good first step but ultimately, the answer would be to return the documents."

The time-out came five days after the FBI, acting on a search warrant signed a week ago by a federal judge, raided Jefferson's office as part of the bribery investigation.

In an affidavit supporting the search warrant, the FBI said it had videotaped Jefferson last summer taking $100,000 in bribe money and that agents had found $90,000 of that cash stuffed in a freezer in his home.

DOJ_NMG_0029682

Two people have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson to promote the high-tech business venture in Africa. One of them, Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to the congressman, was scheduled to be sentenced Friday in Alexandria, Va. Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

Historians said the raid was the first such search of a House or Senate member's office since the first Congress convened 219 years ago.

Its unprecedented nature and the lack of notice given Hastert set off loud complaints from both Republicans and Democrats that the administration was overstepping its authority.

More than a dozen agents who convened on Jefferson's office Saturday night conducted a search that stretched into Sunday morning. They took two boxes of paper records and made a copy of everything on Jefferson's personal computer, Robert Trout, Jefferson's lawyer, said in his legal filing Wednesday demanding the return of the materials.

The only items specifically identified by Trout as having been taken by the FBI are letters requesting donations to the legal defense fund Jefferson created to defray his legal bills.

The FBI and prosecutors refused to allow lawyers for Jefferson or the House of Representatives to be present for the search, Trout and House officials said.

Administration officials have said the White House did not know in advance of the raid. That suggested the ultimate authority for the event rested with Gonzales.

The dispute escalated all week. Hastert complained personally to Bush at least twice. He was joined Wednesday in rare agreement by his Democratic counterpart, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record) of California, in a statement demanding the FBI give back the material it seized.

On Thursday, Hastert accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him after ABC News quoted unnamed top law enforcement officials as saying Wednesday the speaker was being investigated in a broad influence-peddling probe centered on convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Justice Department issued two denials of the report. Hastert demanded a retraction from the network, which refused. Hastert's lawyers threatened Thursday to sue the network. ABC again stood by its story.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people," Hastert said on Chicago's WGN radio.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called the accusation "false, false, false."

"They're not leaking information to try to undermine the House speaker," Snow said. "I got pretty categorical denials."

Bush Puts Jefferson Documents On Ice Amid Heated Debate (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush intervened Thursday to defuse a dispute between congressional leaders and the Justice Department, ordering that documents seized in an unprecedented raid on a congressman's office be sealed for 45 days.

Congressional leaders, displaying rare bipartisan unity, accused the Justice Department of overstepping its authority and demanded the return of the material confiscated in a weekend search of the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., who is under investigation for bribery.

"This period will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government," Bush said in a statement. "The Justice Department and the House of Representatives should continue their discussions and resolve this matter as quickly as possible."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., accepted the olive branch from the White House but said he stood by his position that the search warrant served on Jefferson was a violation of the "separation of powers" between Congress and the executive branch.

"This gives everybody a chance to step back," Hastert said after meeting with fellow Republicans, whose cheers at the announcement were audible outside their meeting room in the basement of the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0029683

Hastert insisted he was defending the Constitution. "I taught it for 16 years," Hastert said. "We need to protect our Constitution. It's important that the people's records are protected."

The dispute began Saturday, when FBI agents served a search warrant on Jefferson's office and barred congressional officers -- including the House sergeant of arms and the Capitol Police -- from the site.

It is believed to be the only time in U.S. history that the executive branch has served a search warrant on a congressional office.

The Justice Department said the move was necessary after Jefferson had resisted a subpoena. Investigators already searched his home, where they retrieved $90,000 in marked bills wrapped in foil in his freezer. Earlier, he was videotaped accepting money from a Virginia businesswoman.

Congressional leaders argue that the Constitution protects lawmakers from such searches. They have offered to develop procedures for making available materials connected to a criminal investigation.

"Members were relieved to see the White House response," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo. "They believe it gives us a chance to find the proper way to view this material."

Earlier in the day Thursday, Hastert used a radio interview to accuse officials in the Justice Department of seeking to intimidate him by leaking a false story to ABC News. The network reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating Hastert in connection with the influence-peddling investigation surrounding fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiring to bribe members of Congress and steal millions from American Indian tribes he represented. Abramoff is cooperating with federal investigators.

After the ABC News report, the Justice Department twice denied Hastert was under investigation. Hastert said the report was false, and his lawyers have demanded a retraction and threatened legal action.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to ... intimidate people, and we're just not going to be intimidated," Hastert told Chicago radio station WGN.

ABC News reported that investigators were examining a letter Hastert and others wrote in 2003 to the secretary of the Interior to block a casino on an Indian reservation that would have competed with tribes then represented by Abramoff. The letter was written shortly after a fundraiser for Hastert at a Washington restaurant Abramoff owned at the time.

An ABC News executive said the report was careful to avoid saying Hastert was a "target" or "subject" of the investigation. "We said he was 'in the mix' and that Abramoff had said things to federal investigators which have led them to look at a number of congressmen, including the speaker," said Jeffrey Schneider, an ABC News spokesman.

The Justice Department did not comment on Hastert's claim that the leak was an act of retribution.

White House officials would not say whether Bush had spoken personally to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the Jefferson raid, but they said there had been "ongoing discussions" since the raid with officials from Justice and the House.

Bush ordered that the Office of the Solicitor General be responsible for ensuring that the documents remain under seal for 45 days. That office is an arm of the Justice Department that represents the government before the Supreme Court.

Gonzales, who approved the search of Jefferson's office, issued a statement saying he was satisfied with the president's decision.

"Throughout this discussion period with the Congress over the court-authorized search of Congressman Jefferson's office, the Justice Department has sought to protect the integrity of this important ongoing public corruption investigation," Gonzales said. "The president's order does that and provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

A government official, who requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said Justice Department negotiators were adamant that the department not relinquish the seized materials, because it could compromise the investigation. The official said some senior department officials had been prepared to submit their resignations if Bush had ordered them returned.

Press Secretary Tony Snow has said the White House did not know about the search in advance. Thursday, he said the White House counsel's office first learned of the raid from an e-mail sent while agents were in Jefferson's office, stating simply that a search warrant was being executed.

DOJ_NMG_0029684

Snow said Bush had decided to order the 45-day seal so the House and the Justice Department could "shift the focus from who gets the records right now to the more constructive task of working together to resolve the constitutional concerns of both sides."

"It became pretty obvious that this was a very complex issue, and it was necessary to give cooler heads time to prevail on it," Snow said. "We're getting into uncharted constitutional waters, and I think both sides want to reserve the integrity of their institutions."

Harvard Law Professor Charles Fried, solicitor general under the Reagan administration, said that he considered the House's legal arguments shaky -- but that Bush's actions were reasonable.

"It is something new, but in principle it strikes me as probably OK," Fried said. "No evidence is lost. (Jefferson) has no chance to flush any papers down the toilet. So it's all on ice, and people can figure it out."

Jefferson is accused of accepting cash in return for helping a Virginia businesswoman obtain contracts to provide mobile-phone and Internet services in the African countries of Ghana and Nigeria. Two Jefferson associates are cooperating with investigators, as is the businesswoman.

Members of Congress and their staff have expressed concern privately that the Justice Department was less interested in prosecuting Jefferson than in establishing a legal precedent that could be used in other investigations -- specifically the widening ethics investigation around lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Justice Department officials will not know until at least August about their legal rights to investigate lawmakers' offices.

Bush Seals Files Seized In FBI Probe Of Jefferson (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

President Bush ordered the Justice Department yesterday to seal records seized from the Capitol Hill office of a Democratic congressman, representing a remarkable intervention by the nation's chief executive into an ongoing criminal probe of alleged corruption.

The order was aimed at quelling an escalating constitutional confrontation between the Justice Department and the House, where Republican and Democratic leaders have demanded that the FBI return documents and copies of computer files seized from the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

In a six-paragraph statement, Bush cast the dispute in historic terms and said he issued the order to give Justice Department officials and lawmakers more time to negotiate a compromise. "Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," Bush said. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

The order capped five days of tumultuous negotiations involving the White House, the Justice Department and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who denounced the Saturday-night raid as an infringement on the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches and had joined Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) in demanding that the seized documents be returned.

Bush hoped to mollify Hastert, one of his most reliable legislative allies, at a time of increasingly sour relations with the GOP-controlled Congress, according to White House sources. Tempers rose so high this week that some House Republicans threatened to seek the resignation of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, although GOP leaders said the idea was not seriously considered.

The agreement also marked a setback for the FBI and Justice Department, which had refused demands to return the materials -- and had resisted pressure from the White House to cordon them off, according to several officials familiar with the debate.

Bush signaled in his statement, however, that he expected the documents to eventually be made available to prosecutors. "Those who violate the law -- including a Member of Congress -- should and will be held to account," Bush said. "This investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

The materials will be held by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who is not involved in the Jefferson probe, Bush's statement said.

Emerging from a House Republican meeting about the raid yesterday afternoon, Hastert said he welcomed Bush's 45-day hiatus as a cooling-off period that "gives everybody a chance to step back. I appreciate that."

In effect, Bush's order serves to grant a portion of a legal motion filed on Thursday by Jefferson, which asked that the materials seized by the FBI be locked in a secure place "to allow for full briefing and careful consideration by the court of the serious Constitutional issues and the unprecedented circumstances that give rise to this motion."

Robert P. Trout, Jefferson's attorney, called Bush's decision "a good start."

"It's not every day a lawyer has his motion granted by the president of the United States," Trout said. "We're obviously pleased with this decision."

Another potential entanglement with the FBI arose yesterday when the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported that federal agents are seeking to interview top House members from both parties as part of an investigation into leaks about the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program to the New York Times.

Jamal D. Ware, spokesman for the chairman of the House intelligence committee, Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), said the effort at the moment is to determine ground rules for the interviews, "to ensure that all constitutional issues are worked out beforehand so a thorough inquiry can move forward."

In the Jefferson case, the FBI has been investigating allegations that the New Orleans Democrat took hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes in exchange for using his congressional influence to promote business ventures in Africa. Two people -- Brett Pfeffer and Vernon L. Jackson -- have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson to promote iGate Inc., a Louisville-based company that was marketing Internet and cable television technology in Nigeria, Ghana and Cameroon.

Pfeffer, a former Jefferson legislative aide, is scheduled to be sentenced today in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

Jefferson, 59, has not been charged and has denied any wrongdoing. But an 83-page affidavit used to raid his office Saturday said agents videotaped Jefferson last summer taking $100,000 in $100 denominations in bribe money. A few days later, agents found $90,000 of the money stuffed inside a freezer in his D.C. apartment.

Bush has been under heavy pressure from Hastert since Monday, when the president and the speaker appeared together at a Chicago speech, according to accounts from senior White House officials, who requested anonymity. On the ride home aboard Air Force One, Hastert was adamant that the Justice Department had violated the Constitution, and he implored the president to intervene, the sources said.

The next day, the two spoke by phone and Hastert told Bush that he and other leaders would only intensify their campaign to stop Justice from sifting through the materials seized in the weekend search, according to the accounts.

White House officials worked late into the night Wednesday and Thursday, trying to find a middle ground. One person said efforts to get the department to strike a compromise failed.

"Obviously, emotions were running high," the official said. "There was a sense of urgency."

Bush had Vice President Cheney call Hastert to inform him of his decision. The president sees the 45-day period as sufficient to resolve the constitutional questions without disrupting the Jefferson case, according to sources.

There have also been discussions between the White House and Hastert's office about possible legislation to set parameters on handling the unique situation of prosecutors seeking congressional materials, according to administration sources.

The negotiations angered many federal prosecutors and FBI agents, who believed that the search warrant for Jefferson's office, which was signed by Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, was lawful and necessary because of Jefferson's refusal to comply with a subpoena issued in August.

"Some people are definitely unhappy" with Bush's order, one law enforcement official said. "But if we can bring down the rhetoric and cool off, it may be better for everyone in the end."

Gonzales said in a statement that Bush's order will "protect the integrity" of the investigation, while providing "additional time to reach a permanent solution."

DOJ_NMG_0029686

Legal experts said that Bush clearly has the legal authority to direct his Justice Department to do anything lawful with regard to an ongoing investigation.

To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Seized Files (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And David Johnston

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — President Bush intervened directly Thursday in an increasingly tense constitutional fight between Congress and the Justice Department by ordering that records seized from a Congressional office over the weekend be sealed for 45 days.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," Mr. Bush said in his first statement on the swirl of events surrounding the Federal Bureau of Investigation's search of the office of Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, who has been accused of accepting bribes. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

The president said that the material in question would be turned over for 45 days to the solicitor general, the Justice Department official who represents the government before the Supreme Court. That step would allow the Justice Department to say that it had not given up material regarded by prosecutors as lawfully obtained evidence needed for a criminal case.

The presidential intervention came as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, normally the administration's champion on Capitol Hill, suggested that the Justice Department had tried to intimidate him through a news leak because of his challenge of the agency's authority to conduct the search.

In one interview, the normally reticent speaker, an Illinois Republican, portrayed a report broadcast by ABC News on Wednesday evening as calculated retaliation and said that he had demanded a retraction. The Justice Department issued firm denials of the ABC report, which was attributed to anonymous federal sources and said Mr. Hastert was part of the inquiry into the activities of the convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In a morning interview with a radio station in his home state, WGN in Chicago, Mr. Hastert said, "This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people."

He stopped short of that charge when pressed later by reporters on the West Front steps of the Capitol. But he and his allies were clearly furious. "I don't know if this leak out of the Justice Department or wherever it came was a coincidence or not," Mr. Hastert said. "But I will let anybody else try to connect the dots."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said senior officials at the Justice Department had assured the White House there had been no effort to embarrass Mr. Hastert. "Just false, false, false," Mr. Snow said.

ABC News, meanwhile, continued to defend its report. "We stand by the story," said Jeffrey W. Schneider, vice president of ABC News. "We went back to our sources twice after our first report. They affirmed what we reported and what they had told us."

Before Mr. Bush's decision to step in, what law enforcement officials described as a tense drama had played out as Justice Department officials, backed by career prosecutors, refused to give up the material seized in the search of Mr. Jefferson's office. At one point, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general who was once chief counsel to the House majority leader, told Scott Palmer, chief of staff to Mr. Hastert, that he would quit rather than give up the materials to Mr. Jefferson.

By Wednesday evening, Justice Department lawyers and lawyers for the House had staked out nonnegotiable positions, with House lawyers demanding return of the Jefferson documents.

Justice lawyers, backed by the F.B.I., would not agree to hand over any of the material, which included a copy of the hard drive of Mr. Jefferson's office computer, along with calendars and date books.

Throughout Wednesday, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who had signed off on the search warrant of Mr. Jefferson's office, sought unsuccessfully to speak with Mr. Hastert. At the same time, Mr. McNulty, who has long-term Republican ties to Capitol Hill, sought to placate infuriated lawmakers.

The stalemate was broken Thursday morning, when White House aides suggested an intermediate step of turning the material over to the solicitor general. Sealing it for 45 days allows the House and the Justice Department to continue to discuss a more permanent resolution, which could be important in several other pending criminal inquiries that have focused on sitting House members of both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0029687

Those include the influence-buying inquiry involving Mr. Abramoff, the convicted lobbyist, and the broadening investigation that grew out of the inquiry into the activities of Representative Randy Cunningham, the San Diego Republican who was a member of the House Appropriations Committee. Mr. Cunningham resigned his House seat last fall when he pleaded guilty to accepting more than $2 million in cash and gifts in return for steering contracts to political supporters.

At the F.B.I., officials said they would comply with the deal but complained privately that it would bar them from examining the materials discovered in the search for more than a month. Senior F.B.I. officials were not consulted in negotiations and regarded any effort to keep them from evidence as an unfair intrusion that could compromise their investigation.

The confrontation over the independence of the legislative branch from the executive branch, coming as Congress was busy trying to complete a full plate of legislation heading into a Memorial Day recess, was taking unusual twists.

Republicans were leading a challenge to the administration stemming from the criminal inquiry into a Democrat; Democrats were wrestling with how to separate themselves from Mr. Jefferson. And some were hinting that Republicans were more concerned with protecting themselves from future searches than with protecting the institution.

Mr. Bush took no sides in the fight but said the cooling-off period would "provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government." He also pledged that "this investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

In a statement, Mr. Gonzales said the search had been approved by a federal judge. But he said Mr. Bush's action "provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

Justice Department officials said the search of Mr. Jefferson's office was lawfully carried out on the basis of a warrant signed by Judge T. S. Ellis of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va. They said the search was intended to retrieve specific documents and e-mail messages that prosecutors hoped to find. Without identifying the documents, the officials said investigators had found what they were looking for.

Mr. Hastert and Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, issued a joint statement, saying they had directed the House counsel to open negotiations with the Justice Department on "protocols and procedures to be followed in connection with evidence of criminal conduct that might exist in the offices of members."

Mr. Bush sought to defuse the controversy as tempers were rising among House Republicans, both over the government search and what rank-and-file Republicans saw as poisonous treatment of Mr. Hastert, which could be a major problem for the administration as it tries to move legislation ahead. House Republicans met privately for more than an hour Thursday afternoon to explore the situation and hear the leadership's rationale for its strong opposition to the search.

Bush Seals Documents In Bribery Probe (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Seeking to quell a rebellion in Congress, President Bush took the extraordinary step Thursday of sealing for 45 days all the documents the FBI seized from Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office as part of a bribery investigation against the New Orleans Democrat.

Bush acted after an ugly confrontation developed between the administration and House leaders, including Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), over the constitutionality of the FBI's Saturday night raid in the House's Rayburn Office Building.

In a statement, the president said the 45-day period "will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a co-equal branch of government."

In a letter to the administration on Wednesday, Hastert and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) charged that the Justice Department, in conducting the raid, had violated the doctrine of separation of powers between Congress and the executive branch and the debate and speech clause in the Constitution. They said the documents should be returned, even if the government is conducting a criminal investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0029688

An obviously angry Hastert went one step further, saying in a radio interview with WGN in Chicago that it appeared administration officials had leaked a false story to ABC News on Wednesday suggesting he was under investigation in a congressional lobbying scandal in an apparent effort to intimidate him.

When asked later if the leak was retaliatory, Hastert said, "All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect the dots any way they want to. I thought it was an interesting sequence of events." White House spokesman Tony Snow said the government did not leak information to undermine Hastert. "I got pretty categorical denials," Snow said.

In response to the ABC report, the Justice Department denied the speaker was under investigation.

Hastert had even sought a private audience with the president to complain about the FBI raid. Not all members of Congress agreed with the speaker, however, and several said in statements that they saw nothing wrong with a raid seeking to uncover criminality.

Still, the raid was widely criticized on Capitol Hill by both Democrats and Republicans. It was the first time in the 219 years of the House that the executive branch raided the office of a member of Congress. The department said it acted to obtain a search warrant after Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, refused to comply with a subpoena for various documents.

Abner Mika, White House counsel under President Bill Clinton and a former House member, praised the president's action. "I think it is a reasonable, temporary solution to the problem," he said. Mikva, who also was a federal judge, raised doubts about whether the constitutional provisions cited by Hastert and Pelosi cover illegal activity by a House member.

Charles Tiefer, a professor of government and law at the University of Baltimore and a former lawyer in the House counsel's office, said, "It's historic, striking, extraordinary and represents a classic effort by the chief executive to balance several of his responsibilities—on the one hand, to respect a coordinate branch of government, and at the same time to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Tiefer, scheduled to testify at a House Judiciary Committee hearing next week on the FBI raid, said he could not recall a president intervening by sealing seized papers.

"The overtones of a police raid like that directly on the Capitol grounds for the first time in history—especially with FBI agents slamming the door on the lawyer for the House, when she just wanted to watch what they were doing—bring to mind some of the aspects of living in a police state," Tiefer said.

Bush said the documents would remain in the custody of Solicitor General Paul Clement, who heads a separate office in the Justice Department and is not involved in the corruption probe involving Jefferson.

Bush did not cite a precedent for his action, but the president clearly was in a box, seeking to defend his own government's action even as numerous Republicans on Capitol Hill were riled over the raid.

"Let me be clear," Bush said. "Investigating and prosecuting crime is a crucial executive responsibility that I take seriously. Those who violate the law—including a member of Congress—should and will be held to account. This investigation will go forward and justice will be served."

According to FBI statements filed in court, Jefferson, the first black congressman to be elected from Louisiana since Reconstruction, accepted $100,000 in bribes, and $90,000 in cash had been found in his freezer at his Washington apartment.

Two businessmen have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson to promote a business venture, but the congressman has denied allegations of wrongdoing.

Pelosi, who has alleged that the Republican majority is guilty of a "culture of corruption" as the result of lobbying scandals, pushed Jefferson on Wednesday to resign his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee. But the congressman refused to do so, saying he needed to represent his city as it tries to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

The Jefferson scandal, however, has given Republicans a way to counter Democratic charges about a culture of corruption under GOP control of Congress. That scandal involved influence-peddling by convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the resignation of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

The speaker and Pelosi said House counsel Geraldine Gennet would meet with the Justice Department to resolve what to do with the papers seized in the raid on Jefferson's office.

DOJ_NMG_0029689

A Justice Department official familiar with the negotiations with Congress said House leaders put the agency in an untenable position by demanding return of the Jefferson documents.

"Do you think there's any way the Justice Department would give incriminating documents back to an entity that the target is connected to? No way," said the source, who requested anonymity because of the delicacy of discussions between the House and the executive branch.

Bush Seeks To Defuse Conflict With House Over Seized Documents (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Trying to avert a showdown with the House of Representatives over the Constitution's powers, President Bush on Thursday ordered the FBI to stop examining files seized from a congressman's office last weekend while the House and the Justice Department negotiate a way out of their confrontation.

In a highly unusual intervention, the president ordered that files taken by the FBI from the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., be sealed for 45 days and held in the custody of the solicitor general.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., displayed rare bipartisan outrage this week over the FBI raid of Jefferson's office. They argued that it violated a fundamental principle of the U.S. Constitution - the independence of the three co-equal branches of government, legislative, executive and judicial. Never before has an executive police agency raided a congressional office.

"I recognize these are deeply held views," Bush said. "Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries."

In a joint statement following the president's announcement, Hastert and Pelosi said they had directed House lawyers to negotiate with the Justice Department to establish procedures for obtaining "evidence of criminal conduct that might exist in the offices of members."

Legal experts say the Justice Department could seek the appointment of a special master to examine the seized documents and determine which ones are relevant to the investigation.

According to lawmakers who were briefed by the Justice Department, the agents carted away one box of records from Jefferson's office.

The FBI-House confrontation has roiled Washington politics.

In a radio interview Thursday that his office distributed to reporters, Hastert suggested that a report by ABC News Wednesday evening linking him to a federal influence-peddling investigation was an attempt by Justice to bully him for his opposition to the FBI's raid on Jefferson's office.

The Justice Department denied that Hastert is under investigation shortly after the ABC News report.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people, and we're just not going to be intimidated by it," Hastert said on WGN radio in Chicago. "This is about trying to kind of smoke-screen some of the separation of power stuff that we're doing."

Some lawmakers have complained that the objections from Hastert and Pelosi appear self-serving and could prove to be politically embarrassing.

"They're saying a congressman's office is a safe haven ... sort of like an embassy, where traditionally you stash incriminating evidence," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La. "The position they seem to be taking is indefensible."

Because Jefferson is a Democrat, Hastert has some political cover. But the Justice Department is also investigating Republicans as an outgrowth of guilty pleas by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and some of his associates on charges that they illegally tried to influence legislative action.

Pelosi, meanwhile, has irritated some members of the Congressional Black Caucus, of which Jefferson is a member, for asking Jefferson to give up his seat on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax law. Several members of the caucus have complained that Jefferson hasn't been charged with a crime and that the accusations against him have nothing to do with his work on the committee.

An affidavit filed in court to obtain last weekend's search warrant accuses Jefferson of taking a $100,000 bribe. It says $90,000 in cash was discovered hidden in his home freezer.

Bush Seals FBI-seized Files In Bribery Probe (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday sealed the files the FBI seized from a Louisiana congressman's Capitol office as part of a bribery probe, saying the Justice Department and Congress should take 45 days to resolve the constitutional issues involved.

The White House has been stung by criticism from top Republicans that last week's nighttime raid of the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat, violated the separation of powers between the branches of government. Mr. Bush's action yesterday was both an acknowledgment that the move was unprecedented, and a plea for time for the parties to cool off.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries. Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out," Mr. Bush said yesterday afternoon.

He also said if the Justice Department and Congress can't resolve it, they should take it to court.

Under Mr. Bush's orders, the seized papers will be turned over to the Solicitor General's Office and no one will be allowed access to the files other than to preserve them.

"It's a big step in the right direction to try to diffuse the crisis that we have," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said of the 45-day freeze.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat -- the two lead critics of the raid, who earlier this week demanded the documents be returned -- said the House counsel will start negotiating with the Justice Department to reach a resolution.

Mr. Jefferson is the subject of an ongoing federal investigation.

House Republican leaders called their members to a meeting yesterday afternoon to discuss the situation. Afterward, Mr. Hastert said the 45-day freeze is "an agreement we can live with" and predicted a resolution is possible.

"I think there's a great appreciation of the 45 days and there's a great appreciation for the speaker's leadership on this," said House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said Mr. Bush's move "provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

Not all lawmakers, however, are opposed to the FBI's actions. Republican Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, was briefed yesterday by high-level Justice Department officials and said, "I feel more strongly than ever that that search was legal and constitutional."

He said that if lawmakers continue to complain, the American people will think Congress is trying to protect its own.

Some House Republicans also said it's politically bad for Republicans to be feuding. "I don't think we should be fighting with the FBI going into an election," said Rep. Joe Pitts, Pennsylvania Republican.

Meanwhile, Mr. Hastert yesterday accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him because of his vocal outrage over the FBI search.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people. And we're just not going to be intimidated," he told Chicago radio station WGN yesterday morning. Later, he said, "All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect any dots they want to."

Mr. Hastert was referring to an ABC News story Wednesday that referred to an unnamed law-enforcement source as saying the Illinois Republican is part of the Justice Department's investigation surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Soon after the story broke, the Justice Department issued a statement saying Mr. Hastert is not being investigated.

Mr. Hastert demanded a retraction of the story, which ABC stood behind. The speaker's lawyers yesterday threatened to sue ABC on libel and defamation charges.

Bush Intervenes In Constitutional Battle Over Congress Raid (AFP-Y2)

By Laurent Lozano

DOJ_NMG_0029691

AFP, May 25, 2006

President George W. Bush stepped into a growing constitutional battle between the US Congress and criminal investigators over an unprecedented raid on a lawmaker's office.

Acknowledging that the problem was a first in US political history, Bush ordered the Justice Department to seal for 45 days documents and computer discs seized in the raid on the Congress office of a House of Representatives member.

Republican and Democratic leaders have said the raid represented unconstitutional interference by the executive branch into legislative activities and demanded that the Federal Bureau of Investigation return the material.

The operation late Saturday at the office of Representative William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), a Democrat from Louisiana suspected of corruption, was the first of its kind on the Congress building in the 219 year history of the US legislature, according to political experts.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," said Bush, who still insisted that the investigation against Jefferson must go ahead.

"Today I am directing the Department of Justice to seal all the materials recovered from Congressman Jefferson's office for the next 45 days and not to allow access to anyone involved in the investigation," Bush said in a statement.

The materials are to be held by the solicitor general, who is not involved in the investigation.

Jefferson is accused of taking bribes for business deals in West Africa. In a search of his home last year, authorities found 90,000 dollars stuffed in his freezer, according to court documents released this week.

Republican House speaker Dennis Hastert and Democratic House leader Nancy Pelosi said in a joint statement Wednesday that the raid was "unconstitutional" and demanded the return of the seized material.

But they also said Jefferson, who has denied any wrongdoing, must cooperate with investigators.

"What we want to do is not protect people that broke the law, what we need to protect is the division of powers in the constitution of the United States, and that's one of the things I talked to the president about," Hastert told reporters Thursday.

Bush said there were "deeply held views" in Congress on the raid.

The 45 days "will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government," he said.

But the president also warned that Jefferson could not escape the investigation into his activities.

"Let me be clear," he said. "Investigating and prosecuting crime is a crucial executive responsibility that I take seriously. Those who violate the law -- including a member of Congress -- should and will be held to account. This investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

Bitterness over the raid has gone so deep that Hastert has alleged that a report by a US television network that he was under investigation for corruption was a deliberate leak caused by his protest.

ABC News reported Wednesday that Hastert was involved in an investigation into Congress corruption involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has close links to the Republican Party.

Hastert has demanded ABC retract the report and said the Justice Department was behind the report. "This is one of the leaks that came out to intimidate people," he told a Chicago radio station.

The Justice Department took the unusual step of issuing two statements denying that Hastert was under investigation. It normally refuses to confirm or deny news reports about investigations.

Bush Orders House Documents Sealed (MRKTWTCH)

By William L. Watts, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, May 26, 2006

Move aims to defuse confrontation with House

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- President Bush on Thursday ordered the Justice Department to seal documents it seized from a Democratic congressman's office for 45 days, in an effort to defuse a constitutional confrontation with House leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0029692

The move came after House Speaker Dennis Hastert accused Justice Department officials of trying to intimidate him by leaking a false report to ABC News that the chamber's top Republican was under investigation as part of a corruption probe.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to intimidate people. And we're just not going to be intimidated on it," Hastert, R-Ill., told Chicago's WGN radio Thursday morning. The Justice Department has denied officially that Hastert is under investigation.

Hastert, the House's top Republican, has demanded a retraction, while ABC has stood behind the story.

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Hastert have demanded that the Justice Department return documents seized from the congressional offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La. They contend that the execution of a search warrant over the weekend breached the Constitution's separation of powers doctrine.

Bush ordered a cooling-off period. "Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," he said in a statement. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

The president ordered that the FBI to turn over the seized materials to the Solicitor General, who would place them under seal.

ABC News, citing unidentified law-enforcement sources, reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating a letter Hastert wrote three years ago to then-Interior Secretary Gale Norton to block an Indian casino -- which would have competed with casinos operated by tribes represented by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and is cooperating with an ongoing investigation.

Denial, denial

The Justice Department twice issued denials of the story, saying that Hastert wasn't the subject of an investigation. Such denials are rare; the agency usually refuses to confirm or deny the existence of a probe.

ABC News late Wednesday posted an update on its Web site, saying that despite the department's statement, federal law-enforcement sources said the network had accurately reported that Hastert was "in the mix" of the FBI probe of congressional corruption.

That prompted a second statement from Justice Wednesday night. "With regards to reports suggesting that the speaker of the House is under investigation or 'in the mix,' as stated by ABC News, I reconfirm, as stated by the department earlier this evening, that these reports are untrue," said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty.

ABC News stood behind its story.

"We've gone back to our multiple sources on two occasions since we did the report, and they assured us that what they reported reflected what they knew," ABC News spokesman Jeffrey Schneider told the Associated Press.

Schneider suggested there may be a semantic difference between saying someone is formally under investigation and whether his name came up as part of a wider probe, according to the wire report.

Hastert and Pelosi issued a joint statement on Wednesday calling on the Justice Department to "immediately return the papers it unconstitutionally seized" from Jefferson's office.

"Once that is done, Congressman Jefferson can and should fully cooperate with the Justice Department's efforts, consistent with his constitutional rights," the legislators said. William L. Watts is a reporter for MarketWatch.

Bush Orders Evidence Seized From Congressional Office Sealed (BLOOM)

By Roger Runningen

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush ordered the Justice Department to put under seal evidence seized during a weekend raid on the congressional office of a lawmaker under investigation in a bribery case.

Bush took the step today after leaders of both parties complained that the Federal Bureau of Investigation overstepped the constitutional separation of powers by searching the government office of a member of Congress.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, a Republican, and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi yesterday issued a rare joint statement demanding the Justice Department return all documents taken from Representative William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office.

DOJ_NMG_0029693

``I am directing the Department of Justice to seal all materials recovered from Congressman Jefferson's office for the next 45 days and not to allow access to anyone involved in the investigation," Bush said in a statement.

The material will be put in the custody of the U.S. Solicitor General's office.

Hastert has expressed frustration that the White House didn't consult him before the FBI searched Jefferson's offices on May 20. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, was videotaped accepting a leather briefcase containing $100,000 in cash from a government witness, according to an FBI affidavit filed in connection with the search warrant. He has denied wrongdoing and hasn't been charged with a crime.

Hastert discussed his constitutional concerns directly with Bush this week, said Ron Bonjean, the congressman's spokesman.

``Investigating and prosecuting crime is a crucial executive responsibility that I take seriously," Bush's statement said. ``Those who violate the law, including members of Congress, should and will be held to account. This investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

Sealing the evidence will give both sides time to ``resolve the issues" involved in the raid, Bush said.

Lawmaker Raid May Come Back To Bite Bush (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The recent FBI raid of a congressman's office is fueling a power struggle between Congress and the administration that could hobble President Bush in his efforts to move his legislative agenda.

In hopes of easing tensions, President Bush yesterday ordered frozen all documents taken by federal agents during Saturday's search of the office of Louisiana Democrat Rep. William Jefferson, who is being investigated for taking bribes. The documents will now be sealed for 45 days, which the president hopes will provide a cooling off period.

The president had good reasons to act. The fracas turned into a near-open revolt yesterday among House Republicans -- normally the White House's staunchest backers -- who were infuriated by a news report that Speaker Dennis Hastert himself was a subject of the federal corruption probe.

Even though the Justice Department denied the report, Mr. Hastert, in a Chicago radio interview yesterday, accused Justice of leaking the report to try to silence his criticism of the Jefferson raid. "This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people," Mr. Hastert said. "We're just not going to be intimidated on it."

The new tensions with Capitol Hill could have a real impact on the White House. Mr. Hastert, a burly former wrestling coach, has been one of the White House's best friends on Capitol Hill. As the Senate has been willing to challenge the White House, Mr. Hastert delivered a succession of legislative victories over the years to President Bush even when it meant bending the will of his own moderate or conservative wings.

For much of Mr. Bush's term, the president's aides and policies haven't been subject to the level of congressional oversight that critics have demanded. Now, more administration officials could find themselves being hauled before skeptical -- if not hostile -- oversight committees, such as the hearings scheduled by the House Judiciary Committee next week to review the Jefferson office raid. In press releases, Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wyo.) has dubbed the hearings: "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

The battle could also embolden the Senate to pass a tougher version of legislation limiting the administration's ability to conduct domestic spying programs with the hope that the House would back them, rather than Mr. Bush, as it has in the past. And there could be more fights over spending bills, even as the spat could scuttle any hope of passing a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, which the White House views as a key prong of its election strategy.

"The House is now faced with a reality of power," says former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a possible candidate for president in 2008 now working at the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank. "Either they do things that involve appropriations or oversight that are real, or they earn the contempt with which they are being treated."

DOJ_NMG_0029694

The ABC News Hastert report came the same day Mr. Hastert had joined with House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi in claiming the Jefferson raid violated the constitution because it represented an infringement by the executive branch into the realm of the legislative branch.

"Obviously they don't like to be challenged and they were by the most powerful people on the Hill," Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.) said in an interview. "I think Justice pointed the gun at the wrong person this time."

Frustration between the House and the Justice Department stems in part from the probe of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff in January pleaded guilty to trying to bribe members of Congress, and has been cooperating with federal investigators. Much of the evidence that has emerged suggests Mr. Abramoff curried favor with lawmakers by shoving cash from his clients into their campaign accounts, providing flashy accommodations for fund-raisers, such as his own downtown restaurant or skyboxes for football or basketball games, and paying for expensive trips abroad.

For many lawmakers, the investigation seems to be moving from the most egregious practices of a few members to criminalizing some basic fund-raising and lobbying techniques. "There is widespread belief on the Hill that the Justice Department is out of control with this idea that campaign contributions equals bribery," noted one Republican close to the caucus.

Thus far, government attorneys haven't made such a claim in a case against a lawmaker. But several have been forced to publicly explain how campaign donations didn't affect their official acts and to turn over documents to the FBI to prove it.

FBI agents are also seeking to interview House and Senate members to see if they leaked information to the New York Times last year disclosing the administration's controversial program allowing some eavesdropping on domestic telephone calls. Justice officials have hinted that criminal charges could be lodged in that investigation.

"For an administration that needs allies in order to come back," the Justice Department's actions are "dumbfounding," says David Gergen, a veteran of Republican and Democratic administrations.

Mr. Bush has, in some ways, aggravated congressional Republicans since the beginning of his presidency, when he sought strict loyalty from legislative partisans, arguing that his success and theirs were inseparable. Now, many fear that they -- and not Mr. Bush -- will pay an electoral price for backing what is now an unpopular war in Iraq, and the president's plunging approval ratings.

Yesterday afternoon, House Republicans gathered in a windowless basement room for a private meeting aimed at sorting through the roller coaster of the past few days. They left the meeting carrying talking points from Republican leaders: "No one is above the law," the paper said. "Just as no branch of government is above the Constitution."

Hastert Slammed For Raid Reaction (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Conservatives yesterday expressed confusion and outrage over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's defense of a Democratic congressman whose Capitol Hill office was raided last weekend by the FBI.

"Only thing I can figure is that Denny got up one morning and said, 'Our approval with the public is at 27 percent -- how can I drive that down further?' " said former Rep. Bob Barr, Georgia Republican.

House Republicans, meanwhile, refused to criticize their leader, who joined Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi in accusing the Justice Department of violating "protocols and procedures" because of the FBI's Saturday night seizure of records from the offices Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat.

Radio host Rush Limbaugh yesterday told his millions of listeners that the Hastert-Pelosi alliance shows the GOP has become "politically tone-deaf," while a Louisiana senator was the only elected Republican in Washington to criticize the defense of congressional privilege by Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"For congressional leaders to react by trying to ban or limit searches of congressional offices will only destroy what little faith and confidence in the institution is left," said Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican. "Make no mistake, the American people will come to one conclusion, that congressional leaders are trying to protect their own from valid investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0029695

Veteran conservative activist Richard Viguerie said Mr. Hastert "is clueless -- he just doesn't get it, doesn't understand he has to make changes, the same in the Senate."

Mr. Viguerie predicted that "this whole thing is going to come down on" Republicans, who are expecting a powerful Democratic challenge this November to their 12-year control of the House, in a campaign where scandal and corruption have already become a key issue.

Several polls in recent weeks have indicated that Americans consider the GOP more prone to corruption than Democrats. Earlier this month for example, a CBS/New York Times survey reported that 40 percent of those polled said "Republicans in Congress are more financially corrupt," compared to 15 percent who said Democrats are more corrupt and 30 percent who said both parties are equally corrupt.

The political impact of the Jefferson case -- the New Orleans congressman who prosecutors say hid $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer -- drew Mr. Limbaugh's attention.

"Here you have the Democrats attempting ... to craft as a campaign theme the Republican 'culture of corruption,' and lo and behold, delivered to the Republicans on a silver platter is Congressman William Jefferson," the nation's No. 1 talk-radio host said yesterday. "So you would think that the Republican leadership would understand there's an opportunity here."

Court documents describing the Rayburn House Office Building search revealed new details of federal prosecutors' corruption charges against Mr. Jefferson, part of a continuing investigation that has already produced two convictions, including a former Jefferson aide.

Mr. Hastert and Mrs. Pelosi yesterday said the Justice Department's search of Mr. Jefferson's office was a violation of the separation of powers guaranteed under Article I of the Constitution, which says members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. Barr, a former federal prosecutor -- and a leader in the 1998 impeachment of President Clinton -- scoffed at the Hastert-Pelosi statement.

"There is no constitutional right to secret evidence of criminal activity, just because it happens to occupy space on Capitol Hill," said Mr. Barr. "I think the FBI is perfectly within its rights to exercise a judicially approved search warrant."

One top Republican in Washington yesterday said privately that the problem was that nobody in the Bush administration had bothered to tip off Mr. Hastert or House Majority Leader John A. Boehner before the FBI staged its search of Mr. Jefferson's offices. Capitol Hill insiders said complaints by some House Republicans were aired in a tense two-hour closed-door leadership meeting yesterday.

While the House GOP publicly closed ranks behind Mr. Hastert, Mr. Viguerie yesterday said the leader's stance was arrogant.

"What Hastert and Pelosi are doing in hammering the FBI is saying, 'We play by different rules from ordinary people. We protect each other, Republicans and Democrats, in Congress,' " said Mr. Viguerie. "Congress makes sure its members have no serious competition, and the public understands and resents that."

Mr. Barr said the House leadership's stand was motivated in part by resentment of the Bush White House.

"I suppose on a very general level Congress has for some reason awakened from its constitutional sleepwalk and seized on this as way to assert it relevance and power," Mr. Barr said. "The Congress has allowed itself to be slapped around by the Bush administration and appears to be unconcerned about eroding the base of its authority."

Analysis: Congress-FBI Flap May Irk Voters (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, May 25, 2006

The constitutional clash over the FBI raid of a lawmaker's office in a corruption probe has triggered an exceptional display of congressional bipartisan unity. But there are pitfalls for both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0029696

Additional prosecutions loom in the investigation surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and calling more attention to corruption — and congressional privilege — could further drive down election-year approval ratings for all of Congress. These numbers already languish below those of President Bush.

"I don't think it's wise politically for Congress to stand too tall on this issue," said Paul C. Light, professor of public service at New York University.

While the Constitution does extend certain protections to lawmakers against being intimidated or controlled by the executive branch, "I don't think the American public would warm easily to the notion that Congress can't be investigated because the Constitution says otherwise," he said.

Bush sought to defuse the battle between the Justice Department and Congress on Thursday, ordering documents seized by the FBI — which congressional leaders want returned — to be sealed for a 45-day cooling-off period.

Even if the debate may not be stirring ordinary Americans, it's become a huge deal in turf-sensitive Washington.

The weekend raid on the legislative offices of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La., was said to be the first such physical encroachment by the executive branch on Congress in the nation's history.

Yet for ruling-party Republicans, the more attention they give the issue, the more likely voters will be reminded of GOP figures under prosecution as well.

This includes charges against former Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby — as well as the bribery investigation that already has sent former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., to prison.

Furthermore, the flap comes at a time when the Bush administration faces criticism for pushing the envelope of its executive powers in warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency and in other surveillance and detention programs.

For Democrats, the more they blast FBI tactics against one of their own, the harder it will be to make their "culture of corruption" label stick against Republicans. And the more they may reinforce public perceptions that corruption in Washington is bipartisan.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was among the few leaders counseling restraint, saying, "I'm not going to beat up on the FBI." But Reid's House counterpart — Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. — joined House Speaker Dennis Hastert in a blistering joint condemnation of the FBI's tactics that demanded return of the seized documents.

The FBI called its behavior proper and necessary, noting the bureau had obtained a warrant and that Jefferson had ignored a subpoena for the information issued last August. The FBI is investigating allegations that the eight-term House member, who represents New Orleans, took hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for promoting business ventures in Africa.

Congressional leaders accused the FBI of overstepping the bounds of what's permissible under the Constitution's separation-of-powers provisions. In particular, they asserted the FBI violated the "speech and debate" protections in Article 1, Section 6.

That section states that members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

The prohibition against searching congressional offices is not spelled out. It's more a matter of tradition, many legal analysts argue.

"You can't hide bribery behind the `speech and debate clause,'" said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor who is director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

"I find it kind of ironic that the one time they're getting exercised about the possible abuse of executive power is when the executive branch is looking into congressional corruption," Sloan said.

But Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute who specializes in Congress, said the dispute is "a big deal. This has never happened before and there's a reason this has never happened before. This is a pretty direct violation of the `speech and debate' clause. If I were the speaker, I would really be upset."

Hastert was.

DOJ_NMG_0029697

He escalated matters Thursday by accusing the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him, hinting it was linked to an ABC news report that alleged he was under investigation for dealings with Abramoff. Hastert also threatened to sue the network. The Justice Department denied Hastert was a target of its investigation.

Fallout From Jefferson Case May Hurt His Party (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, May 26, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — International bribery schemes hatched in fancy hotels outside the nation's capital. Wads of cash in foil-wrapped bundles in a congressman's freezer. A Saturday night raid by federal agents on Capitol Hill.

At the center of Washington's latest alleged political scandal: Mild-mannered, Harvard-educated U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, Louisiana's only black congressman and a fixture in New Orleans politics since the 1970s. The eight-term House member is suspected of taking money to help a Kentucky technology company called iGate Inc. win lucrative contracts in Africa.

Jefferson, 59, has not been charged and he denies the allegations, which have shocked residents in the Katrina-ravaged neighborhoods he represents.

"I believe he is innocent, whatever the accusations are," says Pearl Thomas, Jefferson's 73-year-old neighbor.

Others, such as Cheron Brylski, a political consultant who once backed Jefferson's opponent in a congressional race, say they have always wondered about him.

"We called him 'Dollar Bill.' … There is this awful perception of him as someone out for personal gain, and that has haunted him almost from day one," Brylski said. She later befriended Jefferson, however, and ran two of his campaigns. "The Bill Jefferson I know, there are two sides. I would consider him one of the few Democrats who literally believes in the Democratic Party platform."

Louisiana has always borne a reputation for corrupt politicians. Jefferson's alleged misdoings may cause more than just red faces, however. Louisiana is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina, and billions in federal dollars await congressional approval.

"Since the storm has hit, we've basically been without representation in that district," says Russell Henderson, a lobbyist and a teacher at Dillard University in New Orleans. "The congressman has been unable to provide us with any kind of leadership. Everything he would say or do is distracted by his problems with the feds."

A host of Louisiana politicians — former governor Edwin Edwards, most famously — have been caught in local kickback schemes. This case alleges overseas deals and bribery of foreign officials, however. Not only could it be bad for Louisiana, but also for Democrats nationally, who are trying to win mid-term elections by painting Republicans as corrupt. This week, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi asked Jefferson to give up his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He refused.

The case against Jefferson was revealed in an affidavit filed Saturday to obtain a search warrant for the congressman's office. Jefferson called the raid, possibly the first on a congressman's office in history, "outrageous." Leaders of both political parties denounced the raid as a violation of the constitutional separation of powers. In response, President Bush Thursday ordered the materials to be sealed for 45 days.

The details from the affidavit, though, are out there, and they sound as if they were ripped from a crime novel:

The FBI described secretly recorded conversations and meetings between Jefferson and an investor in iGate Inc.'s Africa project. The investor, whose name is blacked out in the public version of the affidavit, approached the FBI in 2004 to allege that Jefferson had demanded "consulting fees" in exchange for his help with a deal to provide wireless services to West African nations.

Last July, the witness met with Jefferson at the Ritz-Carlton in Arlington, Va. They walked outside to the witness's car, where Jefferson retrieved a leather briefcase filled with $100,000 in marked bills, money the congressman said he would use to coax African officials into the deal.

Four days later, the FBI raided Jefferson's homes in New Orleans and Washington. The affidavit says they found $90,000 of the cash in his Washington freezer, wrapped in foil and nestled in plastic food containers.

DOJ_NMG_0029698

The court document says agents videotaped Jefferson as he struck deals on slips of paper passed back and forth at the hotel, with Jefferson speaking of money being funneled to a bank account in his children's names. FBI tapes recorded Jefferson using colorful language during the secret meetings, describing himself as a man "in the shadows, behind the curtain," the affidavit said. When he demanded more money by writing down a percentage and passing it across a table, he laughed and said, "All these damn notes we're writing to each other as if we're talking, as if the FBI is watching," according to the affidavit.

Jefferson now says, "There are two sides to this story."

Two of Jefferson's associates have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with the FBI. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate Inc., said he paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to Jefferson and his family members in exchange for help securing contracts.

In Jefferson's Louisiana district, the potentially damning evidence against an ambitious and accomplished man is disheartening, even to those who aren't surprised.

Jefferson was born in 1947 in the north Louisiana town of Lake Providence, known as one of America's poorest. After graduating from Harvard Law School, he founded what is now the largest majority-black law firm in the South. He was a well-respected, three-term state senator before being elected to Congress in 1990. Three of his five daughters graduated from Harvard College and Law School; one is a state representative.

"His legacy has been tremendous," says Trevor Bryan, who was his law partner from 1976 to 1990. "He knocked down a lot of doors (for blacks) in the Deep South."

With one week to go before hurricane season begins, and Congress poised to vote on billions in hurricane relief, another political scandal has bubbled up. The uncle of former mayor Marc Morial pleaded guilty Wednesday to stealing from the Regional Transit Authority, which he managed. An ongoing federal corruption probe of Morial's friends and associates could implicate others.

"We're staggering as a city, and all this is another blow," Henderson says.

There's A Right Way (USAT)

By Rep. Dennis Hastert

USA Today, May 26, 2006

If the information we have read about the behavior of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., seems as obvious to a jury as it does to me, he deserves to be vigorously prosecuted. I do not want to do anything that will interfere with that prosecution.

The issue that has concerned me, as Speaker, since Saturday night is not if the FBI should be able to search a member of Congress' office, but rather how to do it within the boundaries of the Constitution.

On Thursday, President Bush recognized that serious constitutional issues needed to be resolved. He wisely directed the Department of Justice to send the documents (taken from Jefferson's office last weekend) to the Solicitor General's office for safekeeping for 45 days. This was a meaningful step. The president also encouraged the Justice Department to meet with us.

Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and I directed the lawyers for the House to develop reasonable protocols and procedures that will make it possible for the FBI to go into congressional offices to constitutionally-execute a search warrant.

In more than 219 years, the Justice Department has never found it necessary to use a search warrant to obtain documents from a congressional office. These issues have always been resolved without the necessity of a search warrant, and prosecutions have gone forward.

Justice Department officials now insist that this specific case required them, for the first time, to conduct a search. I regret that when they reached this conclusion, they did not work with us to figure out a way to do it consistently with the Constitution. But that is behind us now. I am confident that in the next 45 days, the lawyers will figure out how to do it right.

Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., is speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Cash-in-Freezer Probe A Hot Topic In New Orleans (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029699

Friends and foes of Rep. William J. Jefferson, who is accused in bribery case, voice a range of opinions from denial to distrust.

NEW ORLEANS — Rep William J. Jefferson has long provided one of Louisiana's favorite success stories: the sometime-sharecropper's son who rose from rural roots to attend Harvard Law School, become a Democratic Party power player and reach the halls of Congress.

So when the FBI revealed that it had videotape of Jefferson accepting $100,000 in cash that the bureau said was intended to bribe a Nigerian official — and that $90,000 of it had been found in the freezer of Jefferson's home — constituents of Louisiana's 2nd Congressional District reacted with shock, disappointment and a touch of amusement hardened by experience.

Friends say the allegations against Jefferson, who represents New Orleans, are simply out of character. Foes say they never trusted him. Now that the city's mayoral elections are over and incumbent C. Ray Nagin is in office for four more years, Jefferson's travails are the buzz around many quarters of this city.

"It's really the new talk after the elections," said Mike Miller, 26, as he walked his English bulldog, Buddha, one recent afternoon not far from Jefferson's house on Marengo Street in a ritzy section of the city's Uptown neighborhood. "We've got our mayor, and now we've got this big one with Bill."

"When they found the money in the freezer, man … " said Ricky Bragg between bites of spaghetti Bolognese at Fat Harry's bar in Uptown. "I was kind of shocked. I just never thought he would get caught up — allegedly — in that type of situation."

Jefferson, an eight-term congressman and a senior member of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, and its subcommittee on trade, has not been charged with any crime. And he has denied any wrongdoing in a case that alleges he offered to bribe a Nigerian official and accepted kickbacks to help a U.S. telecommunications company land deals there and in Ghana.

But the general sentiments among friends and supporters have been disbelief and denial.

"No one expected him to be involved in a scandal of this proportion," said John Maginnis, a political analyst and independent journalist who publishes the Louisiana Political Fax Weekly.

The 59-year-old Jefferson, a tall, lean man — low-key, soft-spoken and a dapper dresser — has had a primarily scandal-free career.

Analysts believe his rise from privation to power has helped defuse the outrage that might have ignited if he were someone else.

Raised in rural northeastern Louisiana to parents who didn't graduate from high school, Jefferson still managed to excel. The crowning moment of his career came in 1991, when he became the first African American elected to Congress from Louisiana since Reconstruction. Along the way, Jefferson raised five daughters — three of them also Harvard Law School graduates, one of whom is a Louisiana state representative.

"I think people don't want to believe that he's gone wrong," said Wayne Parent, a political analyst at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. "Until now, he never really caused a lot of controversy, and that's why reaction has been as slow as it has been. I don't think people in Louisiana want to hear this."

As a child, Jefferson attended the East Carroll Training School for the Colored. He went on to Southern University A&M College — considered a flagship of Louisiana's African American university system, which includes Dillard and Xavier in New Orleans — and then to Harvard Law, before earning a master of laws in taxation from Georgetown in 1996.

"He had tremendous confidence in his ability to do well," said New Orleans attorney Trevor Bryan, a longtime friend and former law firm partner of Jefferson, who in the 1970s founded Jefferson, Bryan and Gray (now Bryan and Jupiter), which became the largest predominantly African American firm in the South. "He did good in his courses. He was always hardworking, almost a workaholic."

Though a competent legal practitioner, politics was always Jefferson's passion, friends said.

"He's a smart guy, a guy who started with the idea of trying to get blacks involved in politics," said New Orleans attorney Walter Wilkerson, who ran Jefferson's campaign for the state Senate. "He was committed to improving conditions for blacks. The results have been mixed … but before this incident, he was roundly applauded."

DOJ_NMG_0029700

"What is surprising is that he's been devoted to political life and not to financial success," Bryan said. "He had a lot of opportunity at various stages to make a lot of money. He gave up a good salary to go to Congress. His major goal was public service."

But critics say the alleged evidence — the videotape and the money supposedly found in Jefferson's freezer — is too damning to be ignored.

"We think the behavior is not fitting for a member of Congress, and that it's time for him to step down," said David Donnelly, national campaigns director for the Public Campaign Action Fund, a Washington-based nonprofit, nonpartisan watchdog organization. The group has launched a petition calling for Jefferson's resignation.

In an editorial Thursday, the Times-Picayune called on Jefferson to immediately announce that he would not run for reelection. "The congressman is entitled to the presumption of innocence and to his day in court. He is not entitled to inflict more pain upon an already traumatized district," the newspaper said.

A composed and stoic Jefferson has continued to insist that he is still effective, and his director of communications, Melanie Roussell, said he was continuing his job, business as usual.

Since Katrina, Jefferson has introduced legislation that would allow eligible homeowners to temporarily defer mortgage payments; secured disaster recovery grants for local universities; co-sponsored a bill designed to rebuild the healthcare infrastructure in hurricane-damaged areas; and co-authored legislation that provides major tax incentives to business development in the Gulf Coast region.

In the Uptown neighborhood, where Jefferson has a house on a street defined by stately wooden frame homes with white-painted pillars, neighbors said the congressman and his family were usually visible and accessible.

"He seemed to be a decent guy," said Uptown resident John Ritchie, who said he had met Jefferson on many occasions and voted for him.

"I personally liked the man. After Katrina, we need him in the House Ways and Means Committee. It's a blow, not just for the city but the whole state. We need more positive things down here right now to get on our feet."

Ritchie said he was willing to "wait and see" what comes out of the investigation because "there are two sides to every story.... Everybody deserves a fair shot."

"I always voted for him because I liked the way he voted in Congress," said Michelle Breaux, another neighborhood resident. "But it's very disgusting what he's been doing. I've met his daughters. They're intelligent, well-educated. They can look after themselves. They don't need Daddy's help."

The FBI affidavit said Jefferson channeled the bribery money into a company owned by his wife and daughters.

Jefferson has denied the charge, but some neighbors said they were not surprised by the alleged indiscretions. Many recounted news reports that Jefferson had diverted National Guard troops from their duties at the height of the rescue efforts after Hurricane Katrina to take him to his house to retrieve some belongings. Jefferson has said the troops insisted on accompanying him because of alleged sniper fire in the area.

"I just never really trusted him," said Joe Kopfler, 59, as he sat on a step in front of his home, around the block from Jefferson's. "He always seemed like his morality wouldn't be of a high standard."

Other residents dismissed the scandal as another corrupt Louisiana politician. In the last decade, Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and numerous local officials convicted of corruption. Investigators are currently looking at the administration of former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial; and Jefferson's brother-in-law, Judge Alan Green, is serving time for mail fraud.

"It's kind of so common around here ... money changing hands in brown paper bags," said doctoral student Vico Marziale, 29, as he nursed a beer at Fat Harry's. "We suspect all the politicians around here. It's become a joke. You know, like ... 'We've got another one.' "

G-Men Vs. Members Of The House (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029701

IT IS OUTRAGEOUS ENOUGH that both the speaker and the minority leader have complained about a lawful FBI search of the offices of a fellow House member. It's even more outrageous that the president is now trying to placate them by announcing that records seized in the search will be off-limits to investigators for 45 days.

A Kentucky businessman has pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to the family of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) in exchange for his assistance with business ventures in Nigeria. Jefferson denies any wrongdoing. On Saturday night, FBI agents, armed with a warrant, searched Jefferson's offices in the Rayburn House Office Building.

The search provoked a display of righteous indignation from Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who accused the Justice Department of the constitutional equivalent of desecrating a church. Joined by Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the speaker invoked the doctrine of separation of powers and demanded that the records be returned. This is the sort of bipartisanship the country can do without.

Like Willie Sutton, who said he robbed banks because that's where the money was, the FBI searched Jefferson's offices because that's where he kept his records. This wasn't a case of jackbooted thugs from the executive branch rifling willy-nilly through congressional files in search of embarrassing information. Unlike Sutton, the agents who searched Jefferson's office were acting lawfully and within the requirements of the 4th Amendment.

The speaker and minority leader make the argument that the search ran afoul of the Constitution's "speech and debate" clause, which says in part that members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same." Nothing in this language creates a legal force field around Capitol Hill that federal agents with a lawful warrant may not penetrate.

That makes President Bush's actions on Thursday even more indefensible than Hastert's and Pelosi's. Bush said his order would allow time "to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a co-equal branch of government."

Although the president is the head of the executive branch, he shouldn't second-guess the conduct of a criminal investigation because of meritless complaints from Capitol Hill. The sooner this "seal" is broken, the better.

One Man's Constitutional Crisis ... (NYT)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Republicans and Democrats in the House of Representatives have achieved an almost unprecedented level of bipartisanship in denouncing the F.B.I.'s search of a congressman's office. They talk angrily about the separation of powers and the implications of having an executive branch agency make a foray into a lawmaker's official space. Our first question is where all these concerned constitutionalists have been for the last five years.

Time and time again, Congress has played dead when the executive branch refused to provide it with information, answer questions or follow laws that the legislative branch has passed. Currently, the Senate Judiciary Committee, which has not been the worst offender, is tinkering dangerously with the laws covering domestic wiretapping by the National Security Agency. It could end up endorsing a program that the White House won't even fully describe to a vast majority of lawmakers.

Compared with the enormous issues at hand, the matter of Representative William Jefferson is small potatoes. The F.B.I. says that it videotaped the congressman accepting $100,000 to grease the way for some business deals in Africa, and that agents found most of the money in his freezer. The Justice Department obtained a warrant, entered Mr. Jefferson's office and removed files that it says are related to that investigation.

Mr. Jefferson says there are two sides to every story, although he has not yet offered his. That does not make him guilty — indeed, he is yet to be charged. The House leaders demanded that the seized documents be returned, and the White House ordered them sealed for 45 days to buy time.

The F.B.I. is going to have to show some very good reasons for having precipitated this showdown. Federal investigators have managed to prosecute many other officials for corruption over the last 200-odd years without ever barging into Congressional offices in the process. The danger of abuse with this kind of activity is enormous, especially with a president and an attorney general whose grasp for power seems to have no limits. They cannot be trusted to keep legitimate police activity from turning into political persecution. Just yesterday, administration officials were talking about having the F.B.I. interrogate lawmakers in an attempt to find the sources of the Times article disclosing Mr. Bush's domestic spying operation. That would certainly represent a major breach of the separation of powers principle.

DOJ_NMG_0029702

The constitutional claims made by the Congressional leadership on the Jefferson case seem overblown. House and Senate members are protected from arrest while going about their official business to shield them from intimidation and meddling by the executive branch in the affairs of state, not to deter law enforcement officials from doing their lawful duty to investigate possible felonies.

But members of Congress who have been politically comatose or complicit as the Bush administration built itself an imperial presidency, immune from the historical powers of the legislative branch, are up in arms. The House Judiciary Committee, which has been in the forefront of the long-running cave-in, has scheduled a hearing that the chairman has titled "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

It seems like a phony approach to a real problem.

Lawmakers, Quiet On Your Rights, Roar About Theirs (USAT)

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Now we know what it takes to make Congress mad enough to stand up for constitutional rights.

When the government snoops on your phone calls and records without warrants, lawmakers barely kick up a fuss. But when the target is a fellow congressman — one under investigation for taking a bribe, no less — they're ready to rumble.

Witness the bipartisan frenzy set off after the FBI searched the Capitol Hill offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., on Saturday. The FBI had a court order. According to an FBI affidavit, he was videotaped taking $100,000 in cash from an investor working undercover for the FBI. Agents found $90,000 of it stuffed in his freezer at home, the affidavit said.

Never mind all that. Leaders of the House of Representatives are appalled. They say the search violated the Constitution's separation of powers, "designed to protect the Congress and the American people from abuse of power."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who rarely agree on anything, demanded that the Justice Department return the "unconstitutionally seized" documents. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the episode raised "profoundly disturbing" questions. He set a hearing for Tuesday to ask: "Did the Saturday night raid of Congress trample the Constitution?"

If only those leaders were as profoundly disturbed about executive branch incursions on the rights of average citizens. You certainly have to wonder where they've been for the past several years while the Bush administration ran roughshod over the legislative branch and launched anti-terror programs of questionable legality.

Last December, The New York Times revealed that the National Security Agency (NSA) was wiretapping international phone calls without court warrants. Hastert didn't make a peep. Pelosi and other Democrats loudly protested, but nothing came of it. As it turns out, Pelosi was part of a tiny leadership group that had been briefed on the program since October 2001.

The scenario repeated itself this month when USA TODAY revealed that the NSA has collected millions of phone records.

So now the leadership swings into action because the FBI searched a Capitol Hill office for evidence of criminal activity?

This is not to belittle the separation of powers doctrine. It's meant to prevent a president from using investigations and unwarranted searches to intimidate lawmakers in their official duties. The Justice Department might have minimized the outcry by managing the search with more deference to congressional sensitivities. But there's no evidence that the Jefferson raid was an abuse of power.

A more appropriate response from congressional leaders would have been remorse over their failure to do anything meaningful to make members act ethically. Hastert, for instance, replaced a House ethics committee chairman last year after he attempted to enforce some rules. Congressional offices, obviously, should not be sanctuaries for crime, but the outcry from Capitol Hill brought quick action. On Thursday, President Bush ordered the documents seized in Jefferson's office to be "sealed" from the investigators' view for 45 days, while the Justice Department and Congress settle their differences.

What a pity that Congress' leaders haven't used their clout to protect the public's rights as eagerly as they defend their own.

Editorial: Raid Reverberations / Distrust Shadows FBI In Visit To Congress (PPG)

DOJ_NMG_0029703

Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, May 26, 2006

The unprecedented Federal Bureau of Investigation raid Saturday night and Sunday on the congressional office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, has prompted outrage on both the Republican and Democratic sides of the aisle in Congress.

The issue is complicated. On the one hand, sending the FBI in to search the office of a member of Congress is an example of the jackbooted approach of the administration of President Bush to the legislative branch of what is supposed to be constitutionally based, three-branch American government. The raid was consistent with the administration policy of surveillance by the National Security Agency of Americans' phone calls and e-mails: disregard of the legal requirement to obtain an order from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court before instituting bugging, and failure to keep the Congress informed on the subject.

By no stretch of the imagination could the FBI raid on Mr. Jefferson's office be considered to be a national security matter either.

On the other hand, it is hard to be sympathetic to Mr. Jefferson. There is an argument that the case against him, the $90,000 in cold cash found stashed in his freezer at home, led naturally to a presumption on the part of the FBI that a stop of an icy love train in the congressman's office might provide further relevant evidence. Or, suppose that a murder had occurred in a congressional office. Could anyone argue that police should not be admitted there to gather evidence?

But both the Republicans, in the form of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, and the Democrats in the form of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, have hit the roof. Their argument is based soundly on the Constitution, the concept that Congress cannot play its appropriate role in American government if representatives of the executive branch can go unbidden into their offices to search and scoop up documents and computer-stored information at will.

A more skeptical approach to the issue would attribute members' indignation at the search of Mr. Jefferson's office to concern at what would be found if their own offices were searched.

Overall, we see the Sunday raid as the wrong thing for the FBI or any other body of the federal government to do. At the very least, representatives of the legislative branch of government should have been present for the search, to assure that the FBI limited itself to collecting evidence of crime. Given the Bush administration's general approach to the rule of law, embodied in various pronouncements of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, there is otherwise no guarantee of respect of separation of powers, the critical line between executive and legislative that is essential to our form of government that was crossed so sharply Saturday night and Sunday in the Rayburn House Office Building.

FBI Raid Galvanizes Congress On Rights (SCRIPPS)

By An Editorial / By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, May 26, 2006

From the standpoint of public sympathy, the House couldn't have chosen a worse time to stand on constitutional principle. The voters surely do not share the House members' outrage at a weekend FBI raid of a congressional office in connection with a spreading influence-peddling investigation that has tarred the whole institution.

Indeed, after ABC reported that GOP House Speaker Dennis Hastert might get caught up in that probe, Hastert accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him because he so vehemently objected to the raid. This was fine irony coming from a legislator who couldn't do enough to broaden the department's powers through the Patriot Act and its renewal.

What happened was that the FBI, armed with a warrant signed by the chief judge of the U.S. district court, searched the offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., and hauled away two cartons of documents and copies of hard drives. Jefferson is hardly a sympathetic figure on whom to make a constitutional case. The FBI already has videotape of him allegedly accepting a $100,000 bribes and agents confiscated $90,000 in cold cash hidden in the freezer of his Washington apartment.

Hastert and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, a pairing many though impossible, denounced the executive branch's action as a violation of separation of powers, the speech and debate clause of the Constitution, and "the practice of the last 219 years." And they demanded the immediate return of Jefferson's documents. Moreover, the Republican-run body that was markedly incurious about the Bush administration's stewardship of the laws is now planning hearings under the overwrought title, "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

DOJ_NMG_0029704

It says something about the state of relations between the administration and Congress that the Justice Department and White House seemed stunned by the strenuous reaction. After all, they had trampled over Congress' prerogatives before with no discernible reaction.

The two leaders are on shaky constitutional ground, legal scholars say. The Constitution makes an exception to lawmakers' legal immunity for felonies and nothing in that document says Capitol Hill should be a sanctuary for committing them. However, historians could find no precedent for a warrant and search of a congressional office.

Still, there is a serious issue of government to be addressed. The potential for Soviet-style intimidation is clear. Members of Congress must be confident that they are free from politically motivated reprisals from the executive branch and, at the same time, the Justice Department must be free to conduct legitimate investigations into unlawful conduct.

The raid did have one beneficial effect. The House is finally paying attention to due process and civil liberties.

Opinion In Our View: Above The Law Congress Rallies Against Barbarians At The Gates (TEXGAZ)

Texarkana (TX) Gazette, May 26, 2006

Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert has chosen to weigh in on the side of embattled U.S. Rep. William Jefferson.

The Louisiana Democrat's office was raided Saturday by FBI agents, who seized documents and other items looking for evidence implicating Jefferson in a bribery scandal.

Jefferson maintains his innocence in the investigation and vows to fight on.

Now Hastert, as well as other lawmakers, want the FBI to return the seized material and Hastert even says the FBI agents who conducted the raid should be barred from further participation in the probe.

The reason? They claim a lawmaker's office is protected by the Constitution under the separation of powers and the the raid was an illegal action by the Executive branch—the Justice Department under the attorney general—against the Legislative Branch.

It was the first time a House member's office was raided in our nation's history. Officials in the Justice Department said the raid on Jefferson's office was necessary after he refused to comply with a subpoena for documents last summer. Jefferson disclosed receiving the subpoena to the House on Sept. 15, 2005.

Basically, the august members of Congress figure they are entitled to the equivalent of diplomatic immunity while on Capitol Hill.

This imperial attitude has no real foundation. Lawmakers may be used to deferential treatment and exceptional courtesy—and even expect law enforcement to look the other way from time to time—but they are not above the law and their offices are not akin to church sanctuary.

In fact, their offices are not even theirs. They belong to the people of the United States, many of whom are getting fed up with the pervasive attitude of near-royal entitlement among Washington insiders.

This was not political intimidation, which is what the Constitution was guarding against with the separation of powers, but a valid criminal investigation.

Hastert has complained to the president, and the White House says it is taking the Legislative Branch's complaints most seriously.

Hastert has complained to the president, and the White House says it is taking the Legislative Branch's complaints most seriously.

But the dispute between these two branches of government will almost certainly be decided down the road by the third, the Judicial Branch and the Supreme Court.

Hastert Lashes Out At Justice Dept. (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, May 25, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert accused the Justice Department Thursday of trying to intimidate him in retaliation for criticizing the FBI's weekend raid on a congressman's office, escalating a searing battle between the executive and legislative branches of government.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people," Hastert said on WGN radio Thursday morning. "We're just not going to be intimidated on it."

Asked later Thursday whether he thought he Justice Department retaliated against him with the leak, Hastert replied: "All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect any dots they want to."

"I thought it was an interesting sequence of events," he added.

The Illinois Republican, in his interview with the Chicago radio station, was responding to an ABC News report that quoted an unnamed law enforcement source as saying that he was "in the mix" of the Justice Department's investigation into influence peddling by convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"We are not going to dignify or speculate about the motives of anonymous sources providing inaccurate information," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

Within minutes of that report late Wednesday, the department issued the first of two denials that it was investigating Hastert. The speaker demanded a retraction from ABC News, which stood by its story. Hastert on Thursday threatened to sue the network and reporters and executives for libel and defamation.

"We will take any and all actions necessary to rectify the harm ABC has caused and to hold those at ABC responsible for their conduct," wrote Hastert's counsels, J. Randolph Evans and Stefan C. Passantino. The letter was addressed to network President David Westin and reporter Brian Ross.

"Our response to the letter is our reporting on the story," said ABC News Vice President Jeffrey Schneider.

Correspondent Brian Ross stood by his report, saying he has checked with his sources who say the story accurately represents the facts "as they know them."

"There's enough there for them (the FBI) to take a look at the speaker" and other members of Congress, Ross said in an interview.

Hastert aimed his broadsides at the Justice Department amid a swirl of recriminations on Capitol Hill, including warnings by some lawmakers of a voter backlash against members of Congress "trying to protect their own."

Hastert's aides, at the same time, were in talks with the White House about the possible transfer of material seized by the FBI during its weekend raid of the office of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), perhaps to the House ethics committee, according to several Republican officials.

A federal law enforcement official said no computers were taken during the search. Instead, "mirror images" were made of the contents of some computers in Jefferson's office, the official said on condition of anonymity because the items taken during the search remain under court seal

The goals of any transfer, they said, would be to deny the documents both to prosecutors and to Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat ensnared in a bribery investigation, until the legal issues surrounding the weekend search of his office are resolved. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the confidential nature of the discussions.

Historians said it was the first such search of a congressman's quarters in the more than two centuries since the first Congress convened.

The White House continued to try to keep its distance publicly, saying it acknowledged "the constitutional concerns" expressed.

The House Judiciary Committee chairman, GOP Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, announced a hearing next week, "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

The Associated Press reported last November that Hastert for two years did not disclose his use of Abramoff's restaurant for a fundraiser just two weeks before he asked the Interior Department in a letter to reject a Louisiana Indian tribe's application for a casino license.

At the time, Abramoff was representing another tribe that opposed the casino. Hastert, who collected a total of $100,000 from Abramoff's and his tribal clients, blamed a paperwork oversight, filed the required disclosure and paid for the use of the restaurant.

Hastert, Justice Dept. Dispute Inquiry Story (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

ABC News says federal investigators have put House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "in the mix" of their corruption probe centering on convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty says the ABC report involving Hastert -- even the "in the mix" language -- is "untrue."

And Hastert, calling the story "absolutely" wrong, is demanding a retraction.

Who's right?

It is highly unusual for the Justice Department to confirm or deny that someone is under investigation. Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that federal guidelines allow such statements in cases receiving "substantial publicity" and that the decision was based on the guidelines "combined with the inaccuracy of the information."

On "World News Tonight" Wednesday, Brian Ross, ABC's chief investigative correspondent, said the bribery probe "now includes" Hastert but cautioned that the investigation is "clearly at the very beginning. The allegations could well prove unfounded." George Stephanopoulos, the network's chief Washington correspondent, called the implications "potentially seismic."

Ross said in an interview: "I think our story is accurate. We've gone back to our sources, and they believe what we reported was accurate as they knew it. There seems to be some disconnect between what the congressman thinks, what the Justice Department thinks and what the FBI thinks. . . . There may be a semantics issue here as to what constitutes being under investigation."

Reporters for NBC, CBS, CNN, Fox News and other news organizations checked out ABC's report but were waved off by law enforcement officials. "Within 15 minutes, we had three or four basic denials saying in effect this was a complete overreach, and we chose not to run it," said John Reiss, executive producer of "NBC Nightly News."

The dispute with ABC comes as the news business has been beset by declining public confidence, several high-profile media mistakes and leak investigations by the Bush administration aimed at pressuring journalists into revealing confidential sources. Ross recently reported -- again based on unidentified sources -- that federal leak investigators are tracking his calls and those of other journalists.

Hastert told Chicago radio station WGN yesterday that the information was leaked to "intimidate" him after his criticism of an FBI raid on the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) as a violation of the separation-of-powers doctrine.

In asking for a retraction, two Hastert attorneys told ABC News President David Westin in a letter that for the network to repeat the "false" statement on its Web site after the Justice Department's denial "constitutes libel and defamation" and reflects a "malicious intent" to damage Hastert's reputation.

As was reported last year, Hastert was among four House Republican leaders who signed a 2003 letter to then-Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton in an effort to block an Indian casino opposed by tribes represented by Abramoff. Shortly before the letter was sent, Abramoff hosted a fundraiser for Hastert's political action committee. In January, the speaker said he would give to charity the donations, estimated at $69,000, that he received from Abramoff and Abramoff's clients.

Several dozen members of Congress -- some at the urging of Abramoff's team of lobbyists -- wrote letters asking Norton not to allow tribes to establish casinos on off-reservation sites. Legal experts have said that campaign contributions alone, even if closely timed to a lawmaker's action, are not likely to become a focus for investigators in the Abramoff case.

Ross said yesterday the Hastert inquiry he described "could wash out and be nothing." Asked if the alleged inquiry should have been the top story on "World News Tonight," Ross said: "Questions are being raised about the speaker of the House -- that's worthy of a lead story."

Novak Told Rove He Wouldn't Identify Him, Person Familiar Says (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- Syndicated columnist Robert Novak assured presidential adviser Karl Rove that he wouldn't identify him to prosecutors investigating the disclosure of a CIA agent's name, a person familiar with the matter said.

Rove told a grand jury that Novak called him shortly after the Central Intelligence Agency asked the Justice Department to investigate who leaked the name of operative Valerie Plame to Novak and other reporters, the person, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said. Novak revealed Plame's name in a July 14, 2003, column, citing unnamed administration officials.

The National Journal, which reported earlier today on the Sept. 29, 2003, conversation between Rove and Novak, said Justice Department prosecutors were concerned that Rove and Novak may have been working on a cover story to protect Rove. The report, citing people familiar with the grand jury testimony of both men, said then-Attorney General John Ashcroft was briefed on the matter.

Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, said the White House deputy chief of staff didn't conspire to hide information.

``Karl has never urged anyone to testify falsely or withhold information from the grand jury, and no one has ever suggested to him that they would, or that they intended to," Luskin said in a telephone interview. ``The special counsel has never suggested there is any evidence to support such an allegation."

Calls to Ashcroft and James Hamilton, Novak's attorney, weren't immediately returned. Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the special counsel, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald, said he wouldn't comment.

Prosecutor

Fitzgerald took over the investigation in December 2003 to learn whether anyone in President George W. Bush's administration violated a 1982 law designed to protect the identity of covert agents. Plame's name was disclosed after her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the war in Iraq and questioned whether the administration twisted intelligence to justify the invasion.

While no one has been charged with purposely unmasking a covert agent, I. Lewis Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, was indicted last October on perjury and obstruction of justice charges for allegedly lying about his conversations with reporters about Plame.

Rove has testified five times before federal grand juries hearing evidence in the case, and persons close to the investigation have said that Fitzgerald is still considering whether to indict Rove on a perjury charge for initially failing to disclose a conversation he had about Plame with Time Magazine reporter Matt Cooper.

The person familiar with Rove's grand jury testimony said Rove told the panel that during his phone call with Novak, Novak told him that he wouldn't hurt Rove before the grand jury. Rove also told the panel that Novak assured him that he would never reveal an unnamed source, the person familiar with Rove's testimony said.

Fitzgerald has said in court filings that evidence in the Libby case suggests ``a plan to discredit, punish or seek revenge against Mr. Wilson."

City Hall Hiring Testimony: Interviews Were Shams (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

Applicants for city jobs waited by the hundreds in a South Side auditorium for meaningless interviews that had no bearing on who ultimately was hired, a former Streets and Sanitation Department official testified Thursday.

Jack Drumgould, the department's personnel director from 1998 to 2004, told jurors that Mayor Richard Daley's office dictated who would be hired for 95 percent of blue-collar, union jobs in Streets and Sanitation.

Testifying under a grant of immunity in the City Hall corruption trial, Drumgould said he took orders from defendants Robert Sorich and Timothy McCarthy in a secret effort to circumvent a federal court order prohibiting political-based hiring for such jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0029708

Sorich and McCarthy were top aides in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, where prosecutors charge they rigged the city's personnel process to select favored applicants, including many pro-Daley political workers. Former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery also are on trial for allegedly participating in the scheme.

Prosecutors hope Drumgould's testimony backs up the argument they made in opening statements—that job applicants who lacked clout were victims of the alleged hiring fraud.

Drumgould testified Thursday that Sorich or McCarthy would provide him with lists of job winners before interviews were ever held.

Nevertheless, eligible applicants for positions such as truck drivers and laborers were summoned to the former Board of Education building at 1819 W. Pershing Rd., he said.

When the city was hiring truck drivers in 2004, more than 400 people applied for about 50 openings. The starting wage was $25.90 an hour.

Drumgould described a process that served as a facade for a merit hiring system.

The applicants filled out forms, then waited to undergo two brief interviews, he said. Interviewers were provided a set of questions that related to applicants' experience as truck drivers and history of traffic accidents.

"Did you believe it was important to get answers to these kinds of questions?" Assistant U.S. Atty. Julie Ruder asked.

"No, it would not be relevant to who was selected," Drumgould responded.

Drumgould said Slattery assisted him in falsifying ratings forms for applicants months after the interviews took place. The forms were fixed to ensure that the people endorsed by Sorich or McCarthy received the highest scores, Drumgould testified.

He said Sullivan selected interviewers and once had a friend hired as the $50,000-a-year director of a garbage cart program.

Drumgould also implicated other former city employees in the alleged scheme. He testified that he took the names of preselected job winners to department supervisors such as Steven Bylina, who was a deputy commissioner of the city's Bureau of Forestry.

Bylina, general superintendent of the Cook County Forest Preserve District, is not charged in the alleged scheme. Through a spokesman, he declined to comment Thursday.

Sullivan's lawyer, Cynthia Giacchetti, challenged Drumgould's credibility on cross-examination.

She suggested that Drumgould had agreed to cooperate with authorities to spare himself from indictment and retain his $6,000-a-month pension. Giacchetti asked whether Drumgould was telling the truth.

"You haven't done that in your testimony—have you sir?" Giacchetti said.

"Yes, I have," said Drumgould, arms crossed tightly.

Drumgould earlier testified that a tree trimmer was promoted in 2001 over applicants with more experience. Drumgould said then-Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez, a Hispanic Democratic Organization leader, had mentioned to him that the tree trimmer was an organization member.

Drumgould said the fix was in again when Sorich allegedly told him to guarantee the promotion of Jack Bataoel from truck driver foreman to general foreman in 2001. Although another foreman had greater seniority than Bataoel, Drumgould said, he, Slattery and another Streets and Sanitation official conducted sham interviews and filled out ratings forms to make sure that Bataoel was ranked highest.

But Giacchetti said on cross-examination that Bataoel had 2½ years of experience as an acting general foreman before being promoted to that job.

Bataoel was a precinct captain for 25 years in Ald. Richard Mell's 33rd Ward Democratic Organization. Mell declined to comment Thursday.

Bataoel, who has retired from the city, told the Tribune last year that he was "more than qualified" for his promotion.

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

rrbush@tribune.com

Daley Could Be Called To Testify (CHIST)

By Steve Warmbir And Natasha Korecki, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, May 26, 2006

Mayor Daley could be called as a witness in the ongoing trial of four former city employees accused of routinely ordering the hiring or promotion of people based on politics, a lawyer for one of the defendants indicated Wednesday

The attorney for Robert Sorich opened the door to that possibility during a sidebar in the federal court trial, a transcript released late Wednesday revealed.

As the Chicago Sun-Times reported May 8, Daley has given a sworn statement saying he didn't know about rigged hiring schemes going on in his administration.

"One of my assumptions is the mayor's testimony that he didn't believe that there was anything improper at the time, and he was not aware that there was anything improper going on. He's already testified under oath to that," Sorich defense lawyer Tom Durkin told U.S. District Judge David Coar on Wednesday in a private discussion. "It's my representation that the mayor's testified to that, and I'll give you the transcript."

When Coar asked whether the mayor would come in and testify, Durkin left the door open.

"I can't represent that he's going to come in because I don't know whether he is or he isn't," Durkin replied.

The hiring scandal has ensnared four people, including Sorich, who worked in Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. The trial just entered its second week.

Daley has refused to give more details on that earlier interview and has withheld public comment on the Sorich trial. At the time of the interview, however, FBI Special Agent in Charge Robert Grant told the Sun-Times that Daley was asked why "certain areas of the government appeared to be rewarded with jobs," and, "How much involvement did he have to those activities that happened so close to his office?"

Also Wednesday, testimony tied one of Daley's top political advisers, Jeremiah Joyce, and the man likely to be the next Cook County sheriff, Thomas Dart, in to the alleged City Hall hiring scheme.

'You didn't even apply'

On the witness stand Wednesday was Luke Somerville, a city worker from Joyce's political base in the 19th Ward who admitted getting promotions at his city job after doing political volunteer work.

Somerville said that after working in the 1995 mayoral election for Daley, he asked for promotions or shift changes for himself, his brother and a friend. He gave the request to the man he worked for during the election, Kevin Joyce, the son of Jeremiah Joyce and now a state representative.

Kevin Joyce told Somerville that Joyce "had to give the list to his father to see if they'd be approved." Soon after, Somerville learned he would be getting the promotion.

The only problem was that when he checked the city list of people to be interviewed, he wasn't on it. He was told he needed to send in an application. A city personnel director told him, "You didn't even apply for a job you were supposed to get," Somerville recalled on the stand.

Somerville said he eventually got the job, and his two other requests were filled, too. On Wednesday, Jeremiah Joyce in an interview blasted Somerville as a liar.

On the witness stand, Somerville explained how he turned to his childhood friend, Thomas Dart, to help him get another city job promotion. Dart is the chief of staff for Cook County Sheriff Michael Sheahan and the Democratic nominee to replace Sheahan, who is retiring. Dart eventually told Somerville to call Sorich directly because Dart was tired of making the calls himself, Somerville testified.

House Panel Backs Internet Gambling Limits (AP)

By Erica Werner, The Associated Press

AP, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — A House panel approved legislation Thursday to crack down on the $12 billion Internet gambling industry by applying federal prohibitions to games like online poker, blackjack and roulette.

DOJ_NMG_0029710

The bill by Rep. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., would update the 1961 Federal Wire Wager Act to apply to online gambling. It also would outlaw electronic transmission of funds to pay for gambling bets and give law enforcement agencies authority to block such money transfers.

Internet gambling already is mostly illegal in the United States, and most of as many as 2,300 gambling sites in existence are overseas.

The bill approved by the Judiciary Committee would "prevent offshore fly-by-night gambling businesses from violating the laws of all states," Goodlatte said.

"This legislation is badly needed," he said, adding spending on the sites has skyrocketed.

But half of the $12 billion spent on online gambling is thought to come from U.S. bettors and some companies in this country want to get in on the action. The American Gaming Association, the industry's largest lobby, has opposed online gambling in the past but last month backed a study of the feasibility of legalizing it.

Nevada's House members introduced a bill this week calling for such a study.

A previous attempt by Goodlatte to get his anti-online gambling bill through Congress failed after aggressive opposition by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Goodlatte alluded to that during heated debate in the Judiciary Committee on Thursday.

"This was the poison pill that was supported by Jack Abramoff five years ago — don't support it today," he shouted as Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., sought to attach an amendment related to horse racing.

Wexler didn't comment on the Abramoff reference and his amendment failed.

"Unfortunately the gentleman just mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia had some involvement in this issue before," remarked Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah. Abramoff is now under indictment. Abramoff has pleaded guilty in a Justice Department corruption probe.

Goodlatte's bill passed 25-11.

House Committee Approves Limits On Online Gambling (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- The House Judiciary Committee approved legislation to toughen U.S. laws against Internet gambling, clearing the way for consideration by the full House of Representatives.

The committee voted 25-11 to approve the Internet Gambling Prohibition Act sponsored by Representative Bob Goodlatte, a Virginia Republican, and prepared to support a second measure, the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, sponsored by Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican.

``I oppose gambling because I think it causes many, many problems in our society," Goodlatte said at today's committee meeting.

The Bush administration Justice Department supports the proposed legislation. Online gambling's legal status in the U.S. is unclear. The Justice Department interprets a 1961 law against using telephone lines to place interstate bets as banning online gambling. Goodlatte said his bill would make that explicit.

Gambling on the Internet is a $12 billion-a-year business that is growing rapidly offshore. Internet-based casinos such as PartyGaming Plc and 888 Holdings Plc, operating in locations such as Gibraltar and Antigua, rake in billions from U.S. gamblers.

Shares of Internet gambling companies declined in London trading after the U.S. vote. 888 Holdings Plc, the world's biggest Web casino operator, fell 5 pence to 193.5 pence. Sportingbet Plc, the online bookmaker that owns Paradise Poker, slipped 16.25 pence to 367.5 pence.

Shutting Down Sites

The Goodlatte measure would force U.S. financial institutions to cooperate with federal law enforcement authorities in shutting down illegal gambling sites based outside the U.S. The measure exempts horse racing, fantasy-sports betting and state lotteries in the U.S.

By carving out an exception for horse racing, the bill hurts dog racing and jalai, Representative Robert Wexler, a Florida Democrat, said. The Judiciary Committee, controlled by Republicans, rejected proposed amendments calling for specific state regulation and for adopting criminal penalties for bettors of fines and up to two years in prison.

Leach's measure would make it unlawful for credit-card companies to collect payments for transactions with online-gaming sites.

The anti-gambling legislation is likely to pass the full House where some Republican lawmakers are uneasy about the damage done by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea on corruption charges. Abramoff helped block similar legislation in the past.

``We are anxious to have the opportunity to expunge that smear," Goodlatte said.

Senate Battle

The House legislation may face an uphill battle in the Senate. Some states, including Nevada, are seeking to legalize, regulate and tax online gambling, the fastest-growing segment of the industry.

Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who has proposed a measure seeking to block financial transactions, said he wants to press for approval. ``I am going to wait and see how the House deals with it," Kyl said yesterday.

Frank Fahrenkopf, president of the American Gaming Association, said through a spokeswoman that his group, the Washington lobbying arm for Las Vegas-based casinos, is ``neutral" on the Goodlatte and Leach measures.

The association is asking Congress to fund a federal commission that would study whether online gambling can be regulated and taxed in the U.S. That may eventually let major casino operators such as MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc. enter the online business.

Legalized gambling has grown dramatically in the U.S. over the past two decades. In 2005, commercial and Indian tribe casinos and horse-betting operations took in more than $52 billion in gross revenue nationwide, according to a Pew Research Center study citing industry estimates. Lotteries in 41 states sold $52 billion in tickets.

Elfvin Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend (BUFFNEWS)

By Dan Herbeck, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, May 26, 2006

Appeals court found problems with how judge handled Lewiston attorney's sentence

When U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin sentenced a suspended Lewiston attorney in a criminal tax case last year, the judge called the man a longtime friend and added, "It hurts me as much as it does you, Tim."

The words spoken by the judge in his courtroom last August have caused an appeals court to remove him from the case of Timothy J. Toohey.

Toohey, 59, pleaded guilty in February 2003 to underreporting his income by $1 million. Elfvin already has sentenced him three times - twice to probation, and then to 15 months in prison.

But every time, the Second Circuit Appeals Court found legal problems with Elfvin's handling of the case and ordered a resentencing.

Now, the appeals court has removed Elfvin from the case altogether, saying he should have recused himself because of his friendship with Toohey.

"As is obvious, it's quite a mess," Elfvin, 88, said in an interview with The Buffalo News on Wednesday. "It's probably a good idea to have another judge handle it."

A panel of appeals judges said remarks made by Elfvin in court last August revealed that his friendship with Toohey had caused him to be lenient on two previous occasions.

"Those first two sentences really go back to a lot of the relationship that you and I had when I was practicing law," Elfvin told Toohey, according to court records. "You were a great friend, a good guy. . . . I really bent over backwards on your behalf in that regard. That explains those two sentences."

After saying those words last August, Elfvin sentenced Toohey to 15 months in prison. Toohey's attorneys then appealed that sentencing, and Toohey has been out of prison while the appeal is pending.

The Toohey case has not yet been reassigned. The chief federal judge of Western New York, Richard J. Arcara, is expected to determine who will handle the case.

DOJ_NMG_0029712

This incident is the latest in a series of difficulties for Elfvin. The judge's supporters call him smart, independent and hard-working. Critics say he is prone to terrible lapses in judgment.

"I still enjoy [the job] and feel I can do it," Elfvin told The News. "Absolutely. Absolutely."

Controversy has surrounded the case of Toohey - who has long been active in Niagara County politics - for more than three years. The U.S. Justice Department protested after Elfvin sentenced Toohey to probation in May 2003 and again in July 2004. Prosecutors said probation was insufficient punishment for a $1 million tax crime. They said Elfvin failed to explain his legal reasons behind the sentences.

Advisory federal sentencing guidelines called for a prison term of 15 to 21 months for Toohey. According to prosecutors, Toohey's crime cost the government about $410,000 in tax collections.

The prosecutor in the case, William J. Gillmeister, has complained in the past that Toohey had received "unfair special treatment" from Elfvin. But this week, Gillmeister and U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn declined to comment on Elfvin's removal.

"The Second Circuit's ruling speaks for itself," Flynn said. "We're going to continue with this case in the courts and are not going to say anything beyond that."

One of the oldest judges ever to serve in Western New York, Elfvin is a senior, or semi-retired judge. If he chose to retire, he could collect his $165,200 salary as a pension, without doing any work.

Instead, he chooses to work nearly full-time, assisting Arcara and others with a large caseload.

The judge has continued working despite ailments and injuries, among them a spinal problem and two falls, including one last week that gave him a black eye and injured his ribs.

"I like to work. I guess I've always been that way," Elfvin said last year, as he celebrated his 30th anniversary on the federal bench. "It makes me feel good that I'm helping out with the workload."

But Elfvin also has a history of incidents that caused him some embarrassment.

In 1992, he reached an out-of-court settlement on a lawsuit filed by his former court stenographer, who accused him of tearing her blouse during a barroom argument. That year, he also received some unwanted national publicity when he took off on a Barbados vacation while his jury was deliberating on a huge case involving the Attica prison revolt.

More recently, he has been criticized several times by the U.S. Justice Department for ignoring the sentencing guidelines, which used to be mandatory but now are advisory. Many local lawyers agreed with Elfvin's stance on that issue.

One of those guidelines controversies involved Toohey. After a lengthy criminal investigation by the Internal Revenue Service, Toohey pleaded guilty in 2003 to a felony of making a false statement on an income tax return. Several prominent government officials wrote letters to Elfvin, asking for leniency for Toohey.

On Wednesday, Elfvin described Toohey as "a friend only in the practice of law." He said his remarks about his friendship with Toohey and the sympathy he feels toward Toohey were words he "only threw in as a side comment."

Toohey could not be reached to comment.

His attorney, Margaret A. Murphy, said this week that she is thankful that a new judge will be taking "a fresh look" at the case. But she insisted that Elfvin never showed favoritism toward Toohey in past rulings.

"I personally have never seen John Elfvin show favoritism, ever. He's the most independent judge on the federal bench," she y said.

Awaiting High Court Review Of Lethal Injection, Circuits Are Divided (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, May 26, 2006

A frustrated five-judge minority on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decried the "dysfunctional patchwork of stays and executions" in capital cases since January, when the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to explore a procedural attack on lethal injection.

Some 38 states use lethal injection out of the 39 that permit capital punishment. In all, courts around the country have granted nine stays of execution, but 15 condemned inmates have been executed during the same period that the lethal injection issue has been pending.

DOJ_NMG_0029713

"In some instances stays are granted, while others they are not, and the defendants are executed with no principled distinction to justify such a result," wrote Judge Boyce Martin Jr. last week. He dissented after the full 6th Circuit refused, by a 7-5 vote, to reconsider the request to stay the Tennessee execution of Sedley Alley in Alley v. Little, No. 06-6550.

Alley faced execution on May 17 for the 1985 rape and murder of a 19-year-old Marine corporal, Suzanne M. Collins, at Millington Naval Air Station near Memphis. Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen last week granted a 15-day stay of execution. Alley's case is the second to challenge the Tennessee chemical protocol used in executions. The other, Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen, No. 05-1036, was set for the high court's conference meeting one day after Alley's scheduled execution. Rahman's case raises a frontal attack on lethal injection.

Critics claim that the chemicals used in lethal injections do not properly anesthetize the subject, and thus cause unnecessary suffering before death.

AN UNNERVING SITUATION

The situation around the country is unnerving for defense lawyers where stays may be handed out in one circuit but denied in the circuit next door.

"The problem is we have no guidance from the court on how to defend our clients," said Kelley Henry, one of Alley's lawyers. "It is very discouraging when your client's life is on the line."

She said that the stay request is no different from ones granted in Missouri, North Carolina, Maryland and other states where the execution method is under attack.

The 6th circuit refused to issue a stay to Alley even though he raised the same issue in the same procedural posture as a high court case likely to be decided in less than a month, Hill v. McDonough, No. 05-8794. The question in Hill is not a direct challenge to lethal injection but a procedural one.

The case asks whether inmates may invoke a federal civil rights law, 42 U.S.C. 1983, to challenge the state's method of lethal injection. Without access to the civil rights claim, the court would have no jurisdiction to review the issue as a successive habeas appeal under a 1996 law in which Congress limited successive appeals.

Whether or not the high court decides a civil rights action is a proper vehicle for challenging lethal injection, it would not change Alley's situation, according to Chief Judge Danny J. Boggs, writing for the 6th Circuit majority. The Supreme Court has the authority to issue a nationwide stay of executions but it has not, Boggs pointed out.

The high court's consideration of a procedural matter such as Hill's "can not freeze in place all actions in the lower federal courts under existing law."

Even the Supreme Court has declined to issue stays in several cases raising nearly identical claims, he said.

"Given the Supreme Court's own pattern of conduct ... we cannot conclude that the Supreme Court has established any new precedent that would favor a stay of Alley's execution pending the outcome in Hill," he wrote.

The Hill case is the latest in a rising number of appeals over lethal injection from around the country.

On May 15, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals stayed an execution within hours of the deadline in a case that, like the others, raised lethal-injection challenges, but eight other condemned have been executed in the state this year, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington.

"I think the Supreme Court is going to have to take up the whole question of lethal injection eventually," he said.

In California, U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel set hearings for September to review that state's lethal-injection practices in the case of Michael Morales. New Jersey and Ohio courts have halted executions while lethal-injection procedures are reviewed. Delaware stayed an execution May 9 based on a challenge to state execution procedure. And a federal court in Missouri stayed an execution to allow a lethal-injection challenge more time.

"The death penalty is basically grinding to a halt, but that means in the meantime some people are executed and some are not," said Dieter.

Judge Criticizes Government's New Indictment In Gotti Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029714

(AP) - NEW YORK-The third racketeering trial of John "Junior" Gotti was postponed Thursday by a federal judge who suggested the government was trying to sneak references to murders into a rewritten indictment.

The judge said it seemed the government was trying to reword the indictment until it could find a combination that would result in a conviction.

Two cases against Gotti in the last year ended with hung juries after defense attorneys argued that the mob scion had quit the crime mob life in 1999.

"I'm really troubled," U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin said of the new Gotti indictment, which includes an allegation that Gotti promoted people within the Gambino crime family if they committed murders.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou said there was no specific new evidence he could immediately point to that would support the murder references in Gotti's racketeering indictment.

Scheindlin reset opening statements in the next trial by seven weeks, from July 5 to Aug. 28, so lawyers would have enough time to argue the issues.

Gotti lawyer Charles Carnesi said he would challenge the inclusion of language about murders, allegations that the judge had ordered removed before the first trial against Gotti.

"I think it's ridiculous that the government should be able to circumvent your rulings by rewriting the indictment," Carnesi said.

The judge agreed to a point, saying "it certainly reveals the problem with allowing a third trial."

The government also has alleged in a revised indictment brought this week that Gotti continued racketeering activities through this month by laundering money earned by the Gambino crime families with businesses he had created. They also alleged he tampered with a witness in another trial.

Carnesi said he would challenge the new allegations as well.

Gotti pleaded guilty in another racketeering case in 1999 and he has maintained that he left the mob life and never returned.

The government continues to allege that Gotti ordered two attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa in 1992 after the Guardian Angels founder criticized Gotti's father on his radio show. John Gotti died in prison in 2002, a decade after he was convicted of racketeering and sentenced to life in prison.

The government alleges that Gotti ordered a baseball bat beating of Sliwa and a kidnapping several weeks later that ended with Sliwa being shot three times before he dived out of a moving taxi. Sliwa recovered from the attack to resume his on-air Gotti criticisms. Gotti has denied ordering the attacks on Sliwa.

Sliwa, wearing his signature Guardian Angels outfit, watched Thursday as a spectator while Gotti entered a plea of not guilty to the rewritten indictment.

If convicted, Gotti faces 30 years in prison.

Prosecutors Fire Back At Wecht's Defense (PTR)

By David Conti, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, May 26, 2006

Federal prosecutors responded Thursday to allegations made by former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht's defense team that the district attorney and an FBI agent built a case against the renowned forensic pathologist based on politics and lies.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings asked U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab to dismiss Wecht's request to have evidence tossed out, calling the defense team's previous court filings a "journey down a road to a tangle of conspiracy theories."

"Defendant's motion to suppress, though 'full of sound and fury' ... lacks substance, and should be denied without further hearing," Stallings wrote.

Wecht's attorneys asked for 10 days to respond to Stallings' filing.

In their motion filed last month, defense attorneys Mark Rush and Jerry McDevitt accused District Attorney Stephen A. Zappala Jr. of using his office for personal gain -- the same allegations Wecht faces -- by funneling county money to his former law firm.

Wecht, 75, of Squirrel Hill, was indicted in January on 84 counts of using his public office to benefit his private forensic consulting business.

Stallings wrote that Zappala's hiring of his former law firm as a solicitor to his office while accepting buyout payments from his sale of his portion of the firm does not appear to be illegal. Even if Zappala had crossed ethical lines, Stallings argued the issue was not relevant to the charges against Wecht.

Rush and McDevitt claim Zappala pushed federal prosecutors to investigate Wecht during a political struggle between the two powerful Democrats.

Zappala has declined to comment on his arrangement with the law firm of Brucker Schneider and Porter and would not speak yesterday about the new filing.

Also irrelevant to the charges against Wecht, Stallings wrote, are allegations that FBI Special Agent Brad Orsini -- one of the lead investigators in the case -- has a bad reputation and once asked a witness to lie.

According to a ruling by Schwab last month, prosecutors have two reports outlining Orsini's history of departmental reprimands. Wecht's attorneys argue search warrants filed by Orsini were based on a "fanciful yarn."

Stallings responded that the evidence turned up in searches of the former coroner's office and Wecht's private offices supported the charges against Wecht. Among the items the FBI found in its searches were e-mails proving that Wecht had county employees spending time working on his personal business, federal authorities allege.

David Conti can be reached at dconti@tribweb.com or (412) 391-0927.

Workers Begin Digging Under Barn At Hoffa Search Site (SDUT/AP)

By Tom Krisher, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, May 26, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. – After tearing apart a barn, FBI agents began digging up the ground where it stood Thursday, taking photos and video and sifting through dirt by hand as they searched for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a suburban Detroit farm.

After a backhoe dug a hole at the site, FBI agents and crime-scene investigators jumped in to take pictures and comb through the soil. At one point, two dogs were sent into the hole. But after seven hours of digging, FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said nothing significant was found.

“Much ado about nothing,” Clenney said. She said the search was expected to continue through the Memorial Day holiday weekend.

The 100-by-30-foot barn was torn down Wednesday as the FBI scoured Hidden Dreams Farm, which once was owned by a Hoffa associate and is located not far from where the former Teamsters chief vanished in 1975. Before the dig began Thursday, authorities removed a layer of concrete and asphalt that had been the floor of three rooms inside the building.

The search of the Milford Township farm, 30 miles northwest of Detroit, began May 17. Officials have said the search would last a couple of weeks and involve cadaver dogs, demolition experts, archaeologists and anthropologists.

Bill Koresky, whose company was hired by the FBI to knock down the barn and dig beneath it, said the digging was stopped when a university professor who is leading the work noticed a change in the color of the dirt and a piece of what looked like rotted wood.

“You'll see the color will be different, I don't care if it's 70 or 80 years” since the land was disturbed, said Koresky, the co-owner of Able Demolition of Sterling Heights who ran one of the excavation machines at the site on Wednesday and Thursday.

Cadaver dogs were sent into the hole but turned up nothing significant, Clenney said.

Koresky said that before stopping for the day, crews had dug a 50- by 40-foot hole that was 3 1/2- to 4-feet deep. A trained eye, he said, can tell whether the dirt has been disturbed by digging to that depth.

DOJ_NMG_0029716

Donald Shouse of nearby Highland Township, who has done business on the horse farm for three decades, said demolished barn had been built sometime in the 1970s and was the oldest barn on the site.

No trace of Hoffa has ever been found, and no one has ever been charged in his disappearance.

A government investigator said last week that Donovan Wells, who lived on the land at the time, gave the FBI the tip that sparked the intense effort to solve the legendary mystery. The investigator is familiar with the current dig and spoke on condition of anonymity because some of his information came from records that have been ordered sealed by a federal judge.

Hoffa last was seen on a night he was scheduled to have dinner at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, both now dead.

Over the years, Hoffa's disappearance spawned endless theories – that he was entombed in concrete at Giants Stadium in the New Jersey Meadowlands; that he was ground up and thrown to the fish in a Florida swamp; that he was obliterated in a mob-owned fat-rendering plant that has since burned down.

More Than $1 Million In Cash Found At Miami-Dade Homes Linked To MIA Heist (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, May 26, 2006

FBI agents have dug up $1.1 million in vacuum-packed cash stashed at two southwest Miami-Dade houses, recovering some of the loot stolen in a Goodfellas-style heist at Miami International Airport.

Agents unearthed $300,000 of the sealed cash under brick pavers at the home of Karls and Cinnamon Monzon, who were indicted along with two others in last fall's $7.4 million warehouse ripoff at MIA.

They also found an additional $800,000 at the residence of another person who has not been charged in the federal case.

"We're still searching for the rest of the money and for other suspects," FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said Thursday.

The FBI found the stolen cash in mid-May. Earlier this year, agents had recovered $80,000 from the attic of the Monzons and $85,000 from another robbery defendant, Onelio Diaz. He was a security guard with Brinks security system, the company hired to transport the cash from the MIA warehouse to the Federal Reserve Bank in the Doral area.

In addition, Jeffrey Boatwright was indicted in the alleged robbery caper.

Separately, three other suspects were charged with kidnapping Boatwright: Michael Sanfiel, Guillermo Del-Regato and Manuel A. Palacio. The three kidnapped Boatwright and demanded a $500,000 payment from his robbery cohorts for his release, according to an indictment.

Sanfiel and Del-Regato have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with prosecutors, court records show.

The initial $7.4 million in stolen cash was a fraction of the $80 million that had arrived at MIA in November on a Lufthansa Airlines flight from Frankfurt, Germany. The cash, packed neatly in 42 bags that each weighed 38 pounds, was awaiting Customs' clearance at a warehouse before it was to be delivered to the Federal Reserve Bank.

The robbery mirrors one of the most infamous heists in U.S. history: the Dec. 11, 1978, robbery of $5.85 million from the Lufthansa Airlines cargo terminal at John F. Kennedy International Airport.

That robbery was the plot for the 1990 movie Goodfellas.

FBI Finds $1 Million From Airport Heist Buried At Miami-Dade House (FLSUNSEN)

By Akilah Johnson, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, May 26, 2006

FBI officials said Thursday they unearthed more than $1 million in buried loot taken during a November heist at Miami International Airport, a caper that easily could have been lifted from the pages of a Hollywood screenplay.

Masked men with guns busted into an airport warehouse and ripped off part of an $80 million cash shipment headed to the Federal Reserve Bank in Miami. The thieves divvied up the cash and dodged authorities for months. Then someone gave them up, but not before one of the thieves was kidnapped for ransom.

Now, fast forward to May 13.

Agents dug up $300,000 stashed in vacuum-sealed bags and buried below brick pavers outside the south Miami-Dade County house of Karls and Cinnamon Monzon, who had been indicted along with two others for the Nov. 6 heist.

Another $800,000 was found beneath the living room floor of a second south Miami-Dade home that belongs to someone who has not been charged in the case, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said Thursday.

A total of $1.26 million has been recovered so far, but it is only a small chunk of the $7.4 million taken from the cash shipment that arrived at the airport on board Lufthansa Airlines Flight 462 from Frankfurt, Germany.

"We're still looking," Orihuela said. "We're going to follow all the logical leads we can until we find it all."

The first bit of stolen money was recovered after local and federal authorities arrested the Monzons on Feb. 17.

Investigators found $80,000 hidden in the couple's attic. The same night, authorities arrested Onelio Diaz, a former Brinks Security guard who was carrying $5,000 and had $80,000 separated into three bundles in his car.

In March, a Miami grand jury indicted Karls Monzon, Diaz and Jeffrey Boatwright for allegedly planning and committing the robbery. Cinnamon Monzon was indicted on a charge of being an accessory because she knew her husband participated, authorities said.

Boatwright was kidnapped by three men, who threatened to kill him unless his robbery cohorts paid $500,000, officials said. On Feb. 18, agents found him bound and beaten in the bed of a pickup truck. Michael Sanfiel, Manuel Palacio, and Guillermo Del-Regato were indicted on charges of conspiracy to take a hostage.

Akilah Johnson can be reached at akjohnson@sun-sentinel.com or 954-356-4631.

Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Knowledge Shows (BSUN)

By Julie Scharper

The Baltimore Sun, May 26, 2006

ROCKVILLE -- John Allen Muhammad, who aggressively hammered his former accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo with questions and shouted at prosecutors yesterday, appeared deflated today, as three witnesses whom he had called added little or nothing to his defense.

Muhammad, who is representing himself, meekly ceded to most of the prosecution's objections that his questions were leading, inappropriate or irrelevant.

The state rested its case against Muhammad, 45, yesterday after unveiling an enormous amount of evidence over three weeks, including ballistics reports, fingerprints, DNA and Malvo's firsthand account of the pair's murderous rampage. Muhammad is on trial in Montgomery County for six counts of murder in the October 2002 sniper shootings.

One of the defense witnesses, Heidi Mansen of Silver Spring, said outside the courtroom that she believes Muhammad is guilty of the slayings, and she hopes her testimony won't sway the jury.

"I'm hoping that my testimony amounts to nothing compared to the other evidence against him," Mansen said. She testified that she saw a red car feet away from the scene of one of the sniper shootings. Police later said that the car was not involved in that crime.

"I felt bad because I had testified against the wrong person," Mansen said. "Just because I saw something doesn't mean that's what really happened."

Muhammad's lack of legal finesse hampered his efforts in questioning other witnesses.

He doggedly tried to ask a Secret Service agent about a report that could not be entered into evidence as prosecutors successfully blocked nearly every question.

A third witness, Elgin Jamison of Oxen Hill, testified that he saw an unusual white van parked several hundred yards away from one of the shooting sites an hour before the murder occurred. Early in the spate of shootings, which left 10 people dead and three injured in the Washington area, police released a sketch of a white box truck wanted in connection with the shootings.

Jamison was one of thousands who called tip lines and reported seeing white trucks or vans. Police later released a description of Muhammad's 1990 blue Chevrolet Caprice, which led to the arrest of Muhammad and Malvo. Both have been tried and convicted for sniper slayings in Virginia. Muhammad is on death row for a sniper murder there.

Several people Muhammad planned to call refused to come, saying they didn't want to take part in his defense because of his notoriety, according to an attorney who is helping Muhammad with his case.

DOJ_NMG_0029718

"I've been threatened, I've been chased off people's property, I've had people's subpoenas balled up and thrown away right in front of me," said lawyer J. Wyndal Gordon.

Robert Metzger, who testified today that he saw two suspicious people at a Bowie middle school three days before a 13-year-old boy was shot there, said he initially tried to avoid appearing for Muhammad. He eventually agreed when Gordon found him.

"That guy killed a lot of people," Metzger said after his testimony. "I don't want to be a part of that."

Montgomery Circuit Judge James L. Ryan quashed Muhammad's subpoena for Fairfax County, Va., Detective June Boyle, who questioned Malvo after he and Muhammad were arrested Oct. 24, 2002.

Malvo told Boyle that he was the triggerman in all 13 sniper shootings, but Malvo testified this week that he lied to protect Muhammad and said Muhammad was the triggerman in 10 shootings. When prosecutors objected to the plan to call Boyle, Muhammad claimed Boyle fed sniper details to Malvo when he confessed.

"The information that Lee Boyd Malvo allegedly told her he didn't tell her," said Muhammad, who wanted to probe Boyle about notes she took during the lengthy interview. "She told him all the details pertaining to this crime."

Ryan said Muhammad missed his chance to ask Malvo about the interview and ruled against him.

"Those areas are not relevant to the evidence as it is being presented," he said.

Malvo agreed to plead guilty to the same six Maryland murders this week and gave a detailed, inside account of the planning and execution of the sniper shootings. He said Muhammad devised the scheme to terrorize the region, and planned even more killings.

Muhammad and Malvo are also suspected of earlier shootings in Maryland, Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington state.

Muhammad claimed he and Malvo were simply driving around the Washington, D.C., area looking for the children Muhammad has lost in a custody battle. He said in his opening statement that he would prove himself and Malvo innocent.

Muhammad Gets Little Help From His Witnesses (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad had little luck yesterday with witnesses he called in his defense, so today he might testify himself.

"I reserve the right to answer that [later]," Muhammad told Montgomery County Circuit Judge James L. Ryan, when asked whether he planned to put himself on the stand.

Muhammad is representing himself, even though he has no legal training, and prosecutors objected to more than half of his hundreds of questions to witnesses yesterday, often successfully.

Muhammad, 45, is charged with six counts of capital murder stemming from the October 2002 sniper spree.

If he does take the stand, Muhammad's testimony would take the form of a "presentation," his standby attorney, J. Wyndal Gordon, said.

Closing arguments are expected Tuesday.

Muhammad called four witnesses yesterday after calling his first three Wednesday, and hopes to call "three or four" today, Mr. Gordon said.

But Mr. Gordon said many people subpoenaed by Muhammad have refused to come to court.

"Witnesses don't want to be a part of Mr. Muhammad's defense," Mr. Gordon told the judge. "They're saying, 'I don't care what you do, even if you send the sheriff's deputies after me, I'm still not coming.'

"I've been threatened. I've been chased off people's properties. ... I've had subpoenas balled up and thrown at me," Mr. Gordon said. "I didn't realize how dangerous serving subpoenas could be."

The few witnesses who did come to court said that they didn't want to be there and that they didn't want to help Muhammad.

DOJ_NMG_0029719

"It was scary testifying for someone that you believe actually did it, and not wanting to help his case, but I had to tell what I saw," said Heidi Mansen, a Silver Spring architect who saw the sniper's sixth shooting.

Mrs. Mansen was in her car at a stoplight, heading north on Georgia Avenue Northwest, just inside the District line, on Oct. 3, 2002, when Pascal Charlot, 72, was shot on the sidewalk to her right.

The red car between Mrs. Mansen's car and Mr. Charlot sped off from the light as soon as the shot was fired.

Mrs. Mansen chased the car and called police, who pulled over the car in Maryland, just inside the Beltway. The car's driver was arrested on drug charges that were not related to the sniper shootings.

Robert Metzger, who ran a youth program at Benjamin Tasker Middle School in Bowie two days before 13-year-old Iran Brown was shot there Oct. 7, 2002, also testified for Muhammad yesterday against his will.

"I didn't want to be talking to him," Mr. Metzger said.

Mr. Metzger said he saw two strange men in the woods next to the school on the evening of Oct. 4, 2002, a Friday, and told them to leave. He said he had never seen Muhammad before.

Outside the courtroom, Mr. Metzger said he understood that Muhammad "wanted me to make [him] look good," and then cursed.

Muhammad questioned Ralph Daigneau, a Prince William County, Va., detective who is organizing the trial evidence, for about two hours, probing his handling of the evidence.

Muhammad also tried to call Fairfax County Detective June Boyle to the stand. Lee Boyd Malvo, Muhammad's accomplice, told Detective Boyle after he was arrested that he shot all 13 victims. In two days of testimony this week, Malvo said he lied to Detective Boyle to protect Muhammad.

Malvo once considered Muhammad a father figure, but said this week in court that Muhammad is a "coward" who pulled the trigger in 10 of the 13 shootings.

Judge Ryan denied Muhammad's request to question Detective Boyle. The judge also told the jury that prosecutors, despite Muhammad's many complaints, have provided all the evidence required under law.

Muhammad and Malvo each were convicted of one fatal shooting in Virginia, two of the 10 fatalities in the three-week spree that also left three persons wounded.

A Virginia Beach jury sentenced Muhammad to death, but authorities said they brought him to Montgomery County for insurance, in case his first conviction is overturned. A Chesapeake, Va., jury sentenced Malvo to life in prison without parole. In Montgomery County, he testified this week for the prosecution and pleaded guilty to the six slayings for which Muhammad is being tried.

Witnesses In Sniper Trial Wary (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Eric Rich

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Call it the uncooperative witness defense.

Sniper John Allen Muhammad, who submitted a list of nearly 180 potential witnesses and has closely guarded his defense strategy at his trial in Montgomery County, intends to call no witnesses after today.

"The difficulty we're having is witnesses don't want to be a part of Mr. Muhammad's defense," J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's standby attorneys, told the judge. "I've actually been told: 'I don't care what you do. If the judge wants to send the sheriff after me, so be it. I'm not coming.' "

Closing arguments could come as soon as Tuesday, and a verdict on six first-degree murder charges in the October 2002 shootings is likely before the end of next week.

Muhammad questioned three witnesses Wednesday and five yesterday. Most had been near one of the sniper shootings and gave police statements that didn't incriminate Muhammad. None offered an account that contradicted the case prosecutors have laid out in recent weeks. But getting those witnesses to show up was a struggle.

"I've actually been threatened. I've been chased off people's property. I've had subpoenas balled up and thrown on the ground right in front of me," said Gordon, who with two other lawyers volunteered to represent Muhammad after he fired his public defenders and asked to represent himself. "It's been a very abusive situation. . . . I didn't realize how dangerous serving subpoenas could be."

DOJ_NMG_0029720

Other defense witnesses included a Prince William County police officer who described a small clerical error that delayed obtaining a mouth swab to get a sample of Muhammad's DNA. Another was a U.S. Secret Service forensic document examiner who was not allowed to answer questions about documents he reviewed in connection with the case because he was not testifying as an expert witness.

While cross-examining Maria Jimenez, who heard a blast near one of the shootings, Muhammad appeared to grow irritated by her answers and called her "hostile."

At one point, for no apparent reason, he demanded to know: "Are you a citizen of the United States?"

A startled Jimenez did not have to answer after Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan sustained the prosecutors' objection to the question.

Another witness, Robert Metzger, testified yesterday that he had a bizarre encounter with two men outside a Bowie school three days before Iran Brown, a 13-year-old student at the school, was shot.

Muhammad was apparently trying to prove that two suspicious people who did not meet the description of him or accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo were near the shooting scene.

"There were actually two guys back there, and one of them was kind of like chanting, and I didn't really go too close to them to ask them what he was doing. He said he was praying for the grounds," Metzger testified. "The guy was whacked out. You could kind of tell he was messed up. What this has to do with this, I don't know."

Metzger said later that he disregarded a defense subpoena that asked him to show up Wednesday. Gordon stopped by his home yesterday morning and drove him to court.

"They were trying to get me to help that dude," Metzger said after he finished testifying. Later he said, "I don't even want to be here."

The defense expects to call three witnesses today. Muhammad, 45, could also choose to testify. Malvo, 21, agreed to plead guilty to the killings and testified against his former mentor this week.

Because he is representing himself, Muhammad would have to testify in narrative form, an unusual format during which defendants speak freely. Muhammad declined to tell Ryan whether he will testify.

"I'm reserving the right to answer that right now," Muhammad said.

A Killer's Testimony (WP)

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

WHATEVER Lee Boyd Malvo's reasons were for testifying against fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad this week -- whether to curry favor with prosecutors, or to redeem himself with the victims and their families, or to confront and defy his former mentor at last -- his appearance shed some light on the motive and method behind the pair's murderous binge in October 2002.

Taking the stand as a prosecution witness at Mr. Muhammad's trial on six counts of murder in Montgomery County, Mr. Malvo -- already sentenced to life in prison without the chance of parole in Virginia -- laid out the older man's sinister purpose in undertaking the series of killings that paralyzed this region for weeks. Mr. Muhammad's intent, Mr. Malvo suggested, was to induce a wave of mayhem in the Washington area that would somehow allow him to take back his three children, whom he had lost to their mother in a custody dispute and who were living in Clinton. The wave of shootings was just the first phase of Mr. Muhammad's plan, Mr. Malvo said; after that he intended to plant bombs that specifically targeted children.

Mr. Malvo also provided details about the pair's methodology in surveying sites and identifying victims -- in some instances while under cross-examination by Mr. Muhammad, who acted as his own lawyer. By representing himself, Mr. Muhammad was within his constitutional rights, but he did himself no favors. Rather than establishing a plausible defense, Mr. Muhammad, who has already been sentenced to die in Virginia, seemed more interested in displaying his old psychological dominance over Mr. Malvo, his former protege. His self-advocacy was a perversion of legal defense work and a platform for his own megalomania and extravagant self-regard.

DOJ_NMG_0029721

We don't know whether Mr. Malvo's appearance provided any psychological comfort or closure for the surviving victims and their loved ones. For the most part, the face-off between two killers was a sickening spectacle. But it did fill in the blanks of what is publicly known about an event that traumatized this region and left lasting psychological scars, and that has its own value. Mr. Malvo may finally have come clean as to the events of that grim autumn, particularly when he looked Mr. Muhammad in the eye and said: "I think [you are] a coward. You took me into your house, and you made me a monster."

Psychiatric Care Denied To Gunman, Attorney Says (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

In the three months before he fatally shot two Fairfax County police officers, Michael W. Kennedy and his parents tried numerous times to get him immediate psychiatric help, their attorney said. Four times, Kennedy was sent home without getting help, and two mental health facilities told them not to bother coming in at all.

On one occasion, Kennedy, 18, who by this time claimed he was talking to God and was threatening suicide, was voluntarily admitted to a mental health facility in Rockville. But after several hours, he left of his own accord and carjacked a vehicle to return home to Fairfax.

"This young man was crying out for help," said Richard F. MacDowell Jr., the attorney for Brian and Margaret Kennedy, Michael Kennedy's parents. "On at least five occasions, they sought mental health services and were turned away. I can't think of another case that would be this compelling as to how ineffective our mental health system has become."

Michael Kennedy's last contact with mental health professionals occurred May 4, four days before he carried seven loaded guns to the Sully District police station and opened fire, MacDowell said. Kennedy fatally shot Detective Vicky O. Armel and Officer Michael E. Garbarino before being shot to death by other officers.

MacDowell spoke on behalf of Kennedy's parents to express their frustration at a system that seemed unable or unwilling to help their son. MacDowell said Kennedy's mental condition was never diagnosed, except for "a generalized diagnosis of depression and then anxiety at the end. This was somebody who was obviously deeply troubled."

Despite Kennedy's mental problems, the parents did not remove their guns from their home because the weapons were kept in locked containers, MacDowell said. The Kennedys did not expect their son to break into them.

Police could not verify the family's version of events, because the Kennedys have not met with authorities in the investigation of the killings. MacDowell said he could not comment on the reasons for that.

Beginning in February, Kennedy was evaluated twice at the Woodburn Center for Community Mental Health in Annandale and twice at Prince William Hospital in Manassas but was turned away all four times, MacDowell said. He was not given any medication or a plan for treatment. Officials at those facilities said they could not discuss individual cases because of privacy laws.

Woodburn is part of the Fairfax-Falls Church Community Services Board, with mental health professionals available 24 hours a day to evaluate people and, if necessary, recommend that they be hospitalized, even involuntarily. Prince William Hospital has its own psychiatric inpatient ward.

Experts said the refusal to treat Kennedy is far from surprising.

"Particularly here in Northern Virginia, it's so hard to get somebody in when they need psychiatric care," said Mary Zdanowicz, executive director of the Treatment Advocacy Center in Arlington. She said the definition of who must be given immediate treatment -- a person who is in "imminent danger" of harming himself or others or is incapable of caring for himself -- is usually interpreted too strictly, often because facilities don't have room for anyone but the most obviously dangerous people.

Northern Virginia has lost about one-third of its private psychiatric beds in the past three years and more than half of its beds -- a decrease from 402 to 196 -- since 1990, Zdanowicz said. The one state mental hospital in the region, Northern Virginia Mental Health Institute in Fairfax, is "always full," Zdanowicz said.

"The people that desperately need care aren't getting help."

DOJ_NMG_0029722

Kennedy's family knew he needed help and had him seeing a private therapist early this year, MacDowell said. But on Feb. 13, while home alone, the teenager shot the family dog. Kennedy told police and friends that he had been suicidal that day, then decided against killing himself but accidentally fired a gun and hit the dog.

MacDowell said police took Kennedy to the Woodburn center that day. After an evaluation, "they determined he was not in need of future services. They had been told that he was seeing a therapist" and advised that was sufficient, MacDowell said.

Kennedy returned to Woodburn with his parents on Easter Sunday, April 16, after he told them "he's got to be seen by somebody," MacDowell said. After a lengthy evaluation, MacDowell said Kennedy was told: "You're too smart to be here. You don't need to be here. Just go home. Here are four sleeping pills. Go see your private doctor."

The Kennedy family was not satisfied and returned to Woodburn the next day. MacDowell said a crisis intervention team met with Kennedy, determined that his family had insurance and found a bed for him at Potomac Ridge Behavioral Health Center in Rockville. He was voluntarily admitted the next day, April 18, but broke out a window later that evening and left. He told friends that he didn't like the way he was being treated. He then stole a car and drove back to Fairfax.

Euphia Hsu Smith, a spokeswoman for Potomac Ridge, said she could not discuss the specifics of Kennedy's case because of privacy laws. But she noted that "because we're a health-care facility, we're not a detention facility. We're not set up for detention, especially if someone is here voluntarily."

On April 24, MacDowell said, Kennedy's mother again tried to get her son help. She called Inova Fairfax and Dominion hospitals, both with limited numbers of psychiatric beds, and was told that there was no room, MacDowell said. She then contacted Prince William Hospital, which said that Kennedy should be brought to the emergency room.

"He's talking about cutting himself, he's suicidal and God talks to him," MacDowell said of Kennedy. "They say he's fine and give him 10 milligrams of Ambien," a sleeping pill, MacDowell said.

Donna Ballou, a spokeswoman for Prince William Hospital, said the hospital disagrees with MacDowell's claims but could not be more specific because of privacy laws.

By early May, Kennedy was talking about aliens, MacDowell said. Margaret Kennedy called Prince William Hospital on May 4 and took him back to the emergency room, in tears, MacDowell said.

MacDowell said the staff thought Kennedy was claiming mental problems to evade criminal charges. "The diagnosis is anxiety," MacDowell said. "And they let him go."

"It's astonishing," MacDowell said, "how the system has deteriorated to the point that a clearly troubled individual, such as Michael Kennedy, cannot receive inpatient services. Our mental health system in Virginia is essentially broken when the severely ill cannot receive vital and necessary services."

Financial Firms Attack Child Porn (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, May 26, 2006

The nation's leading banks and credit card companies will soon team with law enforcement in a groundbreaking coalition to catch people who sell child pornography online.

The financial institutions will report child porn sites they discover on the Web to a central tip line, slated to expand next month to receive the information. The companies will block transactions for online child porn or, if law enforcement opens an investigation, help track sellers and buyers.

The Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography represents a new phase in the war against what has become a multibillion-dollar, international business. Internet service providers, including AOL, already report child porn sites they find.

“The scope of the problem is much greater than we ever thought. It's mind-boggling,” says Ernie Allen of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, a private group that runs the tip line. Allen says one website can attract tens of thousands of customers, mostly men, who use credit cards to buy $29 monthly subscriptions. “People are getting into this because they see children as a commodity. There's no question organized crime is involved.”

Eager to take profitability out of online child porn, Allen and Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., brought together the companies.

DOJ_NMG_0029723

"This is the broadest, most comprehensive coalition we've been involved in," says Joshua Peirez, a MasterCard executive. "This is not a competitiveness issue. This is about protecting children," he says.

"I haven't seen anything like it," adds Drew Oosterbaan, chief of the Justice Department's child exploitation section. "We're here to support the effort."

Participants include Visa, MasterCard, American Express and Discover, which cover most of the U.S. credit card market. Also involved are Bank of America, Chase, Citigroup and PayPal. Visa, MasterCard and American Express say they will identify sites accepting their cards to sell child porn but won't reveal customers unless subpoenaed.

Canada Cracks Down On Rising Violence (CSM)

By Josie Newman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

TORONTO - The predawn sting operation last week that resulted in more than 100 arrests of individuals associated with Toronto's Jamestown gang, is being hailed as the city's largest anti-gang sweep ever. The raid netted a substantial cache of guns, cocaine, marijuana, and stolen cars, and more than 1,000 criminal charges were levied.

"The community is talking to us a lot more and providing us with crucial information since more officers started doing foot patrol late last year," says Toronto's deputy police chief, Tony Warr, who heads the city police's guns and gangs unit. "People ... seem relieved that gun-crime legislation is getting tougher," he adds.

Both the sting operation and the recent legislation are part of a larger crackdown on handguns and gang violence in Canada, particularly in Toronto where handgun murders and injuries doubled between 2004 and 2005.

But while police and the public applaud the hard-line approach, social pundits and criminology professors are skeptical that the approach is getting at the roots of the problem: poverty, illiteracy, dysfunctional families, and racism in a diverse ethnic population. They cite US cities such as Boston, where a similar initiative led to an 80 percent drop in homicide rates by 1999 - a success dubbed the "Boston miracle." But fatal shootings have more than doubled since.

In Canada, guns and gangs are a relatively new phenomenon, particularly in Toronto, known as "Toronto the Good" for its traditionally safe streets and low homicide rates. There were 52 deadly handgun shootings in the city in 2005, compared with 12 in 1995. Police and social workers alike attribute the acts largely to young black males - many of whom are the children of West Indian immigrants - who feel marginalized and drop out of school early to join the "gangsta" culture where they make quick money through drugs, guns, or prostitution.

The Ontario provincial government has earmarked $51 million Canadian ($46 million US) to spend on crime deterrence and new social programs related to education, employment, and skills training - C$5 million of that has already been spent on forming a 24-hour police street squad who ferret out drug dealers, illegal guns, and people breaking parole or on warrants for crimes in Toronto's most violent neighborhoods.

Provincial money has also been designated for a $26-million Operations Centre for the Guns and Gangs Task Force, as well as for 31 prosecutors, three judges, and several high-tech courtrooms specifically designed to try gun- and gang-related crimes.

In addition, Prime Minister Stephen Harper's new Conservative government recently introduced tough new legislation designed to curb handgun deaths, reduce the trafficking in illegal weapons, and shut down growing inner-city gangs. Coupled with other new legislation for "lesser" offenses like trying to steal a weapon, the initiatives will cost Canadian taxpayers an additional C$220 to C$240 million annually for extra prison facilities alone.

While several multimillion-dollar programs that address the educational, social, and employment needs of disenfranchised youth have been implemented over the past year, critics say effective solutions that get to the crux of the problem haven't yet been found.

"What [these kids] really want is respect, a school system that's responsive and sensitive to their social situation, money for education and employment, and positive male role models," says Anthony Hutchinson, a former professor of social work who served as a consultant to the "Safe Schools, Healthy Communities" initiative of the Conservative government last year.

DOJ_NMG_0029724

"If you give them proper funding for skills training and provide those with good [grades] free postsecondary education, many of them will turn around and teach and do social work in the communities they left. If the government saved just 25 percent of the money they use to control crime for crime prevention, they'd eliminate a lot of it and save money in the long run," he adds.

"I work in Jane-Finch, one of Toronto's most violent areas, and it's nothing short of miraculous the transformation I've seen happen with potentially violent youth once we spend consistent time with them, listening, disciplining, and guiding," says the Rev. Alvin Nicholson of Coalition of Christian Leaders, which implements Down with Guns - a C$3 million program funded by the provincial government that primarily targets black youth vulnerable to gang involvement.

"We stay with them through whatever programs they're in until they come out the other end - many of them end up then mentoring other troubled youth," says Mr. Nicholson.

But such government initiatives are often hit-and-miss, says Josephine Grey, a widow who started the nongovernmental organization Low Income Families Together several years ago in response to what she saw as a huge discrepancy between the public system's treatment of the middle class and the working poor.

The widow - who says she supports her four children on C$1,200 a month - points to the new community center built for St. Jamestown, one of Toronto's largest multiethnic, low-income areas, where she lives. The free programs, including continuing education and language classes, are primarily used by outsiders with computers, she says, because they can register more quickly.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Man Gets 20 Months In Cross Burning (CO)

By Jen Aronoff

The Charlotte Observer, May 26, 2006

A former Morganton resident who admitted building and burning a cross has been sentenced to 20 months in federal prison, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Thursday.

In 2004, a federal grand jury accused Grady Allan Carswell, 36, now of Lenoir, of putting a burning cross in front of a black couple's home in the Bristol Creek community.

Carswell pled guilty in January 2005 to a one-count indictment related to the incident but said he burned the cross because of a land dispute with another neighbor, not out of racism.

At a sentencing hearing Monday, U.S. District Judge Lacy Thornburg rejected that argument and ordered Carswell serve the prison time followed by three years' probation. He will also have to pay the victims about $2,200 in restitution.

"Cross burning remains a vicious symbol of hatred and cannot be tolerated," Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said in a news release. "All American families have the right to live where they choose, undisturbed by racist threats.

Stop The Black-Only Treatment (WP)

By Michael Meyers

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

I'm sorry to report that 52 years after Brown v. Board of Education, separate but equal is all the rage in certain parts of the education world -- especially on college campuses where special programs are offered that target minority students for "special" and separate attention, counseling, mentoring, tutoring, residences and instruction.

The latest of these race fads are the Black Male Initiatives (BMIs), government-funded and university-sponsored, and underway on campuses in states including Georgia, Kansas, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York. The initiatives focus on recruiting, schooling and "saving" black men.

Until recently, when the New York Civil Rights Coalition filed a complaint against the City University of New York, these special programs were unassailable. But more and more they are being shown to feature new variants of an old prejudice. This has included stereotyping all black male students as "at risk," and, for example, running special classes only for black men at

DOJ_NMG_0029725

CUNY's Medgar Evers College. This special instruction focused on black men's alleged deficiencies and their need to act more responsibly in order to reclaim their traditional patriarchal roles as leaders in the black community and of the so-called black race. A tenet of the program at CUNY's Queensborough Community College is to provide black men with special tutoring, career services and academic advice. Until caught, CUNY's Hunter College invited only black male students to a planning conference on its BMI.

Many black leaders in and outside academia seem to have no objection to these figurative black-only signs over certain doorways at America's colleges. Not surprisingly, this racial identity ferment -- aka self-determination -- is proudly endorsed by white liberals disturbed by the dwindling numbers of black men on campus, as well as by many black female students for whom interracial dating is either taboo or impracticable.

Hence, college presidents are listening to their black students and to their officials for diversity and affirmative action or minority affairs, and they are setting up BMIs as a way of making life on campus more comfortable for black students. And black faculty have a new source of grants to apply for, from foundations that urge the study of the black male problem and experimentation with intervention techniques. No educator rebukes such offerings with the hard, nonstatistical truth that there is no such thing as "the black male," just as there never was such a thing as "the Negro."

While not all BMIs look alike, they're typically designed with an Afrocentric, male-domination focus, replete with outreach and links to black men's fraternal, community and pride organizations. Through emphasis on racial pride and "black male identity," black male students are encouraged, as at Medgar Evers College, to think about the status and future of the race: "The people in the village are many but the warriors are few and are now scattered; thus, leaving the borders unprotected and us as easy prey for the enemy," according to the director of the college's Male Development and Empowerment Center. Racial breast beating is a powerful ingredient in winning and securing support for such separatist programming.

Some BMIs are open to all students, for legal reasons. But the nomenclature shows a mission of serving and rescuing "at risk" black men from their alleged self-destructive behavior and from the afflictions of their environment. Only legal curmudgeons, it seems, would stand in the way of college as parent and social engineer, full of missionary zeal to bring rehabilitation and redemption to the wretched, conflicted souls of black men.

When the college takes on such tasks it is only confirming and reinforcing pernicious racial stereotypes. The penchant to isolate, track and segregate black men is a deeply offensive and nasty American social habit, and programs that parrot and mirror such group prejudices are as crude as they are paternalistic. Indeed, schools treating black men separately and differently from all others of similar age and qualification is exactly what federal Judge Robert L. Carter cautioned against in his indictment of proposals for public schools for African American boys. "The advocates of this panacea place no blame on the public school system," Carter said, but black males "are stigmatized and must be isolated from others in order to develop into productive adults."

The psychologist Kenneth Clark, who was my mentor and whose research did so much to bring about Brown, steered his colleagues on the New York State Board of Regents away from state-sponsored racial thinking. He persuaded them in 1972 to declare as policy that college officials were to avoid "any practices which would perpetuate a caste system in which groups are placed in certain stereotyped positions with little regard for the needs and desires of the individual." That policy continued: "Racist patterns of segregation can lead only to blocked communications, with a resultant social climate that is close and tense, if not hostile. Moreover, the de facto segregation of a minority group, even if demanded by that group, often results in peer pressure on individuals which may lead to intragroup hostility."

Dr. Clark died just last year, by which time the regents had long since abandoned the wisdom in that policy.

The writer, a former assistant national director of the NAACP, is executive director of the New York Civil Rights Coalition.

ANTITRUST:

Benit, Wife Face Fraud Charges (AANEWS)

By MARJORIE KAUTH-KARJALA, News Staff Reporter

Ann Arbor News (MI), May 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029726

Fired Willow Run superintendent arrested in Ecorse district case

Former Willow Run schools superintendent Douglas A. Benit and his wife face federal criminal charges that they defrauded another school district and a federal program out of millions of dollars by steering contracts to companies they owned.

Benit and his wife, Mary Ann Elam Benit, were arrested Wednesday, a day after a federal grand jury in Detroit returned the indictment. Both were released on $10,000 personal bonds and are scheduled to be arraigned May 31 in federal District Court in Detroit.

Neither Benit nor his wife could be reached for comment. Benit's attorney in another matter, Don Gasiorek, said he is not representing Benit in the criminal matter and had no comment.

Benit was fired from Willow Run last fall after a district investigation concluded that Benit had a conflict of interest with two companies that did business with the district and that he may have benefited from the connection. There have been no charges stemming from the Willow Run investigation, although Justice Department officials said the probe is continuing.

The federal indictment includes charges of fraud against the Ecorse Public School district and a federal program called E-Rate, which was intended to help school districts gain better Internet access. Benit was subpoenaed to testify before Congress concerning the E-Rate investigation in 2004. He appeared but declined to testify, citing the protections of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution.

The indictments against the Benits are part of an ongoing antitrust investigation into the E-Rate program by the Justice Department that has resulted in charges against 13 people and 12 companies across the country. Six of the companies and three people have either pleaded guilty or have entered into civil settlements with the defendants agreeing to pay fines and restitution of more than $40 million. Two of the defendants have been sentenced to six years in prison, according to a statement from the Justice Department.

Other charges against the Benits include using fraudulent documents to obtain a line of credit and a mortgage to purchase the couple's Superior Township home and also laundering money. There are nine charges against Benit, with some of the same charges levied against Mary Ann Elam Benit. Charges were also filed against Coral Technology Inc. and School Management Services Inc., both companies that Benit helped form and of which he was an officer.

The indictment also indicates that Benit had three aliases that he used to disguise the fraudulent activities. The indictment states that the government will proceed with forfeiture proceedings for the Benits' assets, including their home, which in January was listed for sale for $1.5 million.

The indictment alleges that the Benits attempted to obtain contracts for projects at the Ecorse school district for about $7.27 million. Many of the contracts were directly with Coral Technology and some were with companies that used Coral as a subcontractor. Some of the contracts were refused by the E-Rate program, but the indictment states that Ecorse paid Coral at least $4.3 million.

Benit at various times between 1999 and 2003 identified himself as an officer, employee or chief executive officer of Coral Technology, the indictment states. Benit was employed in Ecorse from 1997-2003. Mary Ann Elam Benit, who married Benit in 2005, worked for Coral, according to the indictment. Elam Benit, Benit and others falsified documents to obtain payment from the Ecorse district, the indictment states.

The indictment alleges that Benit used the aliases J.D. Howen, D.J. Howen and Jack Howen to conceal his relationship to Coral. While working for Ecorse schools, Benit used the name J.D. Howen to bid on a project for Coral with another school district. An Ann Arbor News investigation found that Howen was listed as an officer for Coral, along with Benit, on a 1999 Ohio tax record.

The indictment also alleges that Benit paid a former Coral employee in exchange for the employee not reporting Benit's dual roles at Ecorse and Coral.

Penalties for the charges range from five to 30 years in prison. Statutory fines for the charges range from $250,000 to $1 million, and the fine can be increased to twice what either the victim lost or the perpetrator gained from the fraud.

Willow Run Community Schools Superintendent Ron Ciranna, who helped investigate Benit's actions in the district, said people in Willow Run generally trusted Benit but there were signs that made some uneasy. Benit worked for the district from June 2003 to June 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0029727

Benit was out of the district often and "was always evasive of where he was or how to get a hold of him," Ciranna said. Ciranna said he hopes the investigation will uncover more information on Benit's actions in Willow Run and possibly result in restitution. The district paid about $260,000 to the two companies that Benit was connected with.

Rhonda McGill, president of the Kettering Elementary PTO, said she was saddened by the indictment.

"What a really unfortunate thing. (The parents) tried to support him and stick by him because he had done such good things for the school," she said.

McGill said Benit helped increase enrollment and improved communication. But McGill said she was glad the district investigated the issue and took action.

Marjorie Kauth-Karjala can be reached at mkarjala@annarbornews.com or at 734-482-2961.

Ex-school Leader Accused Of Fraud (FREEP)

By Lori Higgins, Free Press Education Writer

Detroit Free Press, May 26, 2006

Ecorse district, U.S. government lost money

A former assistant superintendent for Ecorse Public Schools has been indicted, along with his wife, on federal charges for their alleged roles in steering almost $7.3 million from the district and a federal program to a company they had ties to.

Douglas A. Benit and Mary Ann Elam Benit of Superior Township, who were indicted Tuesday and arrested Wednesday, have been released from federal custody on $10,000 unsecured bonds.

Douglas Benit faces charges of federal program fraud, mail fraud, bank fraud and money laundering. Mary Ann Elam Benit is charged with bank fraud and money laundering.

Both will be arraigned Wednesday. If they're convicted, penalties could go as high as 30 years in prison and a $1-million fine.

The Benits could not be reached for comment Wednesday. A message was left late Wednesday for the attorney who represents them.

The U.S. Department of Justice says Benit used his position in the district, which he left in 2003, to steer contracts -- sometimes at inflated prices -- to Coral Technology Inc., an Ohio company he controlled. It allegedly occurred from March 1998 to October 2003.

The money came from the federal E-Rate program, which provides funding for Internet access and other telecommunications services to poor schools and libraries. The indictments bring to 13 the number of individuals charged as part of the Justice Department's ongoing investigation into fraud in the E-Rate program. Twelve companies have been charged.

The department "will continue to vigorously pursue those who cheat the competitive process and who violate the public's trust ... by stealing from federal programs and taking advantage of lending institutions," Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said in a news release.

School officials in Ecorse had little to say Wednesday.

"At this time, I have no comment. Our attorney will be issuing a statement," said Ecorse Superintendent Emma Epps. That attorney, Floyd Allen of Detroit, could not be reached Wednesday.

Carol Salisbury, a Board of Education member, hung up on a reporter Wednesday, saying "I have no comment on this. Sorry."

Also silent was board Vice President Virginia Martinez, who said she couldn't comment because she didn't know anything about it. "I didn't even know he was married," she said.

According to Justice Department officials, the school district is assisting in the investigation, which is ongoing.

Benit resigned from the Ecorse district in 2003 and took a job as superintendent of the Willow Run Community Schools in Ypsilanti. The Willow Run Board of Education fired him at a Nov. 14 meeting and authorized school district attorneys to pursue a lawsuit against him, according to minutes of the meeting on the district's Web site.

It was unclear Wednesday what precipitated Benit's firing from Willow Run.

Among the allegations detailed in the indictment:

DOJ_NMG_0029728

• The Benits, along with Coral and another company they controlled, School Management Services, conspired to launder fraudulently obtained money to purchase and make improvements to their Superior Township home.

• Douglas Benit schemed to defraud a lending company to obtain a $893,750 mortgage.

• He and his wife schemed to defraud a bank, causing the bank to issue Douglas Benit a $200,000 line of credit.

• He and his wife used aliases to conceal their involvement with the companies that received contracts from the Ecorse district.

UPDATE: House Judiciary Panel Votes To Ban Content Fees (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday voted to ban the nation's phone and cable companies from charging extra fees to companies such as Amazon.com Inc. (AMZN) (AMZN) and Google Inc. (GOOG) (GOOG) for speedier delivery of their content.

By 20-13 the panel approved legislation being pushed by more than 100 consumer groups and businesses. The vote was, at least on the surface, a blow to Verizon Communications (VZ) (VZ) and AT&T Inc. (T) (T), which have said that new regulations may undercut their ability to invest in high-capacity networks.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., is speeding ahead with the bill to assert court jurisdiction over a matter that some would prefer left to regulators. In so doing, he is also seeking to counter efforts by phone companies to keep open the option of building business plans organized around additional fees.

"While the technological dynamics of the marketplace have changed over time, the threat of dominant firms abusing their market power to restrain competition has not," Sensenbrenner said.

One strategy he could employ is to attach his measure to a broader telecommunications bill that may reach the House floor as soon as next month. That broader bill, developed by House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, is favored by phone companies as it would make it easier for them to roll out cable television service.

However, it is unclear whether Sensenbrenner's measure would be considered germane to the broader telecommunications legislation. That, combined with a sense of reluctance from even those who voted with Sensenbrenner, underscores the obstacles facing the latest efforts to ensure that Internet sites may be downloaded without regard to whether the Web site has made payments beyond those they already make to access the network.

"I think the bill is a blunt instrument," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., who nonetheless voted for the bill, saying he wanted to ensure that telecommunications issues stayed within the purview of the Justice Department and antitrust laws.

The Federal Communications Commission last August weighed in on the so-called "net neutrality" debate, issuing a policy statement saying that consumers should be able to access lawful content, run any application they choose, connect their own lawful devices and have the benefit of competition.

However, the FCC didn't adopt official rules. As a result, the policy isn't enforceable.

-By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-6654; siobhan.hughes@ dowjones.com

Google Reaches Agreement To Have Its Software Installed On New Dell Computers (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, May 25 — Google and Dell have reached an agreement to install Google software on millions of new Dell computers over the next few years, Google's chief executive said on Thursday.

The executive, Eric E. Schmidt, said the arrangement meant that Google's search toolbar would appear on the screens of new Dell systems, and that Dell users would be directed to a Web page branded by the two companies.

Mr. Schmidt, speaking at a Goldman Sachs Internet conference in Las Vegas, said the companies would share revenue from the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0029729

While financial terms were not disclosed, many analysts assumed that Google would pay Dell a fee for the arrangement. If that is the case, said Safa Rashtchy, an analyst with Piper Jaffray, this will be the beginning of a era in which Google pays for alliances in order to maintain its growth rate.

Spokesmen for both companies declined to comment.

Mr. Schmidt said that this would be first of several agreements with Dell. The time period of the deal was not disclosed.

The software, Dell said, would be put only on machines sold to consumers and to small and medium-size businesses. While the consumer market accounted for roughly 14 percent of Dell's revenue last quarter, the deal would nonetheless involve millions of new computers over time.

Google could receive a significant boost in its intense competition with Microsoft for search advertising revenue. By ensuring prime real estate on Dell computers, Google will gain exposure to millions of consumers who might otherwise have used Microsoft's search technology.

The agreement comes only two weeks after the Justice Department found that the design of Microsoft's new Web browser did not pose a threat to competition in the Internet search market. Google had expressed concern to antitrust officials that Microsoft's browser routinely steered users to its search service, MSN, giving it an unfair advantage.

"This is very important for Google, particularly if you look at how Microsoft is going to be pushing its search technology by embedding it in Internet Explorer," Mr. Rashtchy said. "Most people are going to stay with the default search technology that comes with their machine."

Google announced the deal at the close of regular trading. Shares of Google rose $1.74, to $382.99, and were roughly unchanged in after-hours trading. Dell shares increased 12 cents, to $24.30, then rose another 8 cents in after-hours trading.

The prospect of additional revenue from the deal would be a welcome lift for Dell, which has been struggling to hold onto its market share and maintain the heady growth rates it once enjoyed. Dell's profit declined 18 percent in the first quarter, though revenue grew 6 percent, mainly from growth overseas.

"It's a slight positive for Dell," said Cindy Shaw, vice president for research at Moors & Cabot. "But it will not solve Dell's larger issues. It's not going to be what gets people to buy a Dell."

Dell To Sell PCs Installed With Google's Software (SEATIMES/BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo And Jonathan Thaw, Bloomberg News

The Seattle Times, May 26, 2006

Dell, the world's biggest maker of personal computers, will sell PCs installed with Google software, dealing a setback to Microsoft's longtime control of the desktop.

Under the three-year agreement, Dell will offer machines with Google programs for searching hard drives and e-mail as well as its Web browser tool bar, Google Chief Executive Officer Eric Schmidt said at a conference in Las Vegas that was sponsored by Goldman Sachs.

The accord is a victory for Google, the world's most-used search engine, putting its software before 100 million new PC owners over the life of the deal. Until now, Microsoft's Internet browser and services have been the default settings on Dell PCs and the agreement may derail Microsoft's attempts to draw users to its search services with its new Windows operating system.

"The gloves have come off," said Jordan Rohan, an analyst at RBC Capital Markets in New York. He rates Google "outperform" and said he doesn't own it. "This is a bare-knuckles distribution move for Google."

Google's software will be installed on Dell's PCs by the end of this month, Dell spokesman Jess Blackburn said. He declined to comment on financial terms of the deal.

The transaction came hours after Yahoo, the No. 2 search engine, and eBay, the largest online auctioneer, said they formed an alliance to combat Google's grip on the Internet.

Schmidt said he won't outline terms of the deals. The companies will share revenue, he said. "The real reason to do this is the end-user benefit," Schmidt said. Google's software is designed to make computers easier to use, he said.

Google will probably pay Dell a fee of about $5 to $10 for each PC, Rohan said. That would hand Dell a new revenue stream as it grapples with a slide in sales and profit growth. Dell Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins is struggling to re ignite sales after Dell last week reported first-quarter earnings that missed a February forecast. Price cuts crimped profit and failed to spur orders as anticipated.

"For a long time, PC makers have wanted to sell real estate on their systems because it's prime real estate," said Roger Kay, an analyst with Endpoint Technologies Associates in Wayland, Massachusetts. "If they get a few bucks per copy, that could add up to a lot of money."

Hewlett-Packard declined to comment on whether the company is considering a deal with Google, according to spokesman Ryan Donovan. Hewlett-Packard is the world's No. 2 PC maker.

Google will be able to recoup the money quickly through revenue from search-linked ads, RBC's Rohan said. A payment by Google of $5 for each PC would be made back in about 12 clicks by users on a Google ad, Rohan said. Google gets between a few cents to tens of dollars each time a user clicks on its ads.

Dell sold 37.7 million PCs in calendar 2005, according to market researcher IDC. The company sold 9.64 million PCs in the calendar first quarter, down from 10.5 million in the fourth quarter, IDC said.

The deal curbs Microsoft's ability to close the gap with Google. Microsoft is putting search in the new Vista version of Windows, scheduled to hit stores in January, in an effort to encourage more customers to use it.

While Microsoft dominates desktop software, Google has four times more users for its Internet search and Google leads in advertising revenue. Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer escalated spending on the company's MSN Internet unit to challenge Google and reclaim share of Internet search.

Microsoft handled just 11 percent of U.S. searches in March, compared with Google's 49 percent, Nielsen//NetRatings data show.

In the new Windows, Microsoft has placed search panes on the start menu, the Internet browser, as well as the program that helps users organize files and folders. The new version of Office also has search integrated into its programs.

Google's ability to buy a place on Dell desktops was made possible by a settlement between Microsoft and U.S. government regulators. Microsoft, in its settlement after the U.S. antitrust case, agreed to allow PC makers to promote and highlight rival software on their machines.

The company was found to have violated antitrust law by restricting computer makers from changing the way Windows was displayed when users turned on their machines in a bid to shut out rival Netscape Communications Corp.'s browser.

Google complained to the European Commission about Microsoft's new browser, which directs Web surfers to Microsoft's MSN and other search sites.

"The Dell deal and similar deals like it are the Vista vaccine," Rohan said. "They help to prevent against a loss of share between a tight integration between Vista and MSN search."

Yahoo, EBay Team In Battle With Google (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, May 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES — In a bid to challenge Google's growing domination of the Internet, auctioneer eBay joined forces with Google rival Yahoo on Thursday. The alliance brings text-based advertising to eBay from Yahoo and eBay's PayPal payment program to Yahoo.

“This is a real boost for Yahoo at a time when they really needed it,” says Allen Weiner, an analyst at researcher Gartner. “Yahoo is in a battle to the death with Google and Microsoft, and getting eBay's base into the Yahoo network will make people look at Yahoo's ad platform as a real plus.”

Weiner says PayPal represents 20% of eBay's revenue. Expanding PayPal to the Yahoo network “is an interesting way for Yahoo to offer digital content for sale, like movies and TV shows, and offer its customers a really easy way to pay for it.”

Yahoo is the most visited website, with more than 100 million monthly visitors. But it has been losing market share in online searches to Google, which dominates the hot search advertising business — those little text ads that appear near search results. According to measurement firm ComScore Media Metrix, Google's search share rose 6.6% in April over the same time a year ago, while Yahoo's fell 2.7%.

EBay, the Internet's fifth-most-visited site, according to ComScore, is also the Internet's largest purchaser of search ads, says John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website. “It was inevitable that Yahoo and eBay would do this deal, because eBay needed to counterbalance its dependence on Google for traffic,” he says.

John Donahoe, president of eBay's marketplace division, says eBay supports its network of sellers by advertising their wares elsewhere on the Web with a heavy use of search-based “keyword” advertising. In the past year, eBay's purchases of keywords for use in search queries has gone from 1 million to 15 million keywords, he says.

Google late last year introduced a classified-ad service, Google Base, where individuals can buy and sell goods. Google has consistently denied that it was going after eBay's business.

Yahoo and eBay executives insisted Thursday that competitive pressures with Google had nothing to do with their deal. “We're not focused on what others do but what we think is best for our community,” said Yahoo Chief Operating Officer Dan Rosensweig.

Yahoo until recently provided search advertising for Microsoft's MSN. This year, Microsoft introduced its own ad platform.

Donahoe says no money is changing hands in the deal with eBay. Instead, both companies will share revenue, splitting proceeds from advertising and PayPal fees.

Martin Pyykkonen, an analyst at securities firm Hoefer & Arnett, says he doesn't expect the deal to generate a lot of cash immediately for either company.

The alliance is more “tactical,” he says. “Yahoo and eBay have a common enemy, Google, and they're both protecting themselves.”

New Tech Alliances Signal More Scrambling Ahead (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney, Mylene Mangalindan And Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The land rush over the Internet entered a new phase yesterday as four tech titans -- Yahoo Inc., eBay Inc., Google Inc. and Dell Inc. -- announced alliances that signal more jockeying ahead over access to online consumers and the advertising they view on the Web. The high-profile deals also raise fresh questions about Microsoft Corp.'s efforts to keep step in the race.

Yahoo and eBay unveiled a broad partnership under which eBay will display ads brokered by Yahoo on its U.S. online auction site and marketplace. Yahoo will promote eBay's PayPal electronic-payment system as a way for consumers to pay for Yahoo services.

Separately, Google and Dell confirmed an agreement to install Google software on Dell PCs before they are shipped to users. The deal, which Dell says could include as many as 20 million computers a year, will get Google's search services and ads in front of more users.

The agreements are the result of behind-the-scenes efforts by tech companies big and small to form alliances that strengthen their efforts to own a bigger piece of the Web landscape. At stake are huge future profits from Internet users and advertisers, whose buying and spending habits are still in flux.

EBay's decision to tie up with Yahoo appeared to be a tacit acknowledgement that it didn't feel comfortable more closely aligning itself with long-time partner Google, which has begun efforts over the past year that some believe compete with eBay in areas such as payment services and listings. Meanwhile, Google's Dell pact was driven partly by Google's desire to keep a leg up on Microsoft, say people familiar with the matter.

The deals come amid growing ambitions of the Internet companies that increasingly have them encroaching on one another's turf. Rivalries are building as Internet penetration in the U.S. has reached a mature, slower-growth phase. That augurs more battles over attracting and retaining current Internet users, who are increasing the time they spend online. At the same time, relationships among many Internet companies exist already, complicating rivalries and prospective alliances.

More scuffles for new alliances appear to already be underway. Google and Microsoft, for example, are competing to provide search technology and related advertising to News Corp.'s Fox Interactive Media division, which includes the popular MySpace social networking site, according to people familiar with the matter. A Fox Interactive spokeswoman declined to comment. EBay itself could be a further object of heated courting by rivals. The Yahoo-eBay ad agreement is exclusive to the U.S., leaving open the possibility of eBay doing an ad deal with Google or Microsoft in Europe and Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0029732

Yahoo's announcement with eBay caps years of partnership and discussions between the companies, including a near-merger that fell apart in 2000. In recent months, mounting concern about a competitive threat from Google has led eBay to intensify discussions with Yahoo and Microsoft, say people familiar with the matter. Under the agreement announced yesterday, visitors to the U.S. eBay site will see graphical ads with images brokered by Yahoo. They will also view text ads from Yahoo linked to phrases they enter when they search for specific goods.

Analysts say the linkup should increase the companies' revenue and provide a critical boost to Yahoo's search-related ad business, which is going through a major overhaul. The chief executives of eBay and Yahoo say the agreement, which centers around sharing revenue from ads and electronic payments, will have no material impact on their revenue in 2006.

EBay is grappling with slowing growth of its U.S. auction marketplace, and the deal is a bet that Yahoo -- more than Google or Microsoft -- can help increase revenue from existing Web users and drive new users to eBay. EBay Chief Executive Meg Whitman, in an interview, said she chose to ally with Yahoo because "there is no one who can help us with graphical as well as text search ads the way Yahoo can." Google's graphical-ad offerings are relatively fledgling.

Ms. Whitman declined to comment specifically on eBay's talks with Google and Microsoft or on concerns about Google's encroachment. Google CEO Eric Schmidt told investors at a Goldman Sachs Internet conference yesterday that the Yahoo agreement was "a very good deal for eBay," and that Google's "relationship with eBay will only get closer in the next year or two as we both do very well."

Yahoo's partnership will give it access to eBay's tens of millions of users as well as to valuable data about consumers' searches on eBay. Users perform about 345 million searches daily on eBay's sites, rivaling total searches on the top Web-search sites. That information could help Yahoo refine its search technology to offer better ad-targeting capabilities.

One complication for eBay: it must make sure that Yahoo-provided ads don't pull away too many buyers from eBay's own auction listings. Under the agreement, which will begin with a testing phase over the next several months, Yahoo will provide search-related ads for "complementary products," the companies said. The companies also said they will explore developing "click to call" advertising linked to eBay's Skype and Yahoo Messenger Internet phone technology, which would allow consumers to directly call advertisers.

Google, under the roughly three-year pact announced yesterday, will pay Dell an unspecified amount to have its Web-browser-search toolbar and desktop-search software -- which consumers can use to search the content of their hard drives and emails -- installed on PCs. Dell shipped over 37 million PCs and servers globally in 2005, according to research group IDC.

Dell will also set its PCs so they "default" to Google's search engine, automatically providing it in certain instances when consumers search using Microsoft's Web browser.

The agreement should help mitigate some of Google's concerns about Microsoft's new Web browser, to be released this year. Google has complained that Microsoft is making it too difficult for users to change the default setting away from Microsoft's search engine. The Justice Department earlier this month said that Google's concerns were unfounded.

By expanding its placement on PCs, Google will instantly gain a spot in front of millions of consumers, who industry analysts say are far more likely to use software and access Internet services if they are pre-loaded on PCs. For Dell, the agreement is an opportunity to boost revenue from software shipped on new computers.

The new alliances pose serious questions for Microsoft, which in recent years has dramatically increased its focus on the Internet and online advertising -- with mixed results. People familiar with the matter say the Redmond, Wash., company had at some stages been in the running for both the eBay and Dell agreements announced yesterday. Google late last year snatched away from Microsoft an agreement that included providing search advertising on AOL's sites.

The eBay deal doesn't preclude Microsoft from creating closer ties with Yahoo or eBay itself. All three see Google as a common threat and have spent the past year exploring a variety of ways to work together, say people familiar with the matter. A big concern among the three companies, though, was avoiding any appearance of teaming up against Google, especially given Microsoft's past antitrust problems in the U.S. and Europe, these people say.

DOJ_NMG_0029733

The Yahoo-eBay deal could pull Microsoft's top management deeper into the problem of how to compete with Google and better capitalize on the growth of online advertising. Microsoft is now picking around the edges for partners that can direct traffic to its services and display Internet ads it brokers. Potential partners could include MySpace and FaceBook, a site used by millions of college students. Microsoft could also tighten an existing link with Amazon.com. "Clearly there are going to be a lot of partnerships and alliances in this area," says Vivek Varma, a Microsoft spokesman.

The Dell-Google alliance potentially cuts into Microsoft's most coveted and important partnership with a computer maker. By increasing the amount of its software in Dell PCs, Google squeezes onto a stage where Microsoft has long been the lead player. As the world's largest PC maker by number of machines, Dell has been arguably Microsoft's most important distribution channel for its most important software, the Windows operating system and Office business applications. Those two products are Microsoft's largest source of profit and revenue.

Microsoft says it sees the Google and Dell deal as an expansion of options for PC users. "Customers are going to have choice," Mr. Varma says, when asked if the deal threatens Microsoft's position in PC software.

Yahoo And EBay Join To Fight The Giants (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

EBay Inc. and Yahoo Inc. forged an alliance yesterday aimed at capturing more online sales and advertising dollars, while giving both greater leverage against their primary rivals, Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp.

The partnership spans some of the most critical areas of both companies' businesses, adding eBay's Paypal online payment system throughout Yahoo's operations and giving Yahoo an exclusive deal to sell display ads for eBay.com.

That two of the Internet's top brands decided to cooperate so closely highlights how powerful Google is becoming as it roves across the online business world, competing with eBay in online classifieds and payment systems and with Yahoo in search and content. It also leaves Microsoft in increasing need of a partner of its own, as its online service trails the others in search and advertising.

"This deal is partially offensive, partially defensive for eBay and Yahoo," because it allows the companies to share technologies and combine resources, said Philip Remek, an analyst for Guzman & Co.

Yahoo is the most visited site on the Internet, and eBay is the world's largest auctioneer. Consumers will start to see experimental versions of joint offerings in coming months. Yahoo users will more easily be able to make calls off the Internet by "clicking-to-call" local merchants, for example, using eBay's Internet-phone company Skype. EBay users will have greater access to Yahoo's news and entertainment content through a toolbar championed by both brands.

"I think it plays to the complementary strengths of both companies," said eBay president and chief executive Meg Whitman, speaking at a Goldman Sachs investor conference yesterday.

Speaking at its annual shareholder meeting, Terry Semel, chairman and chief executive of Yahoo, said the deal is a "terrific strategic partnership for our company."

One area not covered by the arrangement: instant messaging. Yahoo's service will not be compatible with eBay's Skype instant messaging; Yahoo already has such an agreement with Microsoft's MSN.

Such overlapping deals show how Internet companies are jockeying for Web surfers' time and interest, which translates into more opportunities to sell advertising.

Microsoft appears to be planning to chart its own course in competing for an advertising network, and for building its online audience. Earlier this year, Microsoft lost out to Google in negotiations to forge a deal with Dulles-based AOL LLC. Google invested $1 billion in AOL and deepened its search and content-sharing arrangement.

Separately, Google yesterday announced a partnership deal with Dell Computer Corp. to install Google's software on its computers, an arrangement that threatens to diminish Microsoft's presence on the consumer desktop.

"Microsoft has been jilted twice this year, by AOL and eBay," said David Card, an analyst with Jupiter Research. Through MSN, Microsoft still has a large community of users for its Web-based services, but it is trying to improve in areas of both search and advertising sales, he said. "They are trying to go it alone."

DOJ_NMG_0029734

Advertisers are also spending more to run ads alongside search results, or pictorial ads that run on Web pages, as viewers spend more time online and less time with traditional media sources. Google, the search engine with the most traffic, dominates the search-based advertising market, while Yahoo has the largest advertising network for pictorial ads, and is also trying to catch up to Google on search-related ads.

"It's a bigger win for Yahoo, in many ways, to win against Google," said Charlene Li, an analyst with Forrester Research. EBay, meanwhile, pays both Google and Yahoo to sponsor links next to those companies' search results, but it has been cautious about selling ads on its own site. By employing Yahoo to provide such ads, it could boost its relatively meager share of the online ad market, she said.

EBay also might tap more locally based advertisers by integrating Skype throughout Yahoo's network, Li said.

For now, the companies' collaboration will happen exclusively in the United States, but if it succeeds, it might extend into other parts of the globe, Whitman said.

Shares of eBay closed up $3.68 yesterday, at $33.88 a share. Shares of Yahoo closed up $1.13 a share at $32.92.

Yahoo Makes Deal On Ads With EBay (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

EBay and Yahoo, two top Internet companies that have been losing ground to Google, said yesterday that they would work together in several areas, including advertising and online payments.

The deal will expand Yahoo's share of Internet advertising, a market where it lost leadership to Google. Investors have been worried that eBay's highly profitable shopping site is being undercut as consumers increasingly find products through search engines or through free listing services like Craigslist. Google and Yahoo have introduced similar free services.

At the same time, eBay is spending $260 million a year to advertise its auctions on search engines, with 60 percent of that on Google, according to estimates by Jordan Rohan, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets.

The deal announced yesterday gives eBay some new ways to make money from its large audience, but it does not directly address the concerns about competition. Yahoo will continue to offer its auctions and other online shopping services that compete directly with eBay.

For Yahoo, however, the deal represents a potentially significant expansion of its advertising business. EBay agreed to place on its site text advertisements sold by Yahoo. That gives Yahoo a major new partner just as the MSN service of Microsoft, which was the largest outlet for Yahoo's text ads, has switched to selling its own advertising.

Small text ads that automatically appear next to related material on Web pages have proved hugely profitable, but eBay has long been wary of placing them on its site because they are likely to refer people to sites that compete with its marketplace.

"EBay is selling a little bit of its soul by doing this deal," Mr. Rohan said. "The idea of eBay as a destination site is marginalized by a deal that drives traffic outside of eBay."

Margaret C. Whitman, eBay's chief executive, said the company was starting to change its policy because "we have to embrace some of the things that are happening on the Web." Still, she said, the company will test the impact of the text ads to make sure they do not hurt revenue.

Ms. Whitman added that the text ads would be restricted so they did not offer products that competed directly with eBay's sellers. They will be for "complementary products" like cases for digital cameras, she said, and they will also appear when a user searches for a product that is not available on eBay.

EBay also agreed to have Yahoo sell graphical display advertising on its site, the first time Yahoo has sold graphic ads for another company.

"EBay brings the best of quality inventory and a huge community," said Terry S. Semel, Yahoo's chief executive. "It gives us the opportunity to do a big job."

Yahoo and eBay said the revenue from the deal would be small this year, and they declined to characterize its financial impact for next year. Mr. Rohan said that if eBay placed text ads on 25 percent of its pages, the revenue could be about $130 million a year, and about 80 percent of that would go to eBay.

DOJ_NMG_0029735

Mr. Rohan said the deal might help establish Yahoo as an advertising network that is an alternative to Google. "Yahoo was clearly able to play the fear-of-Google card," he said.

Microsoft, too, has been trying to establish its own advertising network and is reported to have bid for eBay's business.

Google, which is by far the leader in selling text ads for other Web sites, has been moving to sell graphic ads as well, and said this week that it would start selling video advertisements for other sites.

Google's approach is to create an automated auction in which marketers enter their own advertisements and bid for placement. Yahoo, which uses such an auction for text ads, will sell graphic ads on eBay through its traditional sales force, which negotiates rates with major marketers.

EBay will also offer its customers a new version of its browser toolbar that will encourage people to use Yahoo search and other services. Yahoo agreed to offer eBay's PayPal payment service as an option for customers buying goods and services through Yahoo's site.

The companies said they would explore developing features that would let people click on ads on either of their sites and be connected with the advertiser through either eBay's Skype voice chat service or the voice calling feature of Yahoo Messenger.

EBay's shares rose to $33.88, up $3.68. Yahoo rose $1.13 to $32.92

Ms. Whitman said the deal did not mean eBay would cut back its huge spending on Google advertisements. Search and other advertising brings in about 40 percent of eBay's traffic.

She said she did not see the competition from search engines and free classified sites as undercutting eBay's position with consumers.

"There is a lot more to running a marketplace than getting a lot of listings," she said. "There is trust and safety, and payments and reputation. That stands eBay in good stead."

ENVIRONMENT:

GAO Report Faults Voluntary Programs To Cut Air Pollution (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Bush administration's voluntary programs to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by industry have yet to deliver promised results, according to a report issued yesterday by the Government Accountability Office.

The 51-page report, which was requested by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), highlights shortcomings in two projects aimed at encouraging the private sector to cut emissions linked to global warming. The Environmental Protection Agency sponsors "Climate Leaders," while the Energy Department oversees "Climate VISION."

Both encourage polluters to cut their greenhouse-gas releases, but in each case, according to the study, the administration has failed to ensure that participating firms set firm reduction targets or meet their stated goals.

"EPA and DOE each expect participants in their voluntary emissions reduction programs to complete a number of actions; however, participants' progress toward completing those actions, as well as the agencies' efforts to track accomplishments, has varied," the report said.

The United States, unlike most developed countries, has repeatedly resisted mandatory curbs on carbon dioxide and other gases linked to climate change, instead relying on voluntary programs.

This week, Bush's senior environmental adviser, James L. Connaughton, told an audience at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, that the country does not have to regulate such pollutants because it is on track to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 18 percent relative to the gross domestic product by 2012.

"Why do you need a mandate to deliver an outcome you're already going to get?" he asked.

The GAO report, however, indicated that many firms in the voluntary reduction programs have not established specific targets. As of November 2005, only 38 of the 74 firms in the EPA program had set reduction goals, according to the report. In the Energy Department program, 11 of the 15 participating trade groups have established targets, and five have reported on their emissions. The DOE has no deadline for emissions reporting.

DOJ_NMG_0029736

"This report makes clear that letting the fox guard the henhouse is not working," Kerry said in a statement. "It's unbelievable enough that President Bush refuses to accept the very clear scientific evidence on greenhouse gas emissions, but now he can't even get his own non-action plan right."

EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood responded in a statement that, to date, half of the 87 organizations that joined its Climate Leaders program have completed inventories of their emissions "and have set aggressive public reduction commitments." The agency "continuously tracks the progress" of the participants, she said.

DOE spokeswoman Megan Barnett said the department is taking steps to better track cuts in emissions under its program.

House Votes For Oil Drilling In Alaska (USAT)

USA Today, May 26, 2006

The House of Representatives voted Thursday to allow oil exploration on a small portion of Alaska's 19 million-acre Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The vote was 225-201 to allow drilling on 1.5 million acres that federal geologists estimate hold 5.4 billion to 16 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

Supporters cited gasoline prices and U.S. reliance on foreign oil. Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., said an additional 1 million barrels a day would reduce the need for imports. About 60% of the U.S. daily consumption of 21 million barrels of oil comes from abroad.

Rep. Lois Capps, D-Calif., and other opponents prefer conservation and alternative energy sources and cite concerns over the welfare of wildlife in the refuge.

In the Senate, drilling backers have been unable to get the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

Congress approved drilling in the refuge in 1994, but President Clinton vetoed the bill.

The mine safety bill that passed the Senate this week hit a snag in the House. Rep. George Miller of California, the top Democrat on the House committee that oversees labor issues, blocked the bill from being considered under an expedited process. Miller said he wants it amended. Among the changes he wants is a requirement that miners have air supplies that last two days rather than two hours. Miller released a statement of support for his changes from a lawyer for relatives of three of the 12 miners killed in the Sago Mine accident in January in West Virginia.

The bill won't be considered until after lawmakers return from their holiday break June 6. Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., said Miller's objection was “a huge disappointment for miners who are relying on us to help protect them.”

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he is not optimistic the world body will adopt U.S.-led proposals to impose more fiscal discipline and other changes by June 30, when the interim U.N. budget runs out of money. Bolton cited the “culture of inaction” at the United Nations.

The United States and its allies, who pay 87% of the budget, want more efficiency, transparency and accountability. But some developing countries say Secretary-General Kofi Annan would have too much power.

“We're not going to continue to throw away money at an organization that has no credibility,” said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., cautioned against precipitous action because the United Nations supports many U.S. interests.

President Bush will meet with Rwandan President Paul Kagame at the White House on Tuesday to discuss AIDS and economic issues affecting east Africa.

Rwanda is part of the U.S. emergency plan for AIDS relief, economic development, trade and investment under the African Growth and Opportunity Act.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said first lady Laura Bush will represent the United States at a major United Nations AIDS conference next week in New York City. The conference will chart progress made over the past five years in combating AIDS and HIV.

House OKs Oil Drilling In Alaska Refuge (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, May 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029737

Citing the public outcry over $3-a-gallon gasoline and America's heavy reliance on foreign oil, the House on Thursday voted to open an Alaska wildlife refuge to oil drilling, knowing the prospects for Senate approval were slim.

Drilling proponents argued that the refuge on Alaska's North Slope would provide 1 million barrels a day of additional domestic oil at peak production and reduce the need for imports.

But opponents to developing what environmentalists argue is a pristine area where drilling will harm caribou, polar bears and migratory birds, said Congress should pursue conservation and alternative energy sources that would save more oil than would be tapped from the refuge.

The House voted 225-201 to direct the Interior Department to open oil leases on the coastal strip of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge — an area of 1.5 million acres that is thought likely to hold about 11 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

But the action may be little more than symbolic. Arctic refuge development, while approved by the House five times, repeatedly has been blocked in the Senate where drilling proponents have been unable to muster the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

"We need to develop energy, here at home. ... We can't say no to everything," declared Rep. Richard Pombo (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., who pressed for a House vote on opening the refuge that lies east of the declining Prudhoe Bay oil fields 200 miles north of the Arctic Circle.

Access to ANWR's oil has been a key part of President Bush's energy agenda, although over the last five years he's been unable to convince Congress of its merits. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Thursday urged the Senate to pass a drilling measure "so we can strengthen our nation's energy security."

The refuge was set aside for protection in 1960 and expanded by Congress to 19 million acres in 1980 with a stipulation that its oil — limited to the coastal strip — could be developed, but only if Congress allows it.

The federal government would share revenues equally with the state.

While oil companies have long eyed the area where federal geologists estimate anywhere from 5.4 billion to as much as 16 billion barrels of oil may be recoverable, environmentalists consider one of its top priorities for protection.

"There are simply some places that should be off limits to drilling. The Arctic refuge should be one of them," said Rep. Lois Capps (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif.

The coastal strip is a calving area for caribou, home to polar bears and musk oxen, and a seasonal destination for millions of migratory birds.

Drilling opponents cited an Energy Department analysis that ANWR's oil would have little impact on gasoline prices and reduce imports by only a few percentage points. Currently 60 percent of the 21 million barrels of oil used daily in the United States comes from imports.

Advocates for opening the refuge to energy development said the tundra and its wildlife can be protected using modern drilling techniques and environmental restrictions. They argued the additional domestic oil would help move the country toward more energy independence.

Congress approved drilling in the refuge in 1995, but President Clinton vetoed the bill.

Had Clinton not issued his veto "we would have had a million barrels of oil today," said Rep. Don Young (news, bio, voting record), R-Alaska. "We should be drilling off shore, we should be drilling in the Rockies and most of all we should be drilling in the Arctic refuge."

Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (news, bio, voting record), R-N.Y., countered that had Congress passed improved auto fuel economy measures 11 years ago when they were considered, today "we would save far more oil than ANWR would produce."

"This Congress hasn't voted on a single conservation measure since gasoline hit $3 a gallon," said Boehlert.

"Rather than debating how we could increase the fuel efficiency standards (of cars) over the next few years, we are debating about a bill that won't produce the first barrel of oil for 10 years and it will come from a pristine wildlife refuge," complained Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., a leading drilling opponent.

The vote fell heavily along party lines. Twenty-seven Democrats joined the Republican majority in support of the legislation. Only 30 Republicans opposed the measure.

___

DOJ_NMG_0029738

On the Net:

Arctic National Wildlife Refuge: http://arctic.fws.gov/

House Votes To Allow Drilling In Arctic Refuge (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The House voted 225 to 201 yesterday to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling, with proponents arguing that new domestic production will ease the nation's energy crunch.

The measure marks the 12th time since 1995 that the House has voted in favor of opening the refuge to oil and gas development. But it has little concrete impact because its backers have not obtained the 60 Senate votes needed to surmount a filibuster.

"Once again, the House has voted to put Americans to work producing more of our own energy," said House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), author of the bill to allow drilling on the land, which is home to caribou and other migrating species. "And, once again, liberals defied the common-sense principle of supply and demand by voting no. That's a great way to keep prices on the rise."

Twenty-seven Democrats voted for Pombo's bill, which proponents say would add 10.4 billion barrels to the nation's oil reserves, and 30 Republicans voted against it.

House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.), a key opponent, said that if the nation had adopted stricter fuel economy standards for vehicles when they were first proposed 11 years ago, they would have saved more oil than could be produced in the Arctic refuge. Mileage standards have remained the same for 30 years.

Rep. Tom Udall (D-N.M.), also a Resources Committee member, called "The American-Made Energy and Good Jobs Act" a shortsighted approach to address rising gasoline prices.

"This shows once again how bankrupt the majority is in finding new ideas to solve our energy crisis. Drilling in ANWR seems to be their solution for everything, when what we really need is a bold and comprehensive national energy policy for the 21st century."

Environmentalists, who argue that drilling will harm wildlife on Alaska's North Slope, said they are confident that moderate Republicans will join with many Senate Democrats to block the proposal.

House Votes To Allow Drilling In Alaska Refuge (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — With gasoline prices around $3 a gallon as the Memorial Day weekend approaches, the House again voted Thursday to approve drilling for oil and gas in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

It was at least the 12th time that the House had voted to allow energy exploration in a small piece of the preserve's 19 million acres along the northern coastal plain of Alaska. The final tally was 225 to 201, with 27 Democrats joining the majority and 30 Republicans voting against.

But given the Senate's recent disposition toward drilling in the Arctic, the vote may be little more than symbolic.

Since 1995, when Congress passed an arctic drilling bill and President Bill Clinton vetoed it, Senate proponents of drilling have failed to gather the 60 votes needed to end a filibuster against it. The outcome is expected to be no different this year.

Drilling in the Arctic has become a major fault line in the debate over how to wean the nation from foreign oil and bring down gasoline prices.

Backers of the drilling contend that the promise of 10.3 billion barrels of oil would lead to greater energy independence and job creation. Opponents say that the risk of spills and other environmental damage outweighs the benefits and that drilling for oil delays the development of alternative fuels.

"A vote against energy production in ANWR is a vote for increasing our dependence on foreign oil and sending good American jobs overseas — two things we simply cannot do anymore," said Representative Richard W. Pombo, a California Republican who is chairman of the House Resources Committee and the bill's sponsor.

DOJ_NMG_0029739

But Representative Alcee L. Hastings, Democrat of Florida, said the bill represented "the triumph of politics over geology" and would not reduce the price of gas at the pump.

Representative John W. Olver, Democrat of Massachusetts, said, "It will be five years at best, and probably eight years, before the first barrel of oil flows" if drilling is allowed.

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman applauded the House vote, but the administration was dealt a setback on Wednesday night, when the House voted on spending for one of President Bush's signature energy initiatives, the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership.

In providing $24.4 billion for the Energy Department — about $300 million more than the administration requested and $327 million above current spending — lawmakers gave Mr. Bush $120 million for the partnership, less than half the $250 million he had sought.

Under the plan, the United States and Russia would provide reactor fuel to other countries and reclaim the spent fuel to assure that it would not be used for weapons. The administration is advancing the plan as a way to promote expanding the use of nuclear fuel in the United States.

Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate energy committee, vowed to reverse the House, saying, "I plan to restore full funding for G.N.E.P. and go looking for more."

House Again OKs Drilling In Arctic Refuge (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

Jittery about voters' sour mood over high gasoline prices less than six months before congressional elections, the Republican-controlled House on Thursday passed an old favorite: legislation seeking to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

The measure, which was approved by a 225-201 vote, faces long odds in the Senate, where it has been blocked repeatedly by filibusters. A Senate GOP aide called the measure "DOA" in that chamber.

But House Republicans wanted to return to their districts for Memorial Day able to say that they had acted on energy legislation before the summer vacation season begins.

"It's an election year, isn't it?" Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, D-Fla., remarked.

The drilling measure is the first in a series of energy proposals expected to come before Congress in coming weeks, now that pump prices have become a campaign issue in the battle for control of Congress this year. Both parties have stepped up efforts to highlight their differences on energy policy.

During the debate Thursday, Republicans accused Democrats of opposing efforts to increase domestic fuel supplies. "Had President Clinton and the Democrats in Congress not blocked exploration in ANWR 10 years ago, a greater supply of American oil could have been available today," Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, argued, citing Clinton's 1995 veto of a budget bill that included a drilling proposal.

Democrats portrayed the Arctic drilling measure as a sop to Big Oil that would endanger an environmental treasure. "Everyone knows this bill is dead on arrival in the U.S. Senate," said Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo. "If the Republicans are serious about energy security, they would offer up real solutions -- like increasing alternative fuels and making our cars and light trucks more fuel-efficient."

GOP leaders were eager to put Democrats on the record in advance of the fall elections, even though 30 Republicans joined 170 Democrats and one independent in opposing the drilling.

Although the House has previously voted to authorize drilling in the refuge, Republican leaders predicted that with gas prices now above $3 a gallon, voters would pay closer attention to the vote.

"This is about the law of supply and demand," said Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Texas. "By increasing oil supply here in the U.S., we can impact rising energy costs in the long run and decrease our dependency on foreign sources of energy."

But drilling opponents contend that it would take years for Arctic oil to reach the market, and even then, it would have only a negligible impact on prices.

DOJ_NMG_0029740

Opening a portion of the 19.6-million-acre refuge in Alaska's northeast corner to energy exploration has long been among the most contentious U.S. environmental issues. President Bush has pushed for allowing the drilling since taking office, calling it critical to national security and economic growth.

Proponents have repeatedly tried to pass the drilling measure, attaching it to budget and defense bills and seeking to entice more lawmakers to vote for it by offering to use government royalties from energy production for such things as home-heating subsidies and aid to the steel industries.

Federal estimates say the equivalent of 10 billion barrels of oil lies beneath the refuge's tundra, though opponents argue that only about 3 billion barrels are economically recoverable. The U.S. consumes about 20 million barrels of oil a day.

Many Democrats and some Republicans advocated greater conservation measures, such as tougher miles-per-gallon rules for cars.

"Astonishingly, this Congress has not voted on a single conservation measure since gasoline hit $3 a gallon," said Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y.

But Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., the House Resources Committee chairman and the drilling measure's chief sponsor, ridiculed Democrats for promoting energy-saving technology without considering the immediate need to produce more domestic oil.

"Your response to everything has been 'no,' " he said. "You've got this pie in the sky (idea) that we're going to invent a 100-mile-per gallon carburetor and all of a sudden our problems are going to go away."

Death In The Mines, Action In Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Another mine disaster is finally spurring Congress to pass long overdue repairs to the nation's threadbare safety laws. Mandates for such obvious necessities as extra oxygen supplies for trapped miners languished after an initial burst of concern over the disaster in January that killed 12 miners in Sago, W.Va. But the explosion last weekend in Kentucky that killed five miners has been followed by quick Senate approval of a bill ordering extra oxygen, more responsive rescue teams, and stronger underground barriers to seal off danger zones from workers.

The Republican leaders in the House, lagging behind the Senate, hurried to catch up. But the sad truth is that safety equipment and rescue procedures have been scandalously neglected for years under company-friendly regulations that have been laxly enforced by government agencies stocked with political appointees who have come from the coal industry.

The Senate bill does at least force companies to invest in new emergency communication and tracking equipment and to face tougher penalties and possibly a shutdown, rare now as companies let fines pile up. It also mandates the doubling of a miner's emergency oxygen packet to two hours, plus the stashing of extra oxygen along escape routes. In the two headlined disasters, some miners survived explosions only to die for lack of oxygen.

Other changes — aimed at the 11-hour delay in starting a rescue attempt in Sago — would require rescue teams to be nearer to each mine for faster response, and to be protected from damage liability. Some companies have actually hesitated to have mine rescue teams for fear of being sued. The Senate bill only begins to repair the problem. But it is preferable to pro-industry proposals in the House to require drug testing for miners — as if the victims, not government and industry, were to blame for miners' highest death rate in 20 years.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Admits Selling Stolen Prescription Drugs Worth $7.3 Million (AP)

AP, May 26, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) - A former drug distributor admitted Thursday that he sold $7.3 million worth of prescription drugs that he knew were stolen from warehouses and trucks.

Gregory Broccoli pleaded guilty to five conspiracy charges, acknowledging wrongdoing from 2002 through 2004 at a company he operated in Jersey City and Elizabeth called Providers Plus.

DOJ_NMG_0029741

Broccoli, 39, of Staten Island, N.Y., is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with a federal investigation that began in 2003.

The FBI investigation and guilty pleas from the defendants exposed a network of thieves and crooked wholesalers who obtained prescription drugs through illegal means, created fraudulent documents, and then reintroduced the prescription drugs into the marketplace, federal prosecutors in New Jersey said.

Broccoli admitted that to sell the prescription drugs, he created bogus documents that are required to certify the origin and sales history of shipments.

Each conspiracy count carries up to five years in prison. Broccoli is to be sentenced Sept. 5 by U.S. District Judge Dennis M. Cavanaugh.

Drug Cocktail Causing Overdoses From Philadelphia To Chicago (AP)

By Sarah Karush

AP, May 25, 2006

DETROIT (AP) - Larry, a 53-year-old heroin addict, has two cardinal rules: Never shoot up alone, and only shoot up one at a time. If one person overdoses, "you need someone there to bring you back," he said.

Larry, who asked that his last name not be used because of his illegal habit, recited his rules after hearing that a mixture of heroin and a powerful painkiller has been killing unsuspecting users who believe they are taking pure heroin.

Officials from Philadelphia to Chicago have reported deaths from the drug, called fentanyl and considered 80 times more powerful than morphine. In the Detroit area - the apparent hub of the problem with more than 100 confirmed cases since last fall and about two dozen suspected ones in the last week - officials from the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are investigating, and community organizations are scrambling to get the word out to users.

The CDC says it has no national statistics on fentanyl deaths and has only been asked to investigate in Michigan. But individual reports from a scattering of states indicate the drug is widespread.

In Philadelphia, there have been 20 confirmed deaths from heroin mixed with fentanyl since April 17, and test results are pending for another eight suspected cases, the city health department said.

In New Jersey, where officials first raised the alarm about the drug in April, there have been about 10 confirmed fentanyl deaths and another 10 to 20 suspected cases since last month, according to the state's poison control center.

"This is a huge, huge problem," said Stephen Marcus, medical director of the New Jersey Poison Control Center.

In Chicago, 30 people have died from fentanyl or fentanyl-laced heroin from September 2005 to March 2006, said Christopher Hoyt, a spokesman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in that city. Another 23 suspected cases were reported in April and May.

In Wayne County, which includes Detroit, Medical Examiner Carl J. Schmidt said he began noticing an uptick in fentanyl-related deaths in September. In total, medical examiners found 63 people in Wayne County with fentanyl in their blood when they died last year. From the beginning of 2006 to mid-April, there were 70 such cases.

But county officials did not begin treating fentanyl as a crisis until last week, when the number of overdoses began to soar.

"Sometimes divining what the role of fentanyl is in an individual's death is more an art than a science," Schmidt said, noting that drug users often have multiple substances in their blood.

Still, it was clear something was amiss when 12 people died of overdoses May 18-19, Schmidt said. Over the next four days, there were 15 more fatal overdoses, Schmidt said. The county of 2 million typically sees two to three drug deaths a day.

Fentanyl is a suspected culprit in most of the recent deaths, though that won't be confirmed until after the toxicology results come back in four to six weeks.

The drug kills by inhibiting respiration, Schmidt said. "It literally suppresses your natural impulse to breathe," he said.

Before the recent surge, Wayne County saw 20 to 30 fentanyl deaths a year, Schmidt said. Those cases tended to be severely ill people with legitimate prescriptions for fentanyl patches who committed suicide by putting on many patches at once or the occasional person who had stolen the drug, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029742

The fentanyl behind the current problem appears to be manufactured illegally and mixed with heroin long before it gets to the user, Schmidt said.

In one case, three people found dead in a car last month took fentanyl not with heroin, but with cocaine. Schmidt said he fears that could indicate a new trend.

Detroit police spokesman James Tate said the department is following up on several leads about where the fentanyl is originating. So far, however, there is no indication that it is being manufactured locally, he said.

Organizations that run needle exchanges and other health programs for drug users are trying to spread the word. "Is your friend turning blue?" reads one flier that describes what to do in an emergency.

Officials emphasize that there is help for people who have overdosed if they get to an emergency room immediately.

"Treatment is available, and treatment works," said Michele Reid, medical director of the Detroit-Wayne County Community Mental Health Agency and chairwoman of the newly created Wayne County fentanyl work group.

But to some drug users, the warnings are in fact an advertisement.

"When they hear about people OD-ing somewhere, they want to go there" to get the more potent drugs, said Larry, the Detroit heroin user.

That's what New Jersey officials found last month. "The drug addicts were actually looking for the drug, so what we did was actually counterproductive," said Marcus, the poison control director.

Like Larry, 37-year-old Latonja, of Detroit, said she would do her best to stay away from the tainted heroin by sticking to dealers she knows. However, she acknowledged it may be difficult, since users can never know for sure what they're buying.

"We're not analyzers when we're trying to shoot our dope," said Latonja, who also asked that her last name not be used. "We're like, 'OK, it's time to get happy.'"

Associated Press writers Maryclaire Dale in Philadelphia, Geoff Mulvihill in Mount Laurel, N.J., and Michael Tarm in Chicago contributed to this report.

A Look At A Drug Cocktail Problem Around The Country (AP)

AP, May 25, 2006

A look at problems reported around the country related to a mixture of heroin and the powerful painkiller fentanyl that has been killing unsuspecting users who believe they are taking pure heroin.

WAYNE COUNTY, MICH.:

-The county that includes Detroit has the most fentanyl-linked deaths. The drug was found in 63 people who died last year and 70 this year, through mid-April.

-The county saw 27 fatal overdoses over six days ending Tuesday. Fentanyl is suspected but not confirmed.

REST OF MICHIGAN:

-State health officials say the problem appears to be limited to the Detroit area.

-Not all medical examiners in the state routinely screen for fentanyl in drug deaths, so the problem may not be apparent.

PHILADELPHIA:

-20 confirmed deaths from heroin mixed with fentanyl since April 17; test results pending for another eight suspected cases. In the same five-week period in 2005, there were seven drug-related deaths of any kind.

CHICAGO:

-30 fentanyl-linked deaths from September 2005 to March 2006. Another 23 suspected cases in April and May.

NEW JERSEY:

-Since April, about 10 confirmed fentanyl deaths; 10 to 20 suspected cases.

DELAWARE:

-Five suspected drug deaths over two weeks beginning at the end of April, awaiting test results.

DOJ_NMG_0029743

Sources: Wayne County, Michigan Department of Community Health, Philadelphia Health Department, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, New Jersey Poison Control Center, Delaware Department of Health and Social Services.

FENTANYL DEATHS RISE: Mom: Cops Failed To Act On OD (FREEP)

By Ben Schmitt, Amber Hunt And Kim Norris, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, May 25, 2006

Son died last year; now drug is crisis

When Justin Wortmann's life ended in December in a White Castle parking lot after he took a dose of heroin, it was a silent warning about an unprecedented crisis now bubbling over in metro Detroit.

His mother, Janice Wortmann of Plymouth Township, learned from autopsy results 8 weeks later that the killer actually was a drug called fentanyl. She called police in Taylor, where her son died Dec. 27.

"The detective told me they didn't have the manpower to look for a dealer, that they were on every street corner," she said.

Police responded that they tried, to no avail.

Now, the body count of people suspected of overdosing on a mix of heroin and fentanyl is rising -- and an urgent search is on.

Wortmann, 47, wonders whether the death of her 26-year-old son could have been prevented.

"Maybe if they took me seriously they could have gone to the source," Wortmann said Wednesday. "Maybe this wouldn't be happening now."

Local toxicologists say they've seen a steady increase in fentanyl-related deaths since last fall, but nothing prepared them for the jump that began last week: At least 23 people have died in Wayne County since May 18 from what investigators believe was a lethal combination of heroin or cocaine and fentanyl, a prescription painkiller typically given to terminally ill patients for pain.

Now, as Michiganders gear up for the long holiday weekend and outdoor activities, county and Detroit officials are scrambling to get the word out about the drug's dangers.

Workers are distributing flyers in areas known to be frequented by drug users that warn of the dangers of using heroin or cocaine laced with fentanyl, which they might not be aware they are buying.

If the numbers from the past week prove true, fentanyl experts agree: The rash of Wayne County deaths is unprecedented.

"It's amazing," said Bruce Goldberger, director of toxicology at the University of Florida, who has published several studies on fentanyl abuse. "I've seen fentanyl deaths, but not in terms of the outbreak you have."

As a result, Wayne County Prosecutor Kym Worthy said Wednesday that her office is prepared to charge with murder the dealers of the deadly mix of drugs, and authorities acknowledged they're navigating new territory as they hunt for the dealers.

Tracking down the dealers won't be easy, officials said.

Detroit Police spokesman James Tate said police are fielding numerous tips about the sale of the heroin-fentanyl mix. No arrests were made as of Wednesday.

Lawrence Meyer, chief of field operations for the Wayne County Sheriff's Office, said he has never seen a similar case in his 30 years in law enforcement. He and other investigators first had to learn about fentanyl itself, and then how it's distributed.

"We're just at the point where we're sorting all the records," he said. "Our investigators are pulling records ... on the victims and we're trying to establish a nexus with a distribution point or source.

"We're talking to victims' relatives, their associates, their friends. We're just at the preliminary stages."

Law enforcement and medical officials said the most likely source is an illegal lab.

"It's probably clandestinely manufactured," said Daniel Isenschmid, chief toxicologist with the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office. He said a change in the fentanyl-to-heroin ratio might explain the rising body count.

Goldberger agreed the fentanyl is probably homemade. "You can synthesize it if you're a good chemist," he said.

Deaths linked to fentanyl-laced drugs have been reported in smaller numbers in cities across the country, including Chicago and Philadelphia, and investigated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency since last fall.

DOJ_NMG_0029744

Investigators from the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention arrived Monday in Detroit to gather information. They're expected to stay at least through the week -- and possibly longer -- to comb through medical records and toxicology reports and to conduct interviews.

"This is the first time we have taken a look at heroin overdoses connected to fentanyl," said Bernadette Burden, a CDC spokeswoman, who said the agency typically doesn't give a time frame for investigations. "This is new territory for CDC investigators."

Authorities learned of another Wayne County drug death Wednesday that might also be linked to fentanyl.

County officials would not release the names of the victims Wednesday or the specifics about where they died, offering no explanation. They insisted the Free Press file a Freedom of Information Act request.

The true death count won't be known until toxicology reports are completed in the next few weeks, but officials with the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office said some of the bodies showed telltale signs -- including syringes still stuck in victims' arms, indicating the type of sudden death that a fentanyl overdose causes.

Oakland County confirmed 20 such deaths from Sept. 28 through early April. Most of those deaths were from Genesee County, which does not have its own medical examiner.

Drug-related deaths in Macomb County have risen in recent weeks, said Medical Examiner Daniel Spitz, but he won't know if the deaths are linked to fentanyl until toxicology reports come back in another week or so.

In the Taylor case involving Justin Wortmann, from Dearborn, police said they searched for the drug dealer but were unsuccessful.

"We understand she's a grieving mother, but detectives worked on the case to get to the bottom of it," said Jac Desrosiers, Taylor's director of police services. "It's hard to accept the fact that it happened, but our detectives don't let these cases slide."

CDC investigators have to confirm the deaths truly are linked to fentanyl, and then they'll help state and local authorities develop guidelines to try to halt the carnage.

Gary Kunsman, chief forensic toxicologist for the Oakland County Medical Examiner's Office, has been tracking fentanyl-related deaths since Sept. 28, when the first of seven victims arrived at the morgue in a three-week period.

"It's been sort of steady since," Kunsman said. He said three of the 20 total cases came from the Pontiac area; the rest were from Genesee County.

Kunsman reported the cases to the crime lab in the county sheriff's office so the lab could test for the potentially lethal combination.

Isenschmid said he also noticed an increase in fentanyl-related deaths in Wayne County beginning last fall.

Isenschmid's office usually confirms fentanyl as the cause of death through standard toxicology tests, which can detect the drug in "high-therapeutic" doses -- or amounts at which patients might legitimately be using the drug.

In response to the recent deaths, however, the office plans to begin a new screening test that will detect fentanyl faster and in smaller quantities.

"We'll have the results of a screen in less than a week," Isenschmid said.

Janice Wortmann, whose son died in December, said she has relived the loss because of the deaths in the past week.

"This should not be happening at all. It shouldn't have happened to my son," she said. "I know exactly what these parents are going through."

Possible Sources Of Fentanyl (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, May 25, 2006

The drug fentanyl, a potent painkiller often prescribed to terminally ill patients, landed on the streets years ago, authorities said. But it's now more popular than ever before. And authorities don't know where it's coming from.

The drug usually is prescribed as patches -- dubbed "pain patches" by cancer patients -- or on lollipop-like sticks, though it also can be administered in liquid form during surgeries.

Law enforcement officials investigating fentanyl-related deaths in Wayne County say drug dealers could be crystallizing prescription fentanyl to use as a cutting agent for heroin and cocaine, but they doubt it.

They believe someone is manufacturing the drug in an illegal lab.

"It's probably clandestinely manufactured," said Daniel Isenschmid, chief toxicologist with the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office.

As with other painkillers, fetanyl is strictly regulated. Hospice workers are instructed to destroy whatever remains after a patient dies, and they're told to slice up used pain patches with scissors so that excess fentanyl can't be removed and used inappropriately.

That's why experts such as Dr. Bruce Goldberger, director of toxicology at the University of Florida, say the fentanyl killing people in Wayne County is likely homemade.

"You can synthesize it if you're a good chemist," he said.

A change in the fentanyl-to-heroin ratio might explain the rising body count, Isenschmid said. At least 23 people have died since May 18.

"Fentanyl is 80 times more potent than morphine," he said. "One of the problems is that users don't know how to dose themselves."

Fentanyl Deaths Hit 33 In A Week (DN)

Detroit News, May 26, 2006

The Wayne County death toll attributed to fentanyl-laced drugs has reached 33 people in one week, putting Metro Detroit at the epicenter of a national health concern that reaches into several other states.

There have been at least 200 confirmed deaths in five states attributed to the painkiller mixed with heroin or cocaine, with 130 of them in Wayne County since January 2005. That total doesn't include the 33 Wayne deaths from May 18 through Wednesday, which are suspected but not yet confirmed by toxicology tests.

"It's a lot bigger than we thought it was in the beginning," said John Kashani of the Poison Control Center in New Jersey, where 30 suspected fentanyl-related deaths occurred in the past month, about the same as in Philadelphia.

Nowhere is concern higher than in Metro Detroit.

"The officials of this county should have taken this on a long time ago," said Randy Richter, whose son was found dead in Canton on Feb. 27. "It is absolutely ridiculous to hear they didn't know it was a problem because they knew it was a problem. How many lives could have been saved?"

Richter's son's death was among nine over three days this winter, a Detroit News review of toxicology reports found.

Richter was told his son, 18, was the 30th person to die this year because of fentanyl. He's livid officials waited until Friday to make the concern public. He suspects officials kept the deaths quiet for Super Bowl XL, held in Detroit on Feb. 5, a charge county officials emphatically deny.

"We've never done that and never will we do that," said Sharon Banks, spokeswoman for the Wayne County executive office, who called that suggestion "offensive and irresponsible."

The surge in Wayne County fentanyl-related deaths began in August 2005 and climbed steadily, according to health records.

Public health officials put out an alert last weekend when 12 people died Thursday and Friday.

Most of the victims are believed to have used heroin mixed with fentanyl, which is 80-100 times more potent than heroin and can cause rapid death through respiratory failure.

This year's victims had fentanyl concentrations in their blood ranging from .002 to as high as .19, according to toxicology reports from the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office reviewed by The News. Victims were a mix of men and women, black and white.

Before this week, the highest concentration of deaths occurred Feb. 27, 28 and March 1, when nine people died, including Richter's son, health reports show. Of those, two had lethal amounts of the drug in their blood of .11 or higher and others had high levels.

While some support more public awareness, others fear publicity will have the opposite effect.

DOJ_NMG_0029746

"One of the concerns many treatment providers have is this: Are heroin users going to be seeking out fentanyl for their desire to get the ultimate high?" said Christopher Parks of the Neighborhood Services Organization. "They heard people are dying from it so it must be a potent drug."

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention officials are trying to develop a profile of those most likely to die from the painkiller, so they can target groups with educational information.

County officials say they have heard the fentanyl may be manufactured in a lab, but law enforcement says they are investigating all angles, including whether health officials may be stealing it.

Fentanyl is a synthetic opiate used for pain relief and anesthesia. Therapeutic concentrations in the bloodstream range between .001 and .01, officials say.

"You are basically playing Russian roulette by using this," said Wayne County Deputy Chief Medical Examiner Cheryl Loewe.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Operation Street sweep (CA)

Commercial Appeal, May 26, 2006

Just two hours into Thursday's roundup, two teams of officers supervised by Memphis Police Lt. Charles 'Bubba' Cox had picked up four of 10 suspects on his list of those wanted on state or federal warrants.

By late afternoon, 48 of 67 people indicted on drug and gun charges were behind bars in Operation Street Sweep. The sweep was a joint effort by Memphis Organized Crime Unit officers, Shelby County Sheriff's deputies, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives (ATF) and deputy U.S. Marshals.

Advertisement

Despite the atypical ease his teams had finding and arresting the suspects Thursday morning, Cox cautioned his people to stay on their toes.

"You don't want to become complacent," he said. "You take them one at a time. ... Violence has become more prevalent."

Many of those being sought by roughly 130 officers, deputies and federal agents were repeat offenders, many gang members.

"They go armed," said Memphis Police department spokesman Sgt. Vince Higgins. "They have expressed a desire not to go back to jail."

Dogs accompanied the teams to search for drugs and chase down suspects known for running when the cops show up.

And though no suspect fought with the police, several tried to run. At least one hid in an attic.

"I'm on pins and needles every time we do one of these," Higgins said. The officers face the potential of "bullets, dogs, someone with a knife" every time they go through a door.

Thirty of the suspects were being sought on federal indictments returned this week, and 24 are wanted for state crimes, mainly drug offenses. The rest were wanted on previous warrants.

At their first stop, one team, led by Joe Hoing, a 32-year Memphis Police veteran assigned to the DEA drug task force, caught up with Nicholas Hull, 28, named in six counts of crack possession.

Hull, a known Gangster Disciple wanted for drug sales, was holed up at 1316 Inglewood in South Memphis with several friends.

The friends were allowed to leave, since none had outstanding warrants.

After prolonged harping by one member of the group, Hoing ordered the group to disperse.

"The clock is ticking. You have 30 seconds to leave, or you're coming with me," he told them. They left quickly.

A five-shot .22-caliber Derringer was found in the house, and a Dodge Intrepid with stolen tags was towed away.

The other team under Cox had to ram down the door at 1421 Hemlock to get the cuffs on Walter Holmes, 45, charged with three counts of crack possession.

DOJ_NMG_0029747

Holmes joined Hull in the back of a squad car. The two were taken to booking stations in Tobey Park where they were photographed and fingerprinted.

The array of charges included impersonating a federal officer, possession by a felon of firearms, possession of body armor, and crack, heroin, and powder cocaine possession.

Brandon Clayton was indicted in federal court for allegedly impersonating an ATF agent and using his assumed status to get discounts on rent and sales tax exemptions on the purchase of communications equipment.

The suspects ranged in age from 18 to 55 and included several known gang members.

17 Arrested In Regional Drug Sting (AP)

AP, May 25, 2006

Seventeen people from Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts have been arrested on drug charges after a seven-month undercover investigation.

Edward Arias and Jose Ortiz, both of Lawrence, Mass., were indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine by a federal grand jury in New Hampshire.

They supplied more than 150 pounds of cocaine to southern Maine, said Kittery, Maine, Police Chief Edward Strong. Up to 15 more people could be arrested as the investigation continues, he said yesterday. Strong helped lead the multi-agency investigation.

York, Maine, Police Detective Thomas Cryan said he hopes the arrests will slow the drug trade in the area and serve as a warning to other dealers.

"Maybe this will let them know that we are looking. Either way, I think it's going to be a busy summer," he said.

Demetries Agiasotelis, 29, of Rollinsford, was indicted separately on a federal charge of conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

Six others also face federal drug charges, all in U.S. District Court in New Hampshire:

q Chris Knight, 24, of Sanford, Maine, was charged with distribution of cocaine.

q Chris Cote, 25, of Sanford, Maine, was charged with distribution of cocaine and marijuana.

q Michael Ducharme, 23, of Milton, Mass., was charged with distribution of marijuana.

q Mouen Chan, 26, of Sanford, was charged with distribution of cocaine.

q Virak Tin, 20, of Berwick, Maine, was charged with distribution of marijuana.

q Sothear Kim, 25, of Sanford, was charged with distribution of cocaine.

The police arrested eight more suspects on state drug charges: Trevor Small, 28, of Eliot, Maine; Alan Hall, 50, of Kittery; Erin Glen, 26, of South Berwick, Maine; Thomas Millette, 40, of York; Justin Bellissimo, 25, of Berwick; Kyle Clark, 19, of Newburyport, Mass.; Donald Crocker, 25, of Wells, Maine; and William Burke, 38, of York.

They will be arraigned in York District Court, Strong said.

The investigation was led by the York and Kittery police departments and the New Hampshire office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, assisted by the Portsmouth Police and the New England State Police Information Network.

Kittery Chief: Arrests 'put A Dent' In Drug Trade (PHN)

By Deborah McDermott

Portsmouth (NH) Herald News, May 26, 2006

News this week that 17 people are facing federal and state cocaine and marijuana distribution charges has "definitely put a dent" in the local drug trade - from significant suppliers right down to street dealers, said Kittery Police Chief Edward Strong.

Kittery and York police departments Tuesday announced the arrests and, in many cases, indictments of four different sets of dealers, each facing an array of distribution and trafficking charges.

The joint investigation was "a model of cooperation" between the two departments, Strong said. He and York Police Chief Douglas Bracy have officers devoted only to drug cases, who share information and work together.

"We've put a lot of effort into trying to make a dent into drug trafficking in this area," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029748

In each of the 17 cases, either Kittery Detective Steven Hamel, York Detective Thomas Cryan or members of the New Hampshire Drug Enforcement Agency allegedly purchased drugs from the defendants, which led to their arrests. Most were arrested in their homes or at work in the past three weeks, and some turned themselves in.

According to Hamel, the investigation began last fall, when a local confidential informant gave police information on Edward Arias of Lawrence, Mass.

Strong said Arias was allegedly "a high-level supplier with connections in New York." He led them to Jose Ortiz, also of Lawrence, who Strong called Arias' "mule, who would run cocaine into this area and deliver it."

Both men, whose ages are unknown, were arrested this week and arraigned in federal district court in Concord on charges of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and distribution of cocaine.

"They'd been supplying the entire area. It's going to take a while for someone to fill those shoes," Strong said.

A separate informant gave Hamel information on Demetries Agiasotelis, 30, of Rollinsford, N.H., whom Hamel said has been "a target of this area for four or five years." Hamel called Agiasotelis a "mid-level supplier" of cocaine in the area, "supplying the whole Seacoast."

Agiasotelis has been arraigned in federal court in Concord on charges of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine.

Yet another set of federal charges were filed against five individuals from Maine and one from New Hampshire who together, Strong said, had "a network" in the Seacoast area.

Finally, eight others who Strong identified as "low-level street dealers" are facing state charges. They have arraignment dates in the next few months in York District Court, although Strong said they will likely all be indicted in superior court prior to their arraignment.

Bracy said the arrests are proof of not only Kittery and York cooperation, but also police departments in New Hampshire and Massachusetts, because "we're all in this together. The drugs don't come from York, Maine or Kittery, Maine."

He said by bringing federal charges against these defendants, "we're sending a message. We know they aren't coming into this area as much as they used to. We're making a dent at the street."

Clayton Man Admits To Money Laundering (DDN)

Dayton (OH) Daily News, May 26, 2006

Dayton | A Clayton businessman admitted Thursday to a federal felony charge of money laundering that could put him in prison for four years.

Glen Hurst, 55, of Butler Twp. pleaded guilty as part of a plea agreement that provides that his wife, Debra Hurst, will plead to a misdemeanor tax charge after federal prosecutors dismiss a felony. He also pleaded to a misdemeanor tax offense.

The Hursts were indicted in a wide-ranging case that focused on drug kingpin Earl Marshall, who pleaded guilty April 18 to five felonies and faces at least 18 years in prison.

In 2004, federal officials called the case one of the largest trafficking operations in Dayton. It was investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and Drug Enforcement Administration.

Hurst owned and operated the American Funding Agency Inc., a mortgage company at 8126 N. Main St. in Clayton. DEA and IRS agents raided it June 24, 2004.

According to facts presented in court:

Marshall would provide information, much of it false, to Hurst's mortgage company. From that information, American Funding employees created fraudulent documents to support loan requests. Hurst was aware the documents were based in part on false information from Marshall and others.

Financial sources for the loans came from Marshall, even when he was not connected by the documents. Hurst was aware the money was coming from illegal sources and the transactions were done in part to conceal Marshall's financial involvement in the real estate transactions.

DOJ_NMG_0029749

Purchases involved properties at 272 Valley View Drive in Englewood, 4424 Genesee, 2285 Diamond Mill Road in Brookville, 106 Deans Court in Union; 6600 Westford Ave., 5104 Gardendale Ave. and 2516 Germantown, according to the statement of facts.

In the tax charge, Hurst admitted to failing to file an income tax return for 1999, failing to comply with withholding obligation for employees and other acts. The tax loss to the government for 1999 and 2000 was $55,733.

U.S. District Judge Thomas M. Rose set sentencing for Aug. 24.

Study Finds No Cancer-Marijuana Connection (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The largest study of its kind has unexpectedly concluded that smoking marijuana, even regularly and heavily, does not lead to lung cancer.

The new findings "were against our expectations," said Donald Tashkin of the University of California at Los Angeles, a pulmonologist who has studied marijuana for 30 years.

"We hypothesized that there would be a positive association between marijuana use and lung cancer, and that the association would be more positive with heavier use," he said. "What we found instead was no association at all, and even a suggestion of some protective effect."

Federal health and drug enforcement officials have widely used Tashkin's previous work on marijuana to make the case that the drug is dangerous. Tashkin said that while he still believes marijuana is potentially harmful, its cancer-causing effects appear to be of less concern than previously thought.

Earlier work established that marijuana does contain cancer-causing chemicals as potentially harmful as those in tobacco, he said. However, marijuana also contains the chemical THC, which he said may kill aging cells and keep them from becoming cancerous.

Tashkin's study, funded by the National Institutes of Health's National Institute on Drug Abuse, involved 1,200 people in Los Angeles who had lung, neck or head cancer and an additional 1,040 people without cancer matched by age, sex and neighborhood.

They were all asked about their lifetime use of marijuana, tobacco and alcohol. The heaviest marijuana smokers had lighted up more than 22,000 times, while moderately heavy usage was defined as smoking 11,000 to 22,000 marijuana cigarettes. Tashkin found that even the very heavy marijuana smokers showed no increased incidence of the three cancers studied.

"This is the largest case-control study ever done, and everyone had to fill out a very extensive questionnaire about marijuana use," he said. "Bias can creep into any research, but we controlled for as many confounding factors as we could, and so I believe these results have real meaning."

Tashkin's group at the David Geffen School of Medicine at UCLA had hypothesized that marijuana would raise the risk of cancer on the basis of earlier small human studies, lab studies of animals, and the fact that marijuana users inhale more deeply and generally hold smoke in their lungs longer than tobacco smokers -- exposing them to the dangerous chemicals for a longer time. In addition, Tashkin said, previous studies found that marijuana tar has 50 percent higher concentrations of chemicals linked to cancer than tobacco cigarette tar.

While no association between marijuana smoking and cancer was found, the study findings, presented to the American Thoracic Society International Conference this week, did find a 20-fold increase in lung cancer among people who smoked two or more packs of cigarettes a day.

The study was limited to people younger than 60 because those older than that were generally not exposed to marijuana in their youth, when it is most often tried.

Idaho Man Indicted For Drug Smuggling From Canada (AP)

AP, May 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029750

SPOKANE, Wash. -- A federal grand jury has indicted a Sandpoint, Idaho, man on charges he attempted to smuggle marijuana, methamphetamine and the designer drug Ecstacy into the United States from Canada.

Joseph A. Roberts, 43, was arrested by U.S. Border Patrol agents May 7 near Molson, just south of the Canadian border in Okanogan County.

The grand jury indicted Roberts on Tuesday on three counts of importation and three counts of possession with intent to distribute drugs.

Federal prosecutors allege Roberts had nearly 170 pounds of "B.C. Bud" marijuana, 143 pounds of methamphetamine and 16 pounds of Ecstasy when arrested. The street value of the methamphetamine alone is estimated at more than $1 million, prosecutors said.

Conviction on the methamphetamine counts would carry a mandatory minimum penalty of 10 years to a maximum of life imprisonment, a fine up to $4 million, and a life term of court supervision after release.

The remaining counts each carry a maximum penalty of up to 20 years in prison, a $1 million fine and life supervision.

Judge Won't Halt Gun-store Closure (CHICOER)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Chico (CA) Enterprise Record, May 26, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge refused today to postpone the government-imposed closing date for Northern California's largest gun dealer, Trader Sports of San Leandro, due to extensive violations of federal law.

Chief U.S. District Court Judge Vaughn Walker found that although Trader Sports likely will be hurt more by the closure than the public would be by allowing the store to remain open, the gun dealer hasn't substantially disputed the claims against it and isn't likely enough to succeed in its claims of an unfair administrative hearing to deserve a court-ordered stay.

Vaughn gave the store until June 2 - one day past the government's previously imposed deadline - to take the case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and seek a stay there. The store's attorney, Malcolm Segal of Sacramento, said he'll have to ask store owner Anthony Cucchiara whether to appeal.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms served Cucchiara months ago with notice that he'd have to surrender his license and close his store effective June 1. This followed a 13-month administrative hearing in which the ATF used evidence from a September 2003 inspection, along with earlier information, to argue Trader Sports has flouted federal firearms sale reporting requirements for years.

The 2003 inspection found 3,659 firearms in stock at the store, yet computer records showing 9,100 firearms should have been in inventory. The discrepancy later was whittled to more than 1,700 firearms unaccounted for.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lee argued Thursday that this, atop record-keeping deficiencies found in past inspections, proved Trader Sports couldn't be trusted to keep proper track of its sales.

``A license is a privilege... It comes with certain responsibilities," he told Walker, later adding ATF inspectors have found 19 instances in the three years since the inspection in which Trader Sports couldn't properly help law enforcement trace firearms found at crime scenes - a rate far higher than that of similar dealers. ``There is no substantial disagreement on this point."

Evidence also shows firearms sold by Trader Sports have been found at crime scenes at a rate of roughly one per week over the past two years, also out of line with similar dealers, Lee said.

Segal argued among other things that closing the store means more than 20 longtime employees will lose their jobs; police and hunters will be deprived of a valuable resource; and the business will miss its most profitable time of year as hunting season begins in June. He also argued that ATF violated its own rule by inspecting Trader Sports in 2003 a few weeks short of a year after its last meeting with Cucchiara, so all evidence from the inspection should be excluded from the case.

Advertisement

But this appeal of the administrative order to close the store is a civil lawsuit, and Walker said Thursday he could find no reason to exclude evidence from non-criminal cases.

He also said Trader Sports' claims that its administrative hearing was unfair - due to excluded evidence, and to alleged collusion between the ATF's ``prosecutor'' and the hearing officer - were ``essentially insubstantial'' and not enough to support the store's claim of due-process violations.

Thursday's hearing was merely for a preliminary injunction to halt the closure; Cucchiara can continue his lawsuit after the store closes in order to try to regain his license and reopen.

Griffin Dix of Kensington, president of the California chapters of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence's Million Mom March, said he believes the judge's order and the store's impending closure set good precedent.

``Enough is enough,'' he said. ``Just consider the harm done to the community by the guns that are spread all over the place by this irresponsibility.''

The Brady Campaign has issued a report, ``Trading in Death,'' outlining all of Trader Sports' past and present violations.

``Trader Sports has supplied more criminals with firearms than almost any other gun dealer in the nation,'' Brady Campaign legal director Dennis Henigan said in a statement. ``Congress should strengthen ATF's power to revoke licenses of corrupt dealers rather than enacting new special interest laws to protect them.''

SAN LEANDRO Gun Shop Tries To Keep U.S. From Closing Store Trader Sports Losing License Over Weapons That Can't Be Found (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, May 26, 2006

The owner of the Bay Area's biggest firearms store will ask a judge today to stop regulators from shutting him down at the end of the month, in a case that is being watched on both sides of the gun debate.

The hearing before U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker in San Francisco will center on federal agents' 2003 inspection of Trader Sports, which has operated on East 14th Street near downtown San Leandro for more than 35 years. It sells more than 3,500 revolvers, pistols, shotguns and rifles a year, along with fishing tackle and other goods.

Regulators from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives ordered Tony Cucchiara to surrender his firearms license because he allegedly could not account for 1,723 guns, among other bookkeeping problems that officials argued could endanger public safety and hinder police investigating gun crimes.

His lawyer sued U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other federal officials in an effort to overturn the revocation, saying agents had found only "hyper-technical" violations.

Cucchiara is asking the judge to postpone the revocation, which is scheduled to take effect June 1, and hold a full hearing.

Those who have been watching the fight between Cucchiara and the firearms bureau said it carries implications beyond the plight of a San Leandro gun shop. Trader Sports has a history of run-ins with regulators and is a high-profile target of gun-control groups.

"Trader Sports is one of the worst of the worst," Daniel Vice, a staff attorney for the pro-gun-control Brady Campaign in Washington, D.C., said Wednesday. He said license revocations are significant because the government issues them so rarely.

Malcolm Segal, an attorney for the store, said regulators had pushed too far in the other direction. In a legal filing, he said the federal agency is "engaged in an unfair campaign to intimidate firearm purchasers and remove the licenses of firearms dealers based on hyper-technical and inadvertent violations."

The U.S. attorney's office, which is defending the firearms bureau in the lawsuit, said the inspection of Trader Sports in September 2003 found 3,659 firearms on hand, even though store records showed 9,100 guns in inventory.

Cucchiara and the federal inspectors had tried to reconcile the discrepancy and found that an additional 2,036 guns could not be accounted for, bringing the total to 7,477, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lee wrote in a legal filing.

Most of those weapons were eventually tracked down, Lee said. But when the firearms bureau issued its final notice of revocation in December, 1,723 guns still had not been found.

Lee said the firearms bureau also found that the shop routinely filed faulty sales records and failed to properly document the sale of high-powered guns to police.

DOJ_NMG_0029752

Authorities also suggested that the store's guns show up too often at crime scenes. They said police asked Trader Sports last year to trace 447 guns that had been recovered -- the second-highest number among more than 100,000 licensed gun dealers in the country.

On 19 occasions in the past three years, Trader Sports was unable to produce a weapon's history, authorities said.

Segal said guns end up in police custody for many reasons other than use by a criminal. "The fact that a firearm is found at a crime scene could mean that it is a firearm that a victim had, trying to protect themselves," he said.

The attorney wrote in a court filing that Cucchiara and Trader Sports had received a disproportionate number of trace requests because the store sold a lot of guns and had been in business for more than 35 years.

Gun Crime Program Team Wins Award (DALLASBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, May 26, 2006

The city of Dallas' criminal prosecution team has received federal laurels for a program that has helped to reduce gun crime involving repeat offenders.

Gun crimes committed by parolees in Dallas between October 2003 and September 2005 fell by about 45 percent, according to a recent crime study.

The prosecution team -- which helped plan and implement the program -- was honored with a U. S. Department of Justice Project Safe Neighborhoods Achievement Award for exemplary local training, according to a Justice Department news release.

The community prosecutors, who have offices in seven Dallas neighborhoods, and others in law enforcement created a program that requires probationers and parolees to attend workshops that inform them of the consequences of violating terms of their release, which include not using or possessing firearms.

The Dallas team was nominated for the award by U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper of the Northern District of Texas. The award was presented by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul J. McNulty during a national conference earlier this month.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate OKs Immigration Bill 62 To 36 (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate, closing one round of acrimonious debate but setting the stage for another, passed legislation today that would both tighten the borders to new immigrants and provide procedures for the 12 million foreigners already living in this country illegally to gain legal status.

The bill would also authorize a guest worker program by which foreigners could work temporarily in this country.

The vote was 62 to 36.

The bill now goes to a committee of House and Senate members, who will try to forge a compromise between the Senate legislation and a much more punitive bill approved by the House in December.

The task may prove impossible. House Speaker Dennis J. Hastert (R-Ill.) said this week that he would not schedule a compromise bill for floor action unless it commanded the support of a majority of the House's Republican majority.

"If Speaker Hastert insists on the 'majority of the majority,' "Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.)said this week, then immigration reform is dead.

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leader of House conservatives as head of the 100-plus Republican Study Committee, criticized the Senate bill for providing amnesty to large numbers of people who had broken the law.

"This does not mean, however, that we cannot work together to find a solution to the problem of illegal immigration," Pence said. "The real rational middle ground can be found in a bill that is tough on border security, employer enforcement, and contains a no-amnesty guest worker program run by the private sector."

The House bill triggered massive protest demonstrations in Los Angeles and other cities this spring by a population that had been largely politically inactive.

DOJ_NMG_0029753

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said the Senate had passed "good, comprehensive immigration reform legislation…. It deals with security, by providing new agents and new resources to secure our porous borders. It deals with employers who break the law, by making sure employee sanctions are tough and real — a big difference from the last five years."

And for foreigners in this country illegally, he said, the bill puts them on the road to legal status if they pay a fine and learn English.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), a leader of the opposition, said the bill's provisions to beef up border controls and provide tougher sanctions against employers of illegal immigrants were insufficient. "The border is not secured by this bill," he said.

And as for foreigners already here illegally, Sessions complained, "A vast majority of the illegal alien population will be given every benefit our nation can bestow on its citizens, including participation in the Social Security System, based on their illegal work histories."

The bill would authorize future legal immigration levels of three to five times current rates, he said.

"This bill is a huge, monumental budget buster," Sessions said, citing a Congressional Budget Office report that the costs would approach $120 billion over the first 10 years.

Like Sessions, House Republicans have resisted White House efforts to push them beyond their "enforcement only" approach to immigration reform.

"The basic difference of opinion that we have seen on this issue between the House and Senate and the White House is real, it is honest, and it was exhibited at this meeting," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said.

Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, a Republican supporter of the bill, said the value of the bill was that it included the dispatch of National Guard troops to the southern border and the construction of hundreds of miles of fence along between the U.S. and Mexico.

"By securing the border, discouraging the hiring of illegal immigrants and addressing the illegal immigrants currently living in the U.S., this bill implements a comprehensive response to solve our nation's illegal immigration woes," Coleman said.

Speaking for the Bush administration, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, himself an immigrant from Cuba, applauded the Senate vote.

"Comprehensive immigration reform must secure our borders, toughen interior enforcement, create a temporary worker program, and provide employers with tamper-resistant identification cards that will help them determine the legal status of their employees," Gutierrez said. "I urge the House and Senate conferees to work in good faith to work out the differences in legislation."

Senate, In Bipartisan Act, Passes An Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — The Senate easily passed legislation on Thursday that would give most illegal immigrants a chance to become American citizens. But the vote did little to soften opposition to the measure among House conservatives, and Republican leaders acknowledged that delivering a final bill to President Bush's desk would be enormously difficult.

The Senate legislation, which also creates a guest worker program and seeks to tighten control of the border, passed 62 to 36. Twenty-three Republicans and one independent joined 38 Democrats to win approval of the bill in one of the few displays of bipartisanship on a major piece of legislation in years.

If the Senate bill's provisions were to make it into law, they would be the most substantial overhaul of immigration law in two decades. The key architects of the bill, Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, hailed the bipartisan coalition for withstanding a slew of amendments intended to sink the legislation.

The bill was also praised by some immigrant advocacy groups, the Roman Catholic Church and business leaders, who worked to ensure its passage. And Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, described the vote as "a success for the American people" as well as for the immigrants "who hope to participate someday in that American dream."

Mr. Bush issued a statement praising the Senate for its vote and the House for passing an earlier immigration bill that he said "began a national dialogue." He urged both chambers to work together to pass a bill that he could sign into law.

DOJ_NMG_0029754

But with Republicans deeply divided over immigration, the bill's future remains in doubt, reflecting the fluid politics of the issue in a Congressional election year. House conservatives, who passed a border security bill in December, vowed to thwart any deal that includes a central provision of the Senate bill: its call to give most illegal immigrants a chance to become citizens if they meet certain conditions.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House majority leader, said on Thursday that he was hopeful that the Senate and House could reach a compromise. But when asked whether that compromise might include a guest worker program, he said he did not know.

The House bill did not include a guest worker or legalization plan.

"This is a very difficult issue," Mr. Boehner said, adding, "I don't underestimate the difficulty of the House and Senate trying to come together in an agreement."

Conservatives in the House denounced the bill for legalizing illegal immigrants and creating a guest worker program that would admit 200,000 foreign workers each year. Representative J. D. Hayworth, Republican of Arizona, called it an amnesty for lawbreakers and "a nonstarter."

But some Republicans in the House said that the ground seemed to be shifting, if only slightly.

They pointed to Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, the leader of the conservative caucus in the House, who proposed a bill this week that would allow illegal immigrants to become guest workers, though not permanent residents or citizens.

They also said that the effort to reach a compromise could benefit from a strong push for a deal by Mr. Bush. And they noted the sizeable numbers of Republicans, including Mr. Frist, who offered vigorous support for the Senate legislation.

All of those developments, they said, might provide enough political cover for Republicans facing midterm elections in the fall to sign on to a plan that might include at least a temporary worker program.

Representative Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican who supports legalizing illegal immigrants, said that a week ago he was betting that the House and the Senate might not even agree to a meeting. On Thursday, he described the chances of a House-Senate compromise bill as "50-50."

Representative Peter T. King of New York, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said he also thought there was significant support for a temporary worker program. "A good number of Republicans who are opposed to legalization are willing to support guest workers," Mr. King said.

But supporters of the Senate legislation said they hoped to keep their central principles intact. Democrats said they would not support legislation that did not place most of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship.

Under the legislation, illegal immigrants who have lived in the United States for five years or more, about seven million people, would eventually be granted citizenship if they remained employed, passed background checks, paid fines and back taxes, and enrolled in English classes.

Illegal immigrants who have lived here two to five years, about three million people, would have to leave the country briefly and receive a temporary work visa before returning, as a guest worker. Over time, they would be allowed to apply for permanent residency and ultimately citizenship.

Illegal immigrants who have been here less than two years, about one million people, would be required to leave the country altogether. They could apply for the guest worker program, but they would not be guaranteed acceptance in it.

Some immigrant groups criticize the plan for leaving out illegal immigrants who have been here for less than two years. Others praise the legislation, but not without qualms.

"It means there is real hope that we will have immigration reform that will legalize millions of people who are here," said Cecilia Muñoz, a vice president of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights group. "But we still have some real reservations."

Border Fight Divides G.O.P. (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029755

WASHINGTON, May 25 — The negotiations between the White House and Congress that will follow the Senate's passage on Thursday of an immigration bill could decide not just how the nation confronts illegal immigration but also what strain of conservatism the Republican Party carries into the midterm elections and beyond.

Will it be the compassionate brand Mr. Bush considers crucial to the party's future, in this case by signaling support for a provision in the Senate bill that would give most illegal immigrants an opportunity to become legal? Or will it be the more doctrinaire variety embraced by much of Mr. Bush's party in the House, one that shuns anything that smacks of amnesty for illegal immigrants and seeks to criminalize them further?

The 62-to-36 vote in the Senate was a victory for a fragile bipartisan coalition. [Page A19.]

It will now be challenged in negotiations with the House. While the Senate bill calls for tougher border security, the establishment of a guest worker program and a plan to allow millions of illegal immigrants a chance to become citizens if they meet certain conditions, the House bill is focused on border control.

As on several issues, especially the increase in federal spending under Mr. Bush, immigration has shown Republicans to be struggling to define what they stand for.

Since Mr. Bush's influence among Republicans has ebbed with his poll numbers, the outcome of the intraparty battle rests in large part with the House leadership, especially the speaker, J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, and the new majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio. They have kept their options open, but neither has shown enthusiasm for moving substantially toward the Senate position.

Some well-known Republicans came out in support of a comprehensive plan, and argued that progress was possible. But it does not help the prospects for a deal that relations between the administration and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill are especially chilly at the moment because of the showdown about whether the Justice Department overstepped constitutional bounds over the weekend by raiding the office of a member of Congress.

Mr. Bush has made clear that he wants to sign an immigration bill this year, and his ability to pull his fractured party together on the issue may be the starkest test yet of whether he has enough remaining strength to drive any agenda at all for the remainder of his second term.

Mr. Hastert has indicated he will go only so far for the president. He has expressed some openness to Mr. Bush's guest worker proposals, but has more often emphasized enforcement against illegal immigrants and their employers, and securing the border, as top priorities.

That Mr. Bush has chosen to put so much capital behind an issue so divisive within his own party — and during an election year in which Republican prospects seem particularly grim — has bewildered some conservatives.

"Clearly, Bush is not in tune with where I think the bulk of the Republican Party is today," said Bruce Bartlett, a conservative critic of the president who worked for Mr. Bush's father's administration and that of Ronald Reagan. "He's getting hammered on a lot of the talk-radio shows, and I kind of wonder what the motivation was."

Mr. Bartlett said he could only surmise that the issue was so close to Mr. Bush's heart that he was willing to risk further division within his party to see his plan, or some close version of it, become law.

Mr. Bush's aides and allies are only too happy to agree that the president's personal conviction is at play.

They clearly see a chance to show the president as leading on principle.

"He's got to lead his country and the party in a direction he thinks is right," Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor, said. But some allies have argued in interviews that Republicans who are pushing solely to criminalize illegal workers fail to understand that Mr. Bush's approach will broaden the party and make it more appealing to Hispanic voters.

"The party can't be a dominant party without reaching out to minority communities, especially Latinos," said Matthew Dowd, Mr. Bush's chief strategist in the 2004 campaign, who has also worked for Democrats.

But Mr. Dowd and others acknowledge that the president and Congress will have to proceed carefully as they try to craft an immigration overhaul that legalizes a foreign work force, which business leaders want badly, even as it strictly enforces the law and seals the border.

Some Republicans suggest that the solution is to jettison the citizenship provisions of the Senate bill, but retain its guest worker program, which was the focus of Mr. Bush's original proposal. But it is not clear that the Senate would accept such a deal.

"If we have the right mix of border security and a guest worker or temporary worker program," said Ed Gillespie, a Republican lobbyist who is a close White House ally, "we can continue to hold rank-and-file conservative Republicans, as well as continue to gain votes with Hispanics as we have in the past two cycles."

Aides to Mr. Bush liken their strategy to that of arms negotiators during the cold war: by first bringing the two sides together on matters of agreement and then moving onto the issues that divide them.

But as of now all indications are that once the negotiators move from the border security measures that both sides can support to guest worker and citizenship provisions that conservative House members oppose, they will hit a wall.

And it is unclear how much Mr. Bush, with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, will be able to prevail upon hard-liners who face tough campaigns this fall. Though Mr. Bush's allies argue that those most vocally opposed to anything beyond border security are in the minority of the party — and indeed the country — they matter especially in elections. And they are angry.

"He's facing an open rebellion," said Richard A. Viguerie, a conservative direct-mail veteran and one of those openly rebelling. "And he's determined to force something down the throats of the conservatives that's going to cause them to abandon him in droves in 2006."

With so many in the House agreeing with Mr. Viguerie's view, it is difficult to handicap whether the president will get a comprehensive immigration law before fall. That possibility has prompted a frenetic round of discussions among Republicans about whether it would be best to put the House-Senate negotiations off until after the elections.

There is no clear consensus about how to proceed, but few argue that delay would be good for Mr. Bush, who badly needs a victory right now.

"If he can bring this one off, it won't necessarily save his presidency," said William A. Galston, a former adviser to President Bill Clinton who is now a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, the liberal-leaning research organization. "But if he doesn't, I think he loses everything except the title of the office."

Senate Passes Sweeping Bill On Immigration (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Thursday approved a sweeping bill that would upgrade border security and offer a path to citizenship to most illegal immigrants in the U.S., setting up a major — and probably bitter — confrontation over revamping immigration policy.

The bill passed 62 to 36, moving Congress a significant step closer to the first overhaul of immigration law since 1986.

But key differences between the Senate measure and a bill the House passed late last year mean that the legislation's final contours — if an agreement can even be reached — remain uncertain.

The effort to reach a compromise, strongly endorsed by President Bush, now rests with House and Senate negotiators who will conduct their talks behind closed doors.

Staunch opposition to the Senate bill from House conservatives is a key hurdle to an accord. They view any provisions that would permit illegal immigrants to become citizens as a reward for criminal activity.

Still, passage of the Senate bill represents a victory for Bush, who began a push for a broad overhaul of immigration policy with a speech in January 2004. His proposals sparked an extended debate about border security, the role of immigrants in American life and how best to deal with the estimated 12 million people who are in the country illegally.

For many lawmakers, the challenge in rewriting immigration laws has been to find a middle ground between recognizing the nation's heritage as a nation of immigrants and planning for its future in an uncertain age of terrorism.

Resolving the immigration issue in a comprehensive way "is a national security issue," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the leaders of the bipartisan coalition that shepherded the Senate bill to passage.

Referring to the path to citizenship that the bill would create for illegal immigrants, McCain said: "Some Americans believe we must find all these millions, round them up and send them back. I don't know how you do that. I don't know why you would want to."

But some conservative senators roundly condemned the legalization provisions.

DOJ_NMG_0029757

"This bill is going to make the problem of illegal immigrants much worse," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.), arguing that the legalization measures would simply draw more people across the border.

Like many of the Senate bill's opponents, Vitter said Congress needed to produce a measure that dealt solely with beefed-up security at the nation's borders and stricter enforcement of immigration law in the workplace.

The House bill adheres to that course.

The Senate roll call on its bill illustrated the GOP divide on the issue: 23 Republicans, 38 Democrats and one independent voted for the legislation; 32 Republicans and four Democrats opposed it.

California's senators, Democrats Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, supported the bill.

Immediately after the vote, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) offered his odds on the prospects for a compromise during the negotiations ahead.

"I want to warn people, it is a 50-50 proposition to get a bill on the president's desk," he said. "I would like to see us improve those odds, and I think we will."

As Senate passage neared this week, House Republican leaders signaled a willingness to consider a guest worker program. But they continued to draw the line at legalization measures.

Despite that position, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) insisted he was optimistic a compromise could be reached — with the help of Bush.

"I believe we can do it," he said. "The time has come for very active participation by the president."

A statement by Bush on Thursday night underscored his backing for the broader Senate approach rather than the narrower House version.

"An effective immigration reform bill will protect our borders, hold employers to account for the workers they hire, create a temporary worker program … address the issue of the millions of illegal immigrants already in our country and honor America's great tradition of the melting pot," he said.

The Senate legislation resembles the outline that Bush laid out in his 2004 speech.

Border security would get a boost, with 14,000 Border Patrol agents added to the existing 11,300 over the next five years. Extra detention facilities would be built to hold the illegal immigrants caught at the border. And the bill authorizes the construction of 370 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico boundary.

Employers would have to start using an electronic verification system within 18 months to ensure that all new hires are legal. Companies that hired illegal workers would be fined up to $20,000, and repeat offenders would draw prison terms.

In its most controversial section, the bill creates a three-tiered system to determine the future status of illegal immigrants.

Those who arrived in the U.S. in the last two years would be required to leave. Those in the country more than two years but less than five years would have to leave the country and get a work visa before reentering, after which they could work toward legal status.

Those in the U.S. longer than five years could stay and eventually apply for permanent legal status, a step toward citizenship, as long as they paid back taxes and fines of at least $3,250, continued working, and learned English and U.S. civics.

A guest worker program would allow foreign workers to enter the country in the future and provide a way for them to gain permanent legal status.

The bill also declares English the national language.

In contrast, the House bill has no provisions for a guest worker program or for accommodating illegal immigrants. Instead, it would criminalize illegal presence in the U.S., a status that is now a civil offense.

It also provides for a 700-mile barrier along the U.S.-Mexico border and would require that employers verify the status of all employees within six years.

It is not clear how quickly the House and Senate will begin talks over a joint bill.

Mexican President Vicente Fox, visiting Sacramento, praised the Senate's approval of the immigration bill as a "monumental step forward."

"It is a moment that millions of families have been hoping for; this is the moment that millions of people have been working for," Fox said in a speech to the California Legislature.

DOJ_NMG_0029758

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that by late Thursday, he and Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) would finish appointing senators to negotiate with House members in what is known as a conference committee. Frist added that he would urge the House to appoint negotiators "as soon as possible."

But at least some House Republicans argue that it might be better not to negotiate at all.

"There might be some strategic advantage in not calling the conference and just asking the Senate to pass the House bill as written," said Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.). "My fear is that the bills are so far apart that it may dissolve into chaos if conference is called."

Other House Republicans say the party will look incompetent if Congress doesn't send a bill to the president before November's midterm elections.

"We are better off with any bill than no bill," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.). "This is our best shot, and for both political and strategic reasons, we're best off getting this done."

"The wrath of the voters will be upon" the GOP majorities in the House and Senate if no bill is produced, added Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.). "I think you have to have something."

Scores of House Republicans, however, have stressed that they cannot support any form of legalization for those in the country illegally.

"I'm not opposed to a guest worker status. I'm opposed to illegals becoming legal," said Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.). "I think it's better to have no bill than a bad bill," which he described as "any bill that has legalization."

Some Senate conservatives view negotiations with the House as a chance to correct the flaws they see in the bill. These senators oppose the legalization measures, and some prefer the House approach of addressing only security and enforcement issues.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), who will take part in the conference talks, expressed conservatives' hopes for the closed-door sessions.

"We'll have the ability to craft something, in effect, from scratch," he said.

But in another example of the complicated task that faces the negotiators, a proposed compromise that lacks legalization provisions probably would spur opposition from most Senate Democrats and doom its chances in that chamber.

Times staff writers Maura Reynolds in Washington and Peter Nicholas in Sacramento contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

How the bills stack up

There are key differences between the Senate immigration bill passed Thursday and the House bill passed in December.

Issue: Legalization of undocumented immigrants

Senate bill: Allows illegal immigrants who have been in the country five years or more to remain, continue working and eventually become legal permanent residents and citizens after paying back taxes, paying at least $3,250 in fines and fees, and learning English.

Requires illegal immigrants in the U.S. more than two but less than five years to go to a point of entry at the border and file an application to return.

Requires those in the country less than two years to leave.

House bill: Contains no provisions providing a path to legal residency or citizenship for illegal immigrants.

Makes illegal presence in the country a felony.

*

Issue: Temporary worker program

Senate bill: Creates a special guest worker program for an estimated 1.5 million farm workers, who could also earn legal permanent residency.

House bill: Contains no new temporary guest worker program.

*

Issue: Enforcement

DOJ_NMG_0029759

Senate bill: Orders deportation of illegal immigrants convicted of a felony or three misdemeanors, no matter how long they have been in the U.S.

Authorizes hiring an additional 1,000 Border Patrol agents this year, for a total of 3,000 new agents in 2006.

Authorizes more detention facilities for apprehended illegal immigrants.

House bill: Makes it a felony to assist, encourage, direct or induce a person to enter or attempt to enter or remain in the United States illegally.

Establishes mandatory sentences for smuggling illegal immigrants and for reentering the U.S. illegally after deportation.

Makes a drunk driving conviction a deportable offense.

*

Issue: Employer sanctions

Senate bill: Requires employers and subcontractors to use an electronic system within 18 months to verify that new hires are legal.

Increases maximum fines on employers for hiring illegal workers to $20,000 for each worker and imposes jail time for repeat offenders.

House bill: Increases maximum fines for employers of illegal workers from the current $10,000 to $40,000 per violation and establishes prison sentences of up to 30 years for repeat offenders.

Beginning in six years, all employers would have to use a database to verify Social Security numbers of all employees.

*

Issue: Fences

Senate bill: Authorizes 370 miles of new triple-layered fencing plus 500 miles of vehicle barriers along the 2,000-mile-long Mexico border. Requires building two-layer fences along 700 miles of the Mexico border.

Issue: Other

Senate bill: Declares English the national language.

Source: Associated Press

*

Next steps

The Senate and House have passed immigration bills with key differences, so a committee with members from each chamber is expected to try to reach a compromise.

• House and Senate negotiators may hold public sessions, but the real work is usually conducted behind closed doors.

• Talks could begin shortly and wrap up quickly, or they could last for months.

• An unusually large Senate contingent of 14 Republicans and 12 Democrats is expected, probably led by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.).

• The makeup of the House team is not yet known, though it is expected to be led by House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.).

• If negotiators fail to reconcile their differences, the legislation dies.

• A compromise would go to the floor of both houses for a vote. Usually, but not always, the compromise is approved and sent to the president, whose signature makes it law.

Source: Los Angeles Times

Los Angeles Times

Senate Approves Immigration Bill (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Senate yesterday approved legislation that would trigger the biggest changes to U.S. immigration policy in decades, by strengthening border security, establishing a guest-worker program, and providing the means for millions of illegal immigrants to stay in the country and possibly become citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0029760

The product of a tenuous bipartisan coalition that faced tough conservative opposition, the measure calls for 370 miles of triple-layer fencing along the Mexican border, a complicated three-tiered system for determining who can stay and who must leave the country, and more jail cells for those awaiting deportation. It would declare English the country's national language, a gesture that many advocates found insulting but accepted in hopes of helping millions of undocumented workers achieve legal status.

But even as the Senate approved the bill 62 to 36, the measure's backers acknowledged that it faces formidable opposition in the House, whose political dynamics differ markedly from the Senate's. Numerous House members insist that Congress do nothing about legalizing immigrants until illegal border crossings are dramatically reduced.

Democrats and Republicans alike said a House-Senate accord will be nearly impossible without the vigorous involvement of President Bush, who favors an approach similar to the Senate's. The White House has already begun lobbying efforts, but it faces resistance from more than 200 House Republicans seeking reelection this fall, many in districts where the sentiment against illegal immigrants runs high.

"This is the most far-reaching immigration reform in our history," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a leader of the Senate effort, said of the bill's passage. "It is a comprehensive and realistic attempt to solve the real-world problems that have festered for too long in our broken immigration system."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Kennedy's partner in the effort, said more than 11 million illegal immigrants "harvest our crops, tend our gardens, work in our restaurants and clean our houses" and added: "Some Americans believe we must find all these millions, round them up and send them back to the countries they came from. I don't know how you do that. And I don't know why you would want to."

But opponents called the bill fundamentally flawed and predicted that it will be completely rewritten by a House-Senate conference committee, which will try next month to craft a compromise version acceptable to both chambers.

Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) called the measure "a bad bill" that "puts more emphasis on amnesty than on border security."

The House in December passed a bill that dealt only with border and workplace enforcement. It would make illegal presence in the country a felony.

After mass demonstrations by immigrants in several cities and complaints by Roman Catholic officials -- plus Bush's recent televised speech calling for a comprehensive approach that would include pathways to legal status for undocumented aliens -- House GOP leaders signaled a willingness to modify their bill. But they said the Senate bill goes too far and would amount to "amnesty," a term that many dispute, for millions of foreigners who broke the law and jumped ahead of would-be immigrants waiting for legal entry.

A possible compromise, some lawmakers said, might start with tighter border security and then -- if there is measurable evidence the crackdown is working -- proceed to a mechanism for some illegal immigrants to achieve legal status. But lawmakers said it is far from clear whether such a plan would appeal to enough House Republicans, and enough Senate Democrats, to win passage in either chamber.

Further complicating matters is Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's policy of allowing votes on major issues only if most of the House's 231 Republicans back them. Theoretically, a compromise immigration bill could be supported by most of the House's Democrats and nearly half of its Republicans -- making up a clear majority in the 435-seat chamber -- only to be thwarted by Hastert's dictum.

If the Senate had embraced the same policy, the bill would have died. Twenty-three Republicans, 38 Democrats and one independent voted for the immigration bill; 32 Republicans and four Democrats voted against it. Sens. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) voted for the bill. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) voted against it.

The Senate bill calls for 1,000 new Border Patrol agents and thousands of National Guard troops to support them, plus 500 miles of vehicle barriers on the Mexican border. Several such provisions, added during two weeks of debate, were designed to appease Senate conservatives who threatened to kill the entire bill. But senators repeatedly rejected conservatives' bids to strip or weaken the provisions allowing legal status for undocumented immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0029761

The Senate bill would provide 200,000 new temporary guest-worker visas a year, while creating a separate guest-worker program for immigrant farm laborers. Its key compromise would divide the nation's estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants into three groups.

Those here five years or longer would be allowed to stay and apply for citizenship, provided they pay back taxes, learn English and have no serious criminal records. Those here two to five years would eventually have to return to another country and apply for a green card, which could allow their immediate return. The roughly 2 million immigrants who have been in the United States illegally for less than two years would be ordered home and be subject to deportation. Illegal immigrants convicted of a felony or three misdemeanors would be deported no matter how long they have been in the United States.

Critics on the left and right call the bill -- and especially its three-tiered formulation -- unworkable. The notion of apprehending and deporting 2 million illegal immigrants who have been in the United States less than two years defies logic, some say. They add that the task would be six times as great under the House proposal to empty the nation of all illegal immigrants.

Immigrants who have lived largely underground for more than five years might have trouble proving their length of stay, advocacy groups say, while those who arrived less than five years ago might try to convince officials that they have been here longer. The bill would obligate immigrants to prove their length of residency, and fraudulent claims would be a crime.

Those claiming five years of residency or more would have to prove they were employed for at least three years to qualify for a citizenship application.

Senate Passes Sweeping Immigration Reform Bill (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress' struggle to overhaul America's immigration law heads next into House-Senate negotiations that could last all summer. They will test President Bush's ability to forge a compromise on an emotional issue in an election year.

As expected, the Senate voted 62-36 Thursday to pass landmark legislation that would put nearly two-thirds of the nation's illegal immigrants on track to eventual U.S. citizenship and create a guest-worker program to give U.S. employers a steady supply of low-skilled foreign labor.

The Senate bill embraces the basic concepts of Bush's call for comprehensive immigration reform and also includes toughened enforcement provisions, increased penalties on employers who hire illegal workers and a combination of fences, technology and increased manpower to help plug the porous U.S.-Mexico border.

But the volatile debate over immigration next moves to a House-Senate negotiating committee, where lawmakers will be hard pressed to find middle ground between the multilayered Senate bill and a House measure that focuses more on expanded enforcement.

Leaders on both sides say the ultimate outcome is impossible to predict.

Backers of the bipartisan Senate plan are calling on Bush to use the full force of the White House to forge a compromise, but acknowledge that the president is weakened by declining polls and his growing lame-duck status.

"After tonight, whether this bipartisan balance still survives or not really rests in the hands of the man at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

House Republican leaders denounce the Senate's legalization provisions as "amnesty" and remain adamantly opposed to the Senate bill. Some declared it all but dead on arrival.

"The nation needs legislation that will secure our borders and provide meaningful immigration reform - this bill completely misses that mark," said Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., who opposed it. He vowed to rewrite the Senate bill as a member of the House-Senate conference.

Hailed as the most sweeping immigration bill in two decades, the Senate measure emerged from weeks of rancorous deliberations that paralleled massive demonstrations by immigrants and their supporters across the country. The bill was co-sponsored by Sens. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb.

DOJ_NMG_0029762

As many as 12 million illegal immigrants, more than half from Mexico, have entered the United States to find work. Their presence has provoked an angry response from many U.S. citizens, who say illegal immigrants cause a multibillion-dollar drain on social services and unfairly wrest jobs from U.S. workers.

Perhaps the Senate bill's most controversial provision is a three-tiered approach to illegal immigrants. The nearly 7 million who've been in the United States five years or longer would be allowed to stay. They could become permanent legal residents in six years and U.S. citizens five years later by paying $3,250 in fees, learning English, paying back taxes and passing background checks.

Illegal immigrants who have lived here between two to five years - estimated at nearly 3 million - would be eligible for "deferred mandatory departure," allowing them to stay and work for another three years.

They would be required to leave after three years, but could return as participants in the guest-worker program. A so-called "touch-back" provision would enable them to satisfy the requirement by briefing exiting the country and returning through a U.S. port of entry. They would also be eligible to apply for "green cards" to become permanent legal residents.

The more than 1.5 million immigrants who've been here less than two years would be required to return to their native countries.

Martinez and Hagel crafted the three-tiered structure as a compromise to draw wavering Republicans, but even proponents acknowledge that it could be difficult to administer.

Another lightning-rod provision sets up the H2-C guest worker program. It would allow U.S. employers to hire foreign workers for low-skill jobs, largely in hotels, restaurants, construction and landscaping, if they're unable to find American workers for those positions. The workers would hold temporary visas for up to six years and would be eligible to apply for green cards.

Bush has urged Congress to enact a guest-worker program since he first began pushing his proposed immigration overhaul in January 2004, backed by a broad coalition of business groups seeking foreign workers to fill what they say is a chronic labor shortage. But the concept encountered stiff resistance in Congress.

The Senate bill originally called for up to 400,000 guest workers a year, but the ceiling was lowered to 200,000 through an amendment co-sponsored by Sens. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

The bill also creates a five-year pilot program that would offer eventual legal status for up to 1.5 million undocumented farm workers. Another provision, known as the DREAM Act, would put illegal immigrant children who have graduated from high school on track to legalization if they complete college or join the military.

Embraced by the Senate's Republican and Democratic leadership, and supported by a bipartisan coalition, the bill withstood most major challenges during nine days of debate. But it was refined to include two elements to boost conservative appeal: 370 miles of fencing along the Southwest border and a declaration of English as the national language.

Its enforcement provisions are similar to those in the House bill, including an additional 14,000 Border Patrol agents over five years, a crackdown on smugglers and document forgers, and an array of new border technology such as unmanned aerial vehicles, sensors and cameras. The House bill proposes a 700-mile border fence.

The bills include differing versions of an electronic verification system that employers would use to confirm the eligibility of job applicants. The House bill makes illegal presence a felony, but House leaders have signaled a willingness to reduce it to a misdemeanor. The Senate bill retains current law: a criminal misdemeanor for illegal entry and a civil violation for overstaying visas.

The House-Senate conference committee may begin work shortly after Congress returns from a week-long recess in early June. It will be under intense pressure from all sides.

Although pro-immigration groups support the basic thrust of the Senate bill, they'll press to increase the cap on the guest-worker program and eliminate the three-tiered treatment of illegal immigrants. Frank Sharry, the executive director of the National Immigration Forum, described the bill as "a rough draft."

Conversely, advocates of a get-tough stance toward illegal immigrants are calling on House conferees to stand firm against any movement toward the Senate bill. "There's an entrenched wall of opposition in the House led by people who know better," said Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform. He denounced the Senate measure as a "disaster" and "a pig of a bill."

DOJ_NMG_0029763

Bush dispatched White House adviser Karl Rove to Capitol Hill this week to try to soften opposition among House members, apparently with negligible results. The president has elevated his profile on the issue in recent weeks, including giving an Oval Office address in which he announced plans to send the National Guard to the Southwest border to assist Border Patrol agents.

Senate Passes Immigration Bill; GOP Advocate Of Crackdown Pledges 'battle' (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — A bipartisan coalition held together to give President Bush the comprehensive immigration bill that he says he wants. But the president may have to shatter his own party's unity in the House of Representatives if the bill is to become law.

"The ball is in the president's court," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Thursday as the Senate approved the first rewrite of immigration law in 20 years with mostly Democratic and independent support.

The 62-36 vote capped a month-long debate punctuated by lawmakers' stories of their own immigrant roots. In the end, 38 Democrats, 23 Republicans and one independent supported the bill.

The Senate bill would add staff and technology at the nation's borders, expand opportunities for foreigners to work in the USA and give millions of illegal immigrants who have lived here since Jan. 7, 2004, a chance to become citizens.

"It strengthens our security and reflects our humanity," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., an architect of the bill. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., opposed the bill, calling it "a tremendous budget-buster."

The legislation faces strong opposition in the House, which passed a bill in December that would make illegal immigration a felony, increase penalties for hiring undocumented workers and beef up border security.

Some backers of the House bill say the Senate version awards amnesty to lawbreakers. They promised to take a tough line in the House-Senate conference committee that will hammer out differences between the bills.

"I'd rather see no bill than a bad bill," said Rep. Pete King, R-N.Y. "An overwhelming majority of House Republicans are opposed to legalization."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who has become a national spokesman for cracking down on illegal immigration, sounded a defiant note. "The battle has been joined," he said.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., a supporter of the Senate immigration bill, joined Democratic leaders in calling on Bush to overcome GOP opposition. "We are looking forward to the president's more intensive participation," he said.

Specter and House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., have said they want to begin ironing out differences. "The public deserves to know where their elected representatives stand on this before the elections in November," Sensenbrenner said.

Specter warned that Republicans, who control the House and Senate, could pay a price if Congress fails to reach a compromise. "There is an election in November, and our leadership position as Republicans is on the line," he said.

That could put Bush in the politically awkward position of relying on Democrats to produce an immigration bill. Of the Senate's 55 Republicans, 32 voted against the bill containing many elements the president favors. The House bill was supported by 203 of the chamber's 231 Republicans.

Democrats and Republicans said Bush will have to flex his muscle to get a bill he can sign. "His biggest work is ahead of him," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

House GOP Expected To Yield On Legislation (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The House is the only obstacle that stands between President Bush and a comprehensive immigration bill, and the White House yesterday predicted that the chamber's Republicans will give in.

DOJ_NMG_0029764

White House press secretary Tony Snow said House Republicans will want to pass border security badly enough to back down from the fight against what many consider amnesty for illegal aliens, knowing there is a "heavier political price for failing to act, than for acting."

"If you are a Republican member of Congress and you're concerned about illegal immigration, do you really want to say to your constituents: You know, I'm going to wait a couple of years before I take up the issue of people knowingly hiring illegal aliens, I want to wait a couple of years before I go ahead and try to identify who the illegal aliens are, I want to wait a couple of years before I start grappling with what to do with these 11 or 12 million people who are here illegally," Mr. Snow said.

A president always has the most influence in the backroom House-Senate negotiations, but yesterday, Mr. Snow wouldn't tip the administration's hand when asked how they would approach the conference committee.

"At this point, let's get a bill through the Senate, let's figure out where the fault lines are," he said.

But those fault lines between the House and Senate are fairly public, deep and fundamental.

The House passed a bill in December that stepped up border enforcement and interior enforcement, enabled local law enforcement in border areas to help enforce immigration laws and cracked down on employers who hired illegal aliens.

The Senate included some of those measures but put far more emphasis on future foreign workers and a pathway to citizenship for the current estimated 10 million to 12 million illegal aliens, a move House Republicans consider an unacceptable amnesty.

"If both parties in a negotiation are running the other way, they will never meet in any middle," said Don Stewart, spokesman for Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

"The question for the House is some agreement to do more than just border security. The question for the Senate is: Are they willing to be less generous than the Senate bill? Without a yes on both of those two questions, there's no point in the conference going forward."

From the House side, Majority Leader John A. Boehner acknowledged there were "two very separate and distinct directions that we're going," but said he still thinks they can reach an agreement with the Senate.

Still, the Ohio Republican said, the House position is clear.

"You can't control the problem without first strengthening the borders and beginning to enforce the laws," said Mr. Boehner.

Mr. Bush last week called the Senate measure "a good immigration bill." He also recently reversed his administration's earlier position and now endorses the idea of a path to citizenship for some illegal aliens.

He said any final bill must include border security, employer sanctions, a temporary-worker program and a way to handle the current illegal alien population.

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, said the House has some areas in common with the Senate, including provisions to build more fencing -- 370 miles in the Senate version and 698 miles in the House version.

Mr. Kingston said House Republicans are willing to accept a temporary-worker program for future workers but, in exchange, would have to win agreement on delaying it until the borders are secure and adopting some sort of biometric identification card.

"We think probably we might be able to do something on a temporary visa basis, but where we will have a line in the sand is on the pathway to citizenship, because pathway to citizenship, by almost any angle, leads to somebody's definition of amnesty," he said. "We don't want 'Republican' and 'amnesty' in the same sentence."

He estimated that there are 180 members of the House "just adamant about no amnesty."

Although Mr. Bush has generally favored the Senate's approach and has recently said some illegal aliens can gain citizenship, he has been insistent that future foreign workers not have a path to citizenship. That sets up a major conflict with the Senate, where the bill that passed yesterday does grant that right to future workers.

Mr. Bush did win an unlikely ally in former President Jimmy Carter, a Democrat, who this week said Mr. Bush's efforts to create a right to citizenship have been "quite admirable."

Immigration: Now The Hard Part (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

DOJ_NMG_0029765

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - As hard as it was in the Senate to pull together a winning coalition on immigration reform, getting to "yes" with the House - in a form that can again pass both bodies - will be even tougher.

But it's not impossible. Even before the Senate completed work on its immigration bill Thursday, House Republicans were signaling an openness to compromise, as long as the final legislation maintains a focus on border security.

"I believe it is resolvable, and we will be successful in putting an illegal immigration bill on the president's desk," said House majority leader John Boehner, before the Senate vote Thursday. But he cautioned: "This is going to be a delicate negotiation between the House and Senate."

On some fronts, the way forward is obvious. Both the House and Senate bills include measures to improve border security. The House bill proposes building 700 miles of fence along the border with Mexico; the Senate bill, 370 miles.

But the guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for millions of people in the US illegally are sticking points for many House Republicans. Their position is that any form of amnesty is unacceptable.

"We shouldn't be selling American citizenship," Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R) of Wisconsin said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation." "What the Senate is doing is it is providing illegal immigrants benefits that we don't give to legal immigrants, and that's dead wrong."

Moreover, House leaders say that unless a compromise plan has the support of most House Republicans, it will not be allowed to come to a vote - even if the members of the conference committee agree on a compromise.

"The Speaker will not bring a conference report on immigration to the floor unless it has the support of a majority of the majority," says Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert.

GOP leaders are hopeful that threshhold can be met, he adds. "This will be a difficult conference, but the Speaker believes we can get to a balanced bill that will put border security first."

This week, President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, made his second trip to Capitol Hill to boost prospects for a compromise. While several Republicans who spoke with the press after the closed meeting said they were not convinced, others are signaling they may be interested in helping to broker a deal.

On Tuesday, Rep. Mike Pence (R) of Indiana, leader of the Republican Study Group, proposed a privately operated guest-worker plan in a talk before the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

"I agree with the president that a rational middle ground can be found between amnesty and mass deportation, but I disagree with the president that amnesty is the middle ground," he said. The solution, Representative Pence said, is to set up a system that "will encourage illegal aliens to self-deport and come back legally as guest workers." Under this plan, the federal government would license private worker-placement agencies to match willing guest workers with jobs that cannot be filled with American workers.

Meanwhile, the Republican Main Street Partnership, a group of moderate Republicans in the House and Senate, is offering to help broker a deal. Last weekend, Rep. Michael Castle (R) of Delaware and Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, both Main Street members, opened discussions on the bill.

Senate conservatives, however, are urging their House colleagues to hold the line against amnesty and for border protection.

Commenting on the Senate immigration bill, which had not been passed at press time, Sen. Rick Santorum (R) of Pennsylvania said: "This [bill] is not acceptable to me, and I hope that the House of Representatives thinks the same way. This is not what I would expect from a country of laws."

Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, already designated as a conferee who will meet with House conferees, says he remains committed to comprehensive reform and thinks it can be achieved in the conference.

"I am concerned that we still have not learned the lessons of [immigration-law overhaul in] 1986, which resulted in massive fraud and [in] the federal government refusing to provide the information needed for enforcement" of sanctions against employers who hire illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0029766

The House bill, which passed in December, addresses only border protection and illegal immigration "control." Mr. Bush and a bipartisan coalition in the Senate want border control plus an expanded guest-worker program and a path to legalization for most of the 11 million people in the country illegally.

Many GOP lawmakers worry that voters in November will punish legislators who back any measure that appears to reward illegal behavior. Rep. Tom Osborne, who ran in the Nebraska Republican primary for governor, lost his bid after an ad campaign criticized his support for in-state tuition for children of illegal immigrants.

More registered Republicans (19 percent) cite immigration as the most important national problem than cite any other issue, according to a Pew Hispanic Center poll this month. Only 6 percent of Demo-crats cite it as the most important problem.

Senate Passes Immigration Bill Overhaul (AP)

By David Espo

The AP, May 25, 2006

Landmark legislation to secure U.S. borders and offer millions of illegal immigrants a share of the American dream cleared the Senate on Thursday, a rare election-year reach across party lines and a triumph for President Bush.

The 62-36 vote cleared the way for arduous summertime compromise talks with the House on its immigration measure focusing on border enforcement with no guarantee of success. Republicans and Democrats said energetic participation by Bush would be critical.

"Why not say to those undocumented workers who are working the jobs that the rest of us refuse, come out from the shadows," said Arizona Republican John McCain, a key architect of the bill.

The legislation includes money to better secure the borders, provide a new guest worker program and give an eventual shot at citizenship to many of the estimated 11 million to 12 million immigrants in the country illegally.

The bill "strengthens our security and reflects our humanity," said Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., McCain's partner in the Senate compromise. "It is intended to keep out those who would harm us and welcome those who contribute to our country."

Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and the Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, both sided with supporters, a reflection of the bipartisan backing for a bill that was months in the drafting and survived several near-death experiences. In all, 38 Democrats, 23 Republicans and one independent voted for the bill, while 32 Republicans opposed and four Democrats opposed it.

Conservative critics attacked the legislation to the end after trying unsuccessfully to pull it apart with amendments.

"This bill will not secure our borders," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), R-Ala., one of the most persistent critics.

"This is amnesty," added David Vitter, R-La., who tried last week to strip out provisions relating to citizenship.

Not so, said Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in a rebuttal to weeks of debate. "They have to pay a fine. They have to undergo a criminal background check. They have to pay back taxes, they have to learn English and they have to go to the back of the line," he said, referring to illegal immigrants who would apply for citizenship.

Still, Sessions, Vitter, John Cornyn of Texas and others echoed a view widely held among House Republicans, many of whom have vigorously denounced the Senate bill as well as Bush's call for a "comprehensive approach" to the issue.

That portended difficult compromise talks in the shadow of midterm elections, at a time when Bush's poll ratings are low, congressional Republicans are concerned and Democrats are increasingly optimistic about their chances in November.

Lawmakers in both parties pledged strenuous efforts to reach a compromise. Specter said that Republicans, as the party in power in Congress and the White House, had a special burden to produce a compromise. "I believe the president will put a heavy shoulder to the wheel," he added.

Internal GOP divisions will complicate compromise talks. In the Senate alone, four members of the leadership voted against the bill, including Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairman of the party's senatorial committee.

DOJ_NMG_0029767

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, issued a statement that said, "we owe it to the American people to seek common ground on responsible solutions, while always stressing our most important priority is to secure our borders and stop illegal immigration."

The House bill, which passed on a largely party-line vote last year, is generally limited to border enforcement. It would make all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and it contains no provision for either a new temporary worker program or citizenship for men, women and children in the country unlawfully.

In contrast, the Senate bill would mark the most far-reaching changes in immigration law in two decades.

Built on compromise after painstaking compromise, it was designed to appeal to conservatives and others seeking tougher border enforcement; business interests eager for a steady supply of legal, low-wage labor; unions seeking enhanced protections for migrants who often toil in seasonal work the fields and Hispanics who are on the cusp of greater political power and determined to win a change in legal status for millions of illegal immigrants.

That last group — Hispanics — comprises the fastest growing segment of the electorate, and millions made their feelings clear in street demonstrations denouncing the House measure and calling for passage of a broader measure.

Bush played a prominent role in the run-up to passage. An Oval Office speech last week made explicit his support for the Senate's overall approach. A later trip to Arizona was designed to reassure conservatives about his commitment to stanching illegal immigration.

In more than a week of debate, the Senate made a series of changes in the legislation. Still, the key pillars were preserved when opponents failed to knock out the guest worker program or the citizenship provisions. A new program for 1.5 million temporary agricultural workers also survived.

To secure the borders, the measure calls for the hiring of an additional 1,000 new Border Patrol agents this year and 14,000 by 2011, and backs Bush's plan for a short-term deployment of National Guard troops to states along the Mexican Border. The bill calls for new surveillance equipment as well as the construction of 370 miles of triple-layered fencing and 500 miles of vehicle barriers.

The new guest worker program would admit 200,000 individuals a year. Once here, they would be permitted for the first time to petition on their own for a green card that confers legal permanent residency, a provision designed to reduce the potential for exploitation by employers.

A separate new program, a compromise between growers and unions, envisions admission of an estimated 1.5 million immigrant farm workers who may also apply for permanent residency

Even supporters of the bill conceded the three-tiered program related to illegal immigrants was complicated.

Those in the country unlawfully for five years or more would be permitted to remain, continue working and eventually apply for citizenship. They would be required to pay at least $3,250 in fines and fees, settle any back taxes and learn English.

Illegal immigrants in the country for more than two years but less than five would be required to travel to a point of entry before re-entering the United States legally and beginning a lengthy process of seeking citizenship. They would be subject to the same fines, fees and other requirements as the longer-term immigrants.

An immigrant in the country illegally for less than two years would be required to leave with no guarantee of return.

Senate Passes Immigration Bill (CHIT)

By Frank James

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate's bipartisan passage Thursday of sweeping changes in the nation's immigration laws could lead to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants. But it also created an immediate confrontation with the House's enforcement-only approach and will offer a test of President Bush's ability to lead on an issue that has deeply divided the nation.

The Senate, on a 62-36 vote, approved a sweeping measure along the lines favored by Bush that provides a path to legalization for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. and also would beef up security along the porous border with Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0029768

But strong conservative opposition to the citizenship provisions in the Senate bill, which some critics describe as an "amnesty" for illegal immigrants, and the powerful emotions evoked by the issue, make the legislation's future uncertain, especially in an election year.

Many voters oppose granting eventual citizenship to people who entered the U.S. illegally, as provided for in the Senate bill and supported by the president.

House Republicans have sharply criticized the Senate bill and its accommodation of illegal immigrants. Thus it was not immediately clear how the Senate bill could be reconciled with the tougher House version, which lacks provisions to provide a way for undocumented immigrants to gain legal status.

Despite the difficulties they face, senators who supported the bill said they were optimistic that Congress could produce immigration legislation this year that the president could sign.

What's more, they also said it proved that the Congress could work toward compromise legislation on a controversial issue, even in the often poisonous, partisan atmosphere that exists in Washington.

"This is truly landmark legislation produced by a big-league team," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee that wrote the legislation.

"The next step is going to be the conference [with the House] and I believe we can do it," Specter said. "We're going to work as hard to get a bill to the president's desk as we did to get a bill passed today. And I predict success."

The troubles ahead were almost immediately apparent, however. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) issued a non-committal statement that didn't even acknowledge that the Senate bill had any acceptable provisions and instead espoused the immigration priorities sought by the House majority in passing its measure in December.

"The American people expect Congress to secure our borders and stop the flood of illegal immigration," Boehner's statement said, "and House Republicans responded by passing a strong border security bill that re-establishes basic respect for our immigration laws.

"Now that the Senate has passed a bill, we owe it to the American people to seek common ground on responsible solutions, while always stressing our most important priority is to secure our borders and stop illegal immigration," he said.

Boehner also urged House Democrats to stop advocating "troubling policies that encourage open borders and invite more illegal immigrants into our country" and to join House Republicans in making U.S. borders more secure.

That criticism paralleled comments House conservatives have made about the Senate legislation, which they have said would cause more illegal border crossings because of its provisions creating a guest worker program and eventual citizenship.

The hard-line House stance led both Republican and Democratic senators to say after they passed their bill that Bush's leadership was essential to realize their hopes of enacting a bill this year.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said, "If comprehensive immigration reform is to succeed, the Senate conferees [with the House] must be resolute in their commitment to what we have achieved tonight in the Senate. And we must turn to the president and ask him to share our commitment for comprehensive immigration reform."

The president, in a statement issued by the White House, said he looked forward to working with both houses to "to produce a bill for me to sign into law."

For his part, Specter said, "Now the time has come for very active participation by the president. "And I believe the president will put a very heavy shoulder to the wheel."

Bush, in a prime-time speech this month, outlined an approach to immigration reform that was very similar to the Senate bill. He called for a guest-worker program as well as a path to citizenship.

He also called for stronger border enforcement and said he would send 6,000 National Guard troops to states along the U.S. border with Mexico to augment the Border Patrol.

As senators debated the measure this month, the bill took on a harder edge. That was a practical response to the reality that if the Senate hoped to win over enough support in the House, the senators needed to narrow the distance between the two measures.

Senators also were responding to polls indicating that many Americans want stronger border enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0029769

Thus the Senate legislation includes 370 miles of triple-layered fencing and 500 miles of vehicle barriers along the southern border. The House bill would build a fence 700 miles long.

One of the best-known provisions of the Senate bill would make English the official national language. Under that provision, the federal government would not have to provide services and materials in languages other than English unless specific federal laws required it, such as statutes that require translators in court cases.

Despite the efforts of senators who supported the bill to make it a tougher measure, Senate opponents were not won over.

"The amnesty provisions and the fact that the enforcement provisions will not kick in immediately mean to me that this will not solve the illegal immigration problem," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) "This will, in fact, make the illegal immigration problem much bigger."

And senators who opposed the bill said they hoped their counterparts in the House would change some of the provisions in the Senate bill they found objectionable.

"I'm hopeful that the House will save us from this bill," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.).

Nonetheless, passage was a victory for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, the Tennessee Republican and a 2008 presidential hopeful.

By navigating the bill through treacherous political waters, he appeared to burnish his leadership credentials and gain a major accomplishment he could campaign on.

Immigration Bill Passes Senate, Still Faces Chasm (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- By a 62 to 36 vote, the Senate passed legislation that offers eventual citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants, assures employers that hundreds of thousands of legal foreign workers will be allowed into the country every year and sets up a worker-verification system aimed at stanching the flow of illegal immigrants.

But marked differences with a House bill, deep divisions within the Republican Party and hardening public attitudes -- all in the shadow of congressional elections -- make the path for any legislation to the president's desk difficult.

Employers won key victories in the Senate bill, including measures that would more than quadruple the number of visas for skilled workers to 650,000 a year. But employers of low-skilled workers say the bill would leave them hundreds of thousands of workers short. And the measure is so complicated it may set up conditions for even more illegal immigration down the road. Even supporters warned that the Senate bill would be difficult to enforce.

"You still have the longest land border between a rich and poor country in the world," said Michael Fix, vice president of the Migration Policy Institute, a Washington research group.

Still, a month of Senate debate may have changed the political atmosphere for years to come. It has activated a huge Hispanic population that has been politically passive, but that both parties see as a potentially vast new constituency. "This community has more than once demonstrated its capacity to act when it gets mad," said Cecilia Munoz, of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic advocacy group.

It also has inflamed many native-born voters who may have benefited from the goods and services low-skilled immigrants produce, but are increasingly wary of their spreading influence over U.S. culture. A largely symbolic Senate amendment making English the national language, for instance, turned into a fiery public debate.

The bill rode to an easy victory after dozens of amendments -- calling for a 370-mile border fence and steep cuts to a temporary-worker plan among other things -- brought reluctant senators on board. But those compromises also tested the support of the bill's advocates, including some business and immigrant groups that quickly denounced it. "Everyone's got problems with it," said John Gay of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, a group that includes the restaurant and landscaping industries and has been a crucial supporter of immigration overhaul.

The bill next must be reconciled with a House border-security bill that passed in December without any measures for dealing with the illegal population, now estimated at about 12 million. Many House Republicans remain staunchly opposed to a central tenet of the Senate bill that would allow most of those immigrants to eventually become citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0029770

"It's got to be border security first; that's just how I feel," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R., Mo.).

Supporters of the Senate bill also hope to make changes during the conference. Democrats want to bring back a proposal that would allow about five million illegal immigrants who have been in the U.S. for five years or less to stay in the country while they pursue citizenship.

As it is, they either would be deported or return home before they become citizens -- a move many employers said would deprive them of at least a million workers. Immigrants who have been in the U.S. for more than five years would be allowed to remain under the bill. They could become permanent residents after six more years and citizens after 11 years.

Business lobbyists also hope to use the conference to boost the guest-worker program to 325,000 workers yearly from the 200,000 the bill now allows, and permit the number to rise further to meet labor-market demands.

But the House and Senate bills are so vastly different that there may be little room for compromise, and even less for measures that could be seen as improving the prospects of immigrants. With midterm elections approaching, there may be little incentive to tackle an issue that its opponents are labeling an amnesty for law breakers.

House leaders haven't said whom they would send into negotiations with the Senate, but they are likely to stack their team with critics of the legalization plan, while the Senate names supporters.

That could stymie a bill for this year or longer -- a huge disappointment to the bill's supporters, but a move that isn't unusual with such sweeping pieces of legislation. "If a conference isn't successful, it sets the stage for 2007" and a new Congress, said Randel Johnson, vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The Senate yesterday easily approved an immigration bill that allows 10 million illegal aliens to become citizens, doubles the flow of legal immigration each year and will cost U.S. taxpayers an estimated $54 billion over the next 10 years.

The leaders of both parties hailed the 62-36 passage as a historic success.

Majority Leader Bill Frist said the vote represented the "very best" of the Senate.

"This is a success for the American people," the Tennessee Republican said. "It is a success for people who hope to participate someday in that American dream."

Four Democrats -- Sens. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan -- joined 32 of the chamber's 55 Republicans, including several members of the GOP leadership, to vote against the bill. Three of the four Democrats who opposed the bill face voters in November.

Opponents said that the Senate is ignoring clear public will and that the bill would have disastrous consequences for decades to come.

"We will never solve the problem of illegal immigration by rewarding those who break our laws," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican. "We must stop illegal immigration by securing the border and creating a temporary-worker program that does not reward illegal behavior with a clear path to citizenship and voting rights."

In the moments before the vote, Mr. Frist and about a dozen senators, from both parties, tearfully congratulated one another for all their hard work in producing the legislation. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and the leading proponent of the bill, called it "the most far-reaching immigration reform in our history."

After the vote, more than a dozen giddy lawmakers from both sides of the aisle gathered before television cameras to again commend one another.

"I am so proud of the Senate," Minority Leader Harry Reid said as those around him smiled broadly. "This is the way we should legislate -- on a bipartisan basis."

As he spoke, a television screen behind him showed a live picture of the Senate floor, where fellow Democrats were at that moment trying to mount a filibuster against President Bush's latest judicial nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0029771

In the end, Democrats failed and a final vote was set for today on the nomination of White House lawyer Brett M. Kavanaugh, named to the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. After speaking to reporters, Mr. Reid returned to the Senate floor and cast his vote in favor of the filibuster.

Those senators who voted against the immigration bill said it should have left out the "amnesty" provisions and instead focus solely on securing the border and enforcing the immigration laws that have been on the books for decades.

Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, said the bill "puts the cart before the horse" because it gives citizenship rights to illegals, grants full-blown amnesty to employers and opens the borders to millions of new immigrants each year.

"The horse here, that I've been hearing from my constituents, is we need a border-security bill first," said Mr. Santorum, who spends much of his time campaigning for re-election this fall. "And we need a program that makes sure that our country's borders are secure and that they are not a threat either to our national security or economic security."

The bill also includes approval for 370 miles of new fencing along the border, 500 miles of vehicle barriers and authorization of 3,000 new Border Patrol agents this year.

But conservatives in Congress -- like many voters -- are skeptical that the federal government will make good on promises to secure the border and enforce the laws. They suspect that immigration reform is headed for a repeat of the 1986 reforms that granted amnesty to 3 million aliens and promised to seal the border. Ultimately, the laws were never enforced and 3 million illegals were replaced with some 12 million new illegals.

"The amnesty provisions and the fact that the enforcement provisions will not kick in immediately mean to me that this will not solve the illegal immigration problem," Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, said today. "This will, in fact, make the illegal immigration problem much bigger."

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, said yesterday he has been amazed by the Senate's inability to do what voters clearly want.

"There seems to me to be a sense of surreality here, where people in the Senate just are not listening to what the American people are telling us," he said. "We've tried, through the course of the amendments that have been offered that people standing here have offered, to highlight some of the problems that we have identified and which I believe are responsive to the concerns that we've heard from our constituents."

Chief among them was an amendment by Sen. Johnny Isakson, Georgia Republican, that would have delayed implementation of the amnesty and guest-worker provisions until after the secretary of homeland security had certified that the border had been secured. The Senate killed that suggestion.

An amendment by Sen. John Ensign, Nevada Republican, would have barred illegal aliens from collecting Social Security benefits for past illegal work. The Senate rejected that proposal, even if the aliens had forged Social Security documents to get the employment.

An amendment by Mr. Cornyn and Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona would have required that the 200,000 new workers ushered into the country each year under the guest-worker program be allowed to stay for only a set period of time rather than permanently. The Senate rejected that proposal as well.

Immediately before the final vote yesterday, conservatives suffered what they viewed as one final insult. Buried in a 125-page last-minute amendment was a requirement that local, state and federal officials in the U.S. consult with their Mexican counterparts before they can start building the fence.

IMMIGRATION VOTE

The 62-36 roll call by which the Senate yesterday passed a broad immigration-reform bill. Voting "yes" were 38 Democrats, 23 Republicans and one independent. Voting "no" were 32 Republicans and four Democrats.

Here are major points of the bill:

Amnesty: 10 million illegals can apply for citizenship.

Border security: Adds 370 miles of triple-wire fencing and 500 miles of vehicle barriers; adds 3,000 Border Patrol agents this year

Employers: No penalties for businesses that hired illegals

DOJ_NMG_0029772

VOTING FOR THE BILL

Akaka (D); Baucus (D); Bayh (D); Bennett (R); Biden (D); Bingaman (D); Boxer (D); Brownback (R); Cantwell (D); Carper (D); Chafee (R); Clinton (D); Coleman (R); Collins (R); Conrad (D); Craig (R); Dayton (D); DeWine (R); Dodd (D); Domenici (R); Durbin (D); Feingold (D); Feinstein (D); Frist (R); Graham (R); Gregg (R); Hagel (R); Harkin (D); Inouye (D); Jeffords (I); Johnson (D); Kennedy (D); Kerry (D); Kohl (D); Landrieu (D); Lautenberg (D); Leahy (D); Levin (D); Lieberman (D); Lincoln (D); Lugar (R); Martinez (R); McCain (R); McConnell (R); Menendez (D); Mikulski (D); Murkowski (R); Murray (D); Nelson (D, Fla.); Obama (D); Pryor (D); Reed (D); Reid (D); Sarbanes (D); Schumer (D); Smith (R); Snowe (R); Specter (R); Stevens (R); Voinovich (R); Warner (R); Wyden (D)

VOTING AGAINST THE BILL

Alexander (R); Allard (R); Allen (R); Bond (R); Bunning (R); Burns (R); Burr (R); Byrd (D); Chambliss (R); Coburn (R); Cochran (R); Cornyn (R); Crapo (R); DeMint (R); Dole (R); Dorgan (D); Ensign (R); Enzi (R); Grassley (R); Hatch (R); Hutchison (R); Inhofe (R); Isakson (R); Kyl (R); Lott (R); Nelson (D, Neb.); Roberts (R); Santorum (R); Sessions (R); Shelby (R); Stabenow (D); Sununu (R); Talent (R); Thomas (R); Thune (R); Vitter (R)

NOT VOTING

Rockefeller (D); Salazar (D)

Source: Associated Press

Critics Say Bill Diminishes Due Process For Immigrants (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The legislation approved by the Senate yesterday would offer many illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship. But advocates of expanded immigration rights complain that "hidden traps" woven through the bill's 300 pages erode significant due-process protections for all foreign-born people living in the United States.

A coalition of civil rights, religious and legal groups says the legislation would make it easier for the government to detain or deport immigrants -- whether in the country legally or not -- while making it more difficult for them to prove they deserve asylum or naturalization.

One provision would add to the list of acts considered "aggravated felonies" under immigration law -- automatic grounds for removal from the country. The rewritten list would include carrying fraudulent documents. According to immigration and civil rights lawyers, that change could prompt the government to expel people who use such documents to escape oppressive regimes or those who have been working in the United States for years under false Social Security numbers.

Another change would give federal courts less latitude to review the cases of immigrants who have applied for asylum or citizenship and been turned down by immigration boards. Currently, U.S. circuit courts consider such appeals from scratch. Under the bill, courts could consider only whether the immigration agency had any reasonable grounds for its decision -- not whether its decision was correct.

The bill also would give Border Patrol officers new powers to jail and deport, without a judge's review, immigrants suspected of having recently crossed into the country illegally. Border officers would be allowed to make such decisions on their own for any foreigners, except Mexicans, they stop within 100 miles of the Mexican or Canadian line. The provision essentially would cement in law a controversial policy that the Department of Homeland Security has phased in during the past few years.

Critics predict that it would lead to racial profiling, and they complain that the enforcement area is so wide it would encompass several major cities, including San Diego, El Paso and Detroit.

The changes indicate that the bill is far more intricate than its public image as a measure that is relatively friendly to immigrants, particularly in comparison with an immigration measure passed by the House late last year.

The merits of the changes are a matter of intense debate.

"We had counted on senators taking the time to eliminate . . . the unwise and unsound provisions that strike due process," said Timothy D. Sparapani, legislative counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union. "And the Senate failed to do its job."

DOJ_NMG_0029773

Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a group that favors low immigration, disagreed. "The limits on what the other side calls 'due process' are actually essential if we are going to get control of the immigration system," he said.

Krikorian said so many illegal immigrants are crossing into the country that the immigration and judicial systems do not have the capacity to review every case. "We need to restrict the amount of access illegals have to the court system. There is nothing morally problematic about it. It's not a criminal matter. We are simply deciding whether they should stay in the country or be sent home," he said.

Late yesterday afternoon, the Senate removed from the bill one provision that had alarmed immigration rights groups. An amendment sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) eliminated a section that would have made it more difficult for immigrants to avoid being deported while they are appealing asylum or other applications.

Still, Paul M. Igasaki, executive director of a coalition called the Rights Working Group, said that, on balance, the Senate measure represents "a very serious deterioration of the rights of immigrants."

In several instances, the Senate essentially embraced the due-process restrictions included in the House bill. In at least a few ways, however, senators included provisions that are stricter than those created by the House.

Nancy Morawetz, a law professor at New York University, said that in the Senate version legal residents would be counted as having committed an aggravated felony if they had been convicted repeatedly of driving under the influence of alcohol, even if the convictions happened years ago.

And only the Senate bill, Morawetz said, would create penalties for legal residents if they do not notify the government when they move. She said the requirement has existed for years, but many immigrants do not know they are supposed to file an address change and the federal government has done a poor job of keeping track.

USCIS Could Process Immigration Plan, Ombudsman Says (AP)

The AP, May 26, 2006

DALLAS -- The nation's immigration service could handle a program offering millions of illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship if lawmakers provide enough time and money, the ombudsman who reviews the agency said Thursday.

"Yes, USCIS can definitely do it. The key is funding and time allocated under the law," said Citizenship and Immigration Ombudsman Prakash I. Khatri.

Legislation calling for a new guest worker program and giving many illegal immigrants an eventual chance to become citizens gained the Senate's approval Thursday.

It now heads to compromise talks with the House, which previously passed legislation focused on border enforcement rather than legalizing undocumented immigrants. An estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country would be affected by legislation that comes out of the compromise talks.

The result would greatly increase the workload of an agency already facing a backlog that has left some immigrants waiting years for citizenship or the "green cards" that provide permanent residence status. U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services would need to hire and train more staff and require facilities to process the millions of applications expected, Khatri said.

The amount of time and money needed would depend on the provisions lawmakers ultimately approve. But a tighter deadline for processing immigrants in the plan would cost more, Khatri said.

"There's no way for a fee-funded agency to start up a 10-fold increase in annual processing ... unless Congress really funds it in advance," he said.

Khatri was appointed in July 2003 as the first ombudsman for Citizenship and Immigration Services. He was charged with helping people and employers solve problems with U.S. CIS and gives advice on policies and programs for the agency.

Since then, Khatri has focused on improving the agency's processing times and making the CIS district offices' work more uniform. He's recommended upfront screening to help speed processing of applications and eliminate temporary immigration benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0029774

In March, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services Director Emilio Gonzalez said the agency hoped to get through a backlog of immigrant petitions in time to handle another immigration program.

Secure Border Takes Serious Study (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, May 26, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. — In a sand pit in 100-degree sun, two dozen trainees run, jump, and crawl through obstacles. In air-conditioned classrooms, some of their classmates study nationality law. And on the driving course, others learn to control a car during a high-speed chase.

The 482 students on this remote campus are Border Patrol agents-in-training undergoing a rigorous, 19-week course. The Border Patrol Academy prepares men and women to join the rapidly swelling ranks of the agency that polices the nation's porous borders.

The number of Border Patrol agents has been growing since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and the grounds here reflect that. A new academic building with nine 50-seat classrooms has just been completed; a $14 million, 50,000-square-foot addition to the gym is under construction; and new dorms are on the way.

The academy's going to need the extra space.

After three years of steady growth, the Border Patrol is about to embark on an unprecedented expansion. If Congress approves President Bush's request for 6,000 new agents over the next 21/2 years, the patrol will have 18,000 agents on the nation's 5,000 miles of border with Mexico and Canada.

That would double the number of agents since 9/11 raised new concerns about terrorists' ability to slip into the country across land borders.

Bush's announcement that 6,000 National Guard troops will be available for deployment along the Mexican border dominated headlines earlier this month. But the Guard soldiers would be relied upon only for a year or two while the government recruits and trains the new Border Patrol agents, all of whom Bush wants on board by the end of 2008.

On average, 40 people apply for every one accepted at the academy, and some in Congress are skeptical that the Homeland Security Department, which runs the Border Patrol, can move fast enough to get so many new agents hired.

“The track record of this department in this area is not stellar,” Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said in a Senate floor speech on May 17. Gregg chairs the Senate Appropriations homeland security subcommittee.

If Bush's plan works, it will fundamentally change the Border Patrol and make it the largest federal law enforcement agency, surpassing the FBI.

“Our objective is straightforward,” Bush said in his speech announcing the plan May 15. “The border should be open to trade and lawful immigration and shut to illegal immigrants, as well as criminals, drug dealers and terrorists.”

Trainee Stephen Crudale says it was the idea that terrorists could enter the USA undetected that motivated him to join the Border Patrol and spend months at the academy here.

A husband and father of two young boys, he says he gave up his high school teaching job in Los Angeles because “I see this as an opportunity to give something back to my country” and help prevent terrorism.

In Week 11 of the 19-week course, Crudale says the hardest part is being separated from his family. But learning the nation's immigration codes hasn't been easy either, he says, and “I'm not a big fan of long-distance runs” in the wilting desert heat.

Heather Teeple, 25, says she signed up because she was bored with her job as an immigration inspector at the port of Calexico in Southern California. “I've always been one for excitement,” she says.

She almost didn't make it through the program. Trainees have to be able to run a mile and a half in 13 minutes, and Teeple failed her midterm test when she came in at 13 minutes and nine seconds. But after her classmates helped her train every day for weeks, she passed the final test with 22 seconds to spare.

She'll graduate in her dark green dress uniform today.

DOJ_NMG_0029775

Former Marine Matthew Dover, 35, of San Diego, has had no trouble with the physical requirements. But he says Spanish has been hard to master.

Trainees are tested repeatedly in Spanish because all new agents begin their careers on the southern border. Eventually, some are reassigned in the north — but not many. Only about 10% of all agents are sent to Washington, Michigan, New York and other states bordering Canada.

Spanish instructor Greg Burwell says about half the trainees who come in are native speakers. For the rest, it can be tough getting through 222 hours of intensive language training — a year's course load crammed into three hours a day for 19 weeks.

"It's a big hurdle for a lot of people," Burwell says.

The trainees have to be conversant in the language of the border, including phrases such as "How much did you pay the smuggler?" and "When did you cross?" They also have to be able to advise people of their rights in Spanish while maintaining eye contact.

At simulated border crossings, agents are put through various scenarios to practice trying to determine whether the occupants of a car are legal or might be hiding something.

In some cases, role-playing instructors refuse to turn down a blaring radio or jump out of their cars and start to run; in others, they become violent or belligerent to see how the trainees respond.

During one recent exercise, in which trainees had to board a bus and ask people to state their nationality and show ID, instructors told female actors on the bus to try to provoke the trainees. One woman badgered a trainee about whether he was married; another told him what "pretty eyes" he had. He kept his poise.

In more tense situations, when instructors play violent, armed smugglers, trainees are often taken to task for being too rough or too timid in their response. Or for mangling their Spanish commands.

Dover, who grew up in Flint, Mich., and who has had to spend all his free weekends studying Spanish so he can pass the tests, says he's eager to join the growing ranks on the southern border.

Like most of the trainees, he doesn't have the time — or the inclination — to follow the debate over immigration policy and border security a world away in Washington. "That's not up to us," he says. "We're here to protect the border. My job is to enforce the law."

Border Deaths Expected To Rise As Summer Arrives (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The U.S. Border Patrol says an increase in the number of people who die trying to cross the desert to enter the United States illegally is expected as summer temperatures rise, and efforts are being made to ask the Mexican media to warn would-be crossers of the dangers involved.

"As the summer approaches, it is important that the people understand the seriousness of the situation," said Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar. "The temperatures are deadly, the terrain is unforgiving, and the risks are real. People that do not understand the situation or do not heed the warnings will face reality which too often results in unnecessary and tragic situations."

Last year, 473 persons died on the Southwest border -- a record number of deaths. Since Oct. 1, the Border Patrol reported 210 deaths -- 43 more than the same period a year ago. The western desert of Arizona accounted for more than 56 percent of the total number of deaths.

Chief Aguilar said alien smugglers, charging an average of $1,500 to $2,000 a person to cross into the United States, "routinely prey on the desperation of undocumented migrants, callously lead aliens into harm's way." In an effort to prevent heat-related deaths, he said, the Border Patrol has increased its search and rescue efforts.

Since Oct. 1, the Border Patrol's Search, Trauma and Rescue team, known as Borstar, has rescued 1,887 persons -- an increase of 49 percent or 620 more than last year.

"The Border Patrol will continue its efforts on reducing the number of heat-related deaths and remain steadfast in its commitment to securing the border," the chief said.

DOJ_NMG_0029776

In an effort to reduce the number of deaths, the agency has implemented a program known as the Border Safety Initiative (BSI), whose two main objectives are to reduce injuries and prevent deaths in the southwest border region. Begun in 1998, the program seeks to "educate and inform" would-be border crossers of the dangers and hazards involved and to respond to those who are in life-threatening situations.

The BSI has four major goals:

•Prevention -- Working with Mexican officials to identify dangerous crossing points along the entire southwest border, discouraging illegal crossings and addressing safety problems.

•Search and rescue -- Targeting hazardous areas where migrants may become lost, abandoned or in distress because of difficult terrain and the willingness of smugglers to lead aliens into dangerous territory.

•Identification -- Establishing procedures and deploying resources to help officials identify those who have died attempting to cross the border illegally through our target zones.

•Tracking and recording -- The BSI Tracking System is the main repository for data collected on BSI-related deaths and rescues for reporting and analysis.

"Smugglers and human traffickers are criminals who have no regard for human life," Chief Aguilar said.

In California, Fox Gets Warm Embrace And A Cold Shoulder (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif., May 25 — In an echo of the debate on immigration under way in Washington, the California Legislature gave visiting President Vicente Fox of Mexico a two-edged welcome on Thursday.

Democratic and Latino members, including the Assembly speaker, Fabian Núñez, embraced Mr. Fox, while some Republicans boycotted his evening address to a joint session of the Legislature. Other Republicans attended the speech, but wore yellow buttons reading "No mas!" to protest Mr. Fox's support for liberalizing American policies on immigration.

Chuck DeVore, a Republican Assembly member from Orange County, refused to attend Mr. Fox's speech because, he said in an interview, a foreign leader has no right to come to the United States to lobby openly on a piece of domestic legislation.

"I do not at all appreciate a foreign head of state telling my nation how to deal with its own sovereignty and the issue of immigration," said Mr. DeVore, an aerospace executive and a lieutenant colonel in the California Army National Guard.

Mr. DeVore, like many other Republicans in the California Legislature, supports the House version of national immigration legislation that focuses on securing the southern border and imposes sanctions on employers who hire illegal immigrants.

He opposes the provision of the Senate bill that would lead to legalization for many of the millions of illegal immigrants already in the country, saying it is nothing more than amnesty for those who broke the law to come here.

Mr. Fox, who is in the last months of his six-year term, is in California on the final leg of a four-day visit to the United States to advocate comprehensive immigration legislation, including better enforcement on both sides of the border.

He told the California lawmakers that his country would do its share to reduce the unregulated flow of people across the border. "We want to be part of the solution, not part of the problem," Mr. Fox said.

ICE Set To Deport 15 Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency is preparing to deport 15 illegal aliens from Mexico and Guatemala who were arrested Tuesday in Hanover County after the speeding van they were in was stopped by police.

"They were issued notices to appear before an immigration judge and more than likely will be removed from the United States," said Ernestine Fobbs, an ICE spokeswoman.

The illegals went through initial interviews yesterday morning with ICE agents who were working to determine their immigration status, Ms. Fobbs said.

Then the group was driven to an ICE facility in Norfolk where officials conducted further background checks to determine whether they had criminal histories or had histories of entering the country illegally, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0029777

"They are in removal proceedings," Ms. Fobbs said, adding that a judge will take each person on a case-by-case basis to determine whether they should be removed immediately or whether additional charges will be levied.

The incident began at 6:45 p.m. Tuesday when a patrolman with the Hanover County Sheriff's Office stopped a Ford van that was traveling at 62 mph in a 45 mph zone south on Washington Highway, said Sgt. Michael Trice, spokesman for the sheriff's department.

When the patrolman approached the van and asked for identification, he was handed Mexican documents indicating that the man behind the wheel was in the country illegally, Sgt. Trice said. The patrolman also noticed 12 persons in the back of the van, some of whom had what appeared to be gang-related tattoos.

"As he was conducting the investigation, another car pulled up with two people, and that driver gave police fake identification and presented it as if it was real," Sgt. Trice said.

In all, there were 14 adults between the ages of 20 and 49 years old, and a juvenile who worked at "various job sites in our county" and stayed "around the metro Richmond area," Sgt. Trice said.

After further questioning, the immigrants told police in broken English and through an interpreter that they were in the country illegally, Sgt. Trice said.

Police then contacted ICE officials, who arrived Tuesday night with detention papers.

Hanover police and ICE agents transported the group to the Pamunkey Regional Jail, a facility with a housing capacity of 400 inmates that serves Hanover and Caroline counties and the town of Ashland.

In April 2005, a dozen illegal aliens were detained after an Interstate 95 traffic stop in Spotsylvania County.

Virginia State Police found the illegals -- who came primarily from El Salvador, Guatemala and Mexico -- riding in a van south of Fredericksburg, where a trooper stopped the vehicle for a traffic violation.

Nine of them eventually were deported to their home countries.

The Spotsylvania County arrests were made a few days after federal authorities released 11 illegals who Fairfax County police found in a van during a traffic stop in Annandale.

In that case, ICE officials ordered the 11 Mexican nationals, three of whom were children, to show up for further immigration processing at the ICE agency in Northern Virginia.

None of the aliens showed up for the proceedings. Officials later located one. Police charged the driver with traffic violations and child endangerment in the case.

Their People, Our Money (WSJ)

By Joel Kurtzman And Glenn Yago

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The problem with the debate on immigration is that it has so far looked at just one side -- ours. Somehow, for political or other reasons, Mexico has escaped scrutiny. And yet we are suffering for Mexico's myriad of economic sins. Our part in creating the immigration mess is that we built a society filled with opportunities but surrounded it with a porous border. Mexico's part is that it has failed to produce enough growth, despite massive wealth. The solution is to open the borders even wider -- but open up Mexico, too. If Mexicans can come here, let our capital and ingenuity invest there freely. President Fox, tear down that investment-restriction wall!

In order to keep its people from leaving for the U.S., Mexico needs to create a million jobs a year; currently, it creates half that. Similarly, its growth has been nonexistent since 2000, despite a 5.5% jump in the first quarter of the year due to oil prices and increased sales of auto parts to U.S. manufacturers. Put simply, Mexico has too little investment capital to start, expand or turn around businesses. And failing to attract that capital has an impact. Despite its proximity to the U.S. market and the special status of the maquiladora program, Mexico has seen its share of exports to the U.S. fall since 2000.

If Mexico is to make up that half-million job difference, it will require capital investment to expand its business sector and modernize the energy sector, which generates 38% of government tax revenue. Mexicans don't have access to capital because of the way Mexico is run. It has a big, bureaucratic government that is highly corrupt and controls too much of the economy. To conduct business requires bribes or "facilitation" payments in order to get the bureaucracy to move. Without these, papers don't get filed, permits don't get issued and cases don't get heard in court. Even the police take bribes. Americans can land in jail in the U.S. if they make these payments, due to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. As a result, Mexico only gets a fraction of the money it needs to grow.

DOJ_NMG_0029778

In addition, Mexico is a highly opaque country, with woeful accounting standards and corporate governance. And then there are Mexico's own self-imposed restraints, many of which were aimed specifically at the U.S. Americans cannot invest in real estate within 30 miles of the coastline, cannot invest in the energy sector and are limited in their investments in the telecom and transportation sectors. And yet, with so many Americans reaching retirement age and looking for warmer, less expensive beachfront property, Mexico could become their top choice -- if it ended investment restrictions and bureaucratic complications. Mexico could be enjoying a real-estate-led boom big enough to lure back its best construction workers, many of whom are now working illegally in the U.S. but could be contractors in Mexico. Capital coming into the real-estate sector would stimulate many other sectors of the economy including banking, insurance, textiles, construction and services.

Then there is oil. Nothing better illustrates the country's problems than Pemex, a gigantic, inefficient, state-controlled jumble -- and the No. 1 foreign supplier of oil to the U.S. Because the Mexican constitution prohibits foreign and private investment in the energy sector, Pemex has a 100% monopoly on Mexico's vast reserves of oil and gas, the largest proved in North America.

Pemex, like much of Mexico, is opaque. It has weak internal accounting, budgeting and reporting practices. It has no independent board members and a dubious relationship with its union. These problems -- which don't even take into account corruption with suppliers, distributors, dealers and others in the supply and distribution chain -- have made it difficult for Mexico to derive as much benefit from its vast oil reserves as it should. Counterintuitively, Pemex has made Mexico one of the world's highest cost energy producers, even in its low-wage environment.

Of all oil producing companies, public and private, in any country, Pemex is the most indebted. As a result, whereas other oil companies have been investing to develop new proved oil reserves, Pemex's reserves have been falling with much of the Gulf of Mexico still unexplored. Even without changing its constitution, Mexico's energy sector could be opened up to U.S. investment by using future oil revenues as collateral to finance the modernization of Mexico's oil sector.

The only way for Mexico to reduce the number of workers it sends to the U.S. is to transform itself into a jobs-producing, high-opportunity economy. The way to begin would be to allow unfettered U.S. investment. As that happens, Mexico should reform its bureaucracy -- to make it more efficient and transparent -- and make a real effort to do away with corruption. President Fox took a first, tentative step with his national transparency commissions. The next step is to clean up the nation's police force.

Mexico is a rich country, exporting its troubles north while pretending to fix them. It must do better. By creating an environment conducive to investment and relaxing restrictions, jobs will be created, and immigration will slow. A rapidly developing Mexico would induce would-be immigrants to stop seeking opportunities far from their homes and families, and start seeking them at home.

Messrs. Kurtzman and Yago are, respectively, senior fellow and director of capital studies at the Milken Institute.

A Debate Beyond The Fence (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

In our debate over immigration, we're talking past each other on issues of genuine concern to both sides, and we're using our confrontation over immigration to evade larger questions.

As the Senate moved to set up a clash with the House over how to deal with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, the country faced the prospect of a narrow and confusing discussion. On one side are those who just want to deal with border security and would like to deport a lot of those immigrants. On the other are those who also want to deal with security but would provide a path to citizenship for most, though not all, of those illegally in our country.

On the whole, senators -- such as John McCain and Ted Kennedy -- who want to deal with both security and legalization have the better of the argument. As President Bush has said, we're not about to round up and deport 12 million people, and we might as well face that fact. It is far better for our country, perhaps especially for the native-born, to transform members of an illegal subclass into taxpaying, rights-bearing citizens who can openly live up to their responsibilities as Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0029779

But advocates of a more liberal policy toward illegal immigrants need to take seriously the discontent that the anti-immigration movement has tapped into. Immigration has been a blessing to the United States, but it is not an unmixed blessing, and the costs of our immigration policies are borne more heavily by some parts of our society than others. Rather than dismiss all immigration critics as xenophobes, supporters of immigrant rights need to deal with the legitimate gripes of their opponents.

The most basic (and perhaps the simplest to deal with) is that immigrants cost local governments money even as they fill federal coffers with income, especially from payroll taxes. "The tax costs are local, but the tax windfalls are national," says Cecilia Muñoz, vice president for policy at the National Council of La Raza. "There's a local-national imbalance. It becomes a potent political issue locally, and there is nothing local governments can do."

A National Academy of Sciences study found that the average immigrant puts a net lifetime fiscal cost of $25,000 on state and local governments. "Estimates are that states and localities are forced to pay tens of billions of dollars in health and education costs for noncitizens," says Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). The federal government should share its tax windfall with localities, yet Clinton's amendment to the immigration bill to do just that was defeated last week. This issue will come back.

Less straightforward but still important are the effects of illegal immigration on the wages and working conditions of our fellow citizens at the bottom of the income structure. There is much debate over this effect, but the evidence suggests at least a small downward push on wages.

Low-income native workers worried about their own wages and job opportunities cannot be dismissed as special pleaders. What to do? Clearly laws against hiring illegal workers need to be enforced more effectively. But former labor secretary Robert Reich has made a broader point: If our labor laws, for immigrants and the native-born, were enforced more vigorously and consistently, all workers at the bottom of the economy would benefit.

The core problem illegal workers pose for the native-born is that the illegally employed are less likely to demand their rights and to complain about unfair treatment. The problem would be much less severe if the federal government were doing its job.

This, by the way, is why it would be a great mistake to create a large new class of "guest workers" with no pathway to citizenship. Paradoxically, those most worried about the impact of immigration should be those most insistent upon full rights for immigrants. Establishing a separate and unequal population with limited civil, political and social rights is the surest way of undercutting the rights of those who were born here.

Of course, the immigration battle is not just about economics. It also entails sharp cultural confrontations, particularly in areas of heavy immigration. Our nation's long history of such fights suggests that cultural battles are more easily resolved when legitimate economic grievances on both sides of the immigration divide are taken seriously.

Paradoxically, those fighting to achieve justice for immigrants will reach their goal only if they are also seen as fighting for justice for the native-born. The native-born, in turn, will find their rights better protected if the rights of immigrants are guaranteed, too.

Our National Laboratory For Bad Government (CHIT)

By Molly Ivins

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas -- Last week, President Bush visited Yuma, Ariz., to tour a portion of the U.S.-Mexico Border by Border Patrol buggy. Maybe Jorge was doing a little measuring for the $3.2 million-a-mile fence the Senate approved, which I guarantee will be really helpful. Are they insane? As Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano observes, "Show me a 50-foot wall, and I'll show you a 51-foot ladder."

Meanwhile, Republicans in the Senate have constructively declared English the national language. That'll fix everything. Every foreigner at our borders will stop and say: "Good thing to know. I'll begin speaking it immediately."

Yes sir, you want a solution, call a Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0029780

Of course, I am enchanted to discover that the entire project will be turned over to Raytheon, General Dynamics and other military contractors--think Halliburton with non-competitive bids, anyone? Because this outsourcing stuff is just working like a charm. Another Republican solution.

Ted Koppel suggests in the New York Times that we outsource war: "Blackwater and other leading security companies are seriously proposing to officials at very high levels of the government that their private forces could relieve a number of the burdens now being shouldered [or not] by American troops. ... The Pentagon ... is nonetheless struggling to come to terms with what it now calls `the long war.' There is every expectation that the fight against global terrorism and the most extreme forms of Islamic fundamentalism will last for many years. This is a war that will not necessarily require aircraft carriers, strategic bombers, fighter jets or heavily armored tanks. It will certainly not enable the United States to exploit its advantages in nuclear weapons. It is a war, indeed, that favors the highly mobile and adaptive fighting skills of the former Special Forces soldiers and other ex-commandos ..."

"Will"? Hell! Did and does. This is a war that is being fought with the wrong tools--and, in Iraq, at the wrong time, in the wrong place and against the wrong enemy.

It never did call for tanks, jets or carriers--just a combination of good detectives and good intelligence. In other words, smart, clever people with language skills. All of which we have fully available to us because of ... immigration. Lebanese, Iraqis, Iranians, Syrians, Pakistanis and Indonesians have all become Americans, and in so many cases we got the bravest of the brave--those who saw their country torn apart by religious factions. These are Americans who know the culture and language of the Middle East and other Islamic countries and who care deeply about how it all comes out.

By all means, reform immigration with this deep obeisance to the Republican right-wing nut faction and their open contempt for "foreigners." But do not pretend for one minute that it is not a craven political bow to racism (Yes, racism--I am actually calling them racists, although they pretend it hurts their feelings. Try reading their Web sites and see for yourself), and to nativism, to xenophobia and to Know-Nothingism. Just don't forget what you are throwing away in the process.

Molly Ivins is a syndicated columnist based in Austin, Texas. E-mail: info@creators.com

TAX:

Feds Cut Off Phone Tax After 108 Years (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, May 26, 2006

A pesky, century-old tax on your phone bill is finally being put to rest.

The Treasury Department said Thursday that it will no longer collect a 3% federal excise tax on long-distance calls and would refund about $15 billion to taxpayers.

The tax was imposed in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War. It was designed as a tax on wealthy Americans, back when phone service was considered a luxury.

“It's not often you get to kill a tax, particularly one that goes back so far in history,” Treasury Secretary John Snow said.

Treasury said it was conceding its battle to uphold the tax after five appeals courts declared it illegal because of changes in the way long-distance calls are billed.

Phone companies and cellular carriers must stop billing for the tax Aug. 1. Individuals and businesses can file for refunds next year on their 2006 tax returns for excise taxes paid on long-distance calls since March 1, 2003.

Individuals who don't have phone bill records can seek a standard refund that has yet to be determined.

Elimination of the tax will cost Treasury about $46 billion in refunds, lost revenue and administrative expenses in the next five years. That should be offset by higher tax revenue from a strong economy, Snow said.

Phone companies hailed the move. “This is a good first step in alleviating consumers' telephone tax burden, which currently accounts for more than 18% of the average bill,” Verizon Vice President Tom Tauke said.

DOJ_NMG_0029781

Callers will still pay a 3% excise tax on local phone calls. But that tax will no longer be levied on services that don't distinguish local calls, such as cellular, all-distance landline plans and Internet-based offerings. Consumers with those services can seek refunds on their full excise-tax payments.

Snow urged Congress to repeal the local-phone excise tax, as well.

Phone Tax Laid To Rest At Age 108 (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Bowing to changes in technology and pressure from taxpayers and phone companies, the Treasury Department said yesterday that it would scrap the 108-year-old federal excise tax on long-distance phone calls. The move will bring consumers and businesses about $15 billion in refunds on next year's tax returns.

The decision, which applies to cellphones and Internet phone services and some landlines, follows a series of court reversals for the government. Large businesses had successfully sued the Internal Revenue Service to recoup the taxes they paid. Phone companies also wanted the tax abolished to relieve them of having to collect it.

Originally a luxury tax to help pay for the Spanish-American War, the 3 percent surcharge was calculated based on the length of the call and the distance of the connection. But as unlimited long-distance calling plans became commonplace, and the tax was applied to a flat monthly fee, some taxpayers argued that the tax no longer applied to them because the duration and distance of a call were irrelevant.

Though the tax will still be imposed on local phone service, the government will reimburse three years' worth of taxes on long-distance calls, including any plans that combine local and long-distance calling. Consumers, who pay about 40 percent of the taxes collected, typically pay about $18 a year in excise taxes if they have a long-distance service and a cellphone.

They will be able to file for a refund on their 2006 federal income tax returns.

"It's time to disconnect this tax and put it on the permanent do-not-call list," Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said. Yesterday's decision, he added, "marks the beginning of the end of an outdated, antiquated tax that has survived a century beyond its original purpose, and by now should have been ancient history."

The abolition of the tax, effective July 31, will cost the Treasury $5 billion annually in lost revenues in the next few years.

With budget deficits soaring, the Treasury had been slow to scrap the tax. But several federal courts ruled in recent years that it was no longer applicable to customers with unlimited long-distance plans. The Internal Revenue Service has refunded hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes to companies including OfficeMax and the American Bankers Insurance Group based on the court decisions.

While the courts said some businesses should get refunds, Congress had not repealed the tax, so the I.R.S. was compelled to continue collecting it. This created a peculiar dynamic in which taxpayers who won refunds still had to pay the tax in subsequent years and then reapply for another refund.

Companies in districts where courts had ruled against the tax could get refunds, while companies elsewhere still had to pay it.

Now, the hundreds of companies that applied for refunds before yesterday's decision will not have their claims processed, according to some tax lawyers. That means companies that could have won refunds through the courts might have to wait far longer for their refunds to arrive after they file their income tax returns.

"The Treasury wants to standardize the process, but it's grotesquely unfair to the people who got this started," said Hank Levine, a partner at Levine, Blaszak, Block & Boothby, a Washington law firm that has represented business plaintiffs in most of the successful cases to date. "The I.R.S. didn't want to give up the money, and now that they have been forced to, they are doing so grudgingly."

Congress was close to abolishing the tax in 2000, but it was attached to a larger tax bill that President Bill Clinton vetoed. Congressmen are again calling for its repeal.

Senators Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, and Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, asked the Senate Finance Committee yesterday to look also at eliminating the tax on local phone service.

DOJ_NMG_0029782

For now, the Treasury said that consumers and businesses would get refunds, including interest, on their 2006 income tax returns filed in 2007. The I.R.S. has not decided the size of the standard refund for individuals. But taxpayers who use a lot of phone services will be able to apply for a larger refund if they can document how much they paid in excise taxes.

The average household spends $10 a month on long-distance calls and $41 a month on wireless service, or $612 a year, according to figures from the Federal Communications Commission. Since those services are taxed at 3 percent, the typical household pays $18.36 a year in federal excise taxes, or $55 over three years.

Consumers, of course, can still expect plenty of taxes and fees on their phone bills. Phone companies are obligated to collect an array of state and local taxes as well as fees that pay for emergency response groups and public services provided by the Universal Service Fund and others.

Phone companies have opposed some of these taxes because of the expense of collecting them, and because it drives up the cost of their services, making them less attractive to consumers.

" Wireless consumers can now turn their attention and efforts to repealing discriminatory wireless taxes on the state and local level," said Steve Largent, the president of CTIA, a trade group that represents cellular companies.

Mr. Largent said 17 percent of the typical monthly cellular bill was made up of taxes and fees.

Carriers, however, are partly to blame for that burden because they charge their customers a range of discretionary fees to recoup their business costs. For instance, some customers are charged "property tax allotment" fees that are meant to pay for a company's real estate taxes. Other companies charge "carrier cost recovery fees" to pay for the administrative costs of collecting taxes.

These fees generate billions of dollars in revenue for the companies.

That is a far cry from 1898, when the tax was first levied and there were 681,000 phone subscribers in the United States, according to James Katz, a telecommunications historian at Rutgers University. Though relatively small in numbers, those subscribers paid a considerable amount in taxes to help finance the government's battle against Spain.

The annual basic charge for a home phone in the 1890's was about $100, or more than $2,200 in today's dollars. A three-minute call from New York to Chicago in 1902 cost $5.45 — about $120 today.

U.S. To End Contentious Phone Tax (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Treasury is conceding defeat in its battle to collect a long-distance telephone tax enacted to pay for the Spanish-American War, paving the way for business and individual taxpayers to get refunds, plus interest, going back three years.

The "telephone tax," which will be terminated July 31, imposed a 3% surcharge on consumers based on distance of the call. But today telecommunication companies don't price long-distance calls based on distance. Businesses argued that the tax was illegal, and the Internal Revenue Service spent years fighting -- and losing -- court challenges to the tax.

Treasury Secretary John Snow said he expects the refunds will cost government coffers about $13 billion. In addition to paying out refunds, the government also now will lose out on an estimated $37 billion in revenue over the next five years.

The IRS will include a provision on tax returns for the 2006 year that will allow businesses and individuals to apply for refunds. The IRS will soon issue details on how to claim the refund.

Businesses will likely draw the lion's share of the refunds because they pay a larger portion of the tax and are likely to have better access to old documents showing payments, if needed. But IRS Commissioner Mark Everson said he is drafting a "simple" process for individual consumers to legally claim the refund.

Individuals who paid the tax for the past three years, usually denoted on each monthly bill, could likely have to show proof that they paid the tax.

Mr. Snow said the government will be able to shoulder the projected $13 billion hit because government collections from business and individual taxes have grown and are projected to rise steadily. "The revenue of the U.S. government is strong and can easily absorb this."

DOJ_NMG_0029783

The levy has long been targeted for removal by conservatives. At the announcement, Mr. Snow was flanked by House Republicans who were among the most politically endangered incumbents of this midterm election year, including House Republican Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce of Ohio, and Reps. Jeb Bradley of New Hampshire, Thelma Drake of Virginia, and Mike Fitzpatrick and Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania.

Though courts have ruled the tax illegal, Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said he intends to have his panel consider legislation to abolish it all together.

As of now, consumers still have to pay the local portion of the telephone excise tax but that may change also. Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.) said he is pursuing eliminating the local tax assessed on local calling plans.

While the origins of the telephone tax stem from an 1898 law -- in essence a luxury tax -- to fund the Spanish-American war, the current interpretation of the law was last modified in the 1960s.

Courts have ruled 10 times in recent years that the government is misapplying the tax and ordered refunds to companies that have sued over the charges. Several companies over the years have won refunds, including OfficeMax Inc. and Honeywell International Inc. Even so, the IRS continued to collect the tax and the Justice Department continued to litigate. All companies with pending cases can now apply for refunds.

"There is going to have to be a company-by-company settlement," said Jack Miles, tax partner at New York-based law firm Kelley, Drye & Warren who has successfully sued the IRS on behalf of clients fighting the payment of the telephone tax. He said that he is representing 30 more businesses with pending cases against the IRS. "IRS officials have advised me that it will be years to clear up the corporate backlog."

Telecommunications companies hailed the tax rollback. "This is a tax that discourages consumption," said Walter B. McCormick Jr., president and chief executive of USTelecom, a U.S. telecom trade group. "It is a positive thing for consumers and positive for our nation."

'Antique' Phone Tax Dropped (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Treasury to Refund $13 Billion Collected on Long-Distance Calls

The Treasury Department, conceding that it has no right to continue collecting a 108-year-old tax on long-distance telephone calls, announced yesterday that it will drop its legal battle for the tax and instead refund about $13 billion to callers who have paid the tax in the past three years.

The 3 percent tax, enacted in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War and revised in 1965, has been declared illegal by five federal courts of appeal during the past year as the result of challenges brought by companies forced to pay it.

Long-distance carriers have been required to bill customers for the tax and remit it to the government.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow yesterday called it "an outdated, antiquated tax that has survived a century beyond its original purpose, and by now should have been ancient history."

The tax, which was originally considered a luxury tax because only wealthy people had telephones at the time, will go out of existence July 31.

"It's a great day for consumers," said Gene Kimmelman, director of the Washington office of Consumers Union. "The last residue of the Spanish-American War is finally complete."

The Treasury Department had no figures on how much of a refund an individual might expect, but Kimmelman said, "People with the biggest phone bills will be the biggest winners." Those are principally businesses and high-income consumers who tend to make heavier use of phone services than do lower-income individuals, he said.

However, he cautioned that many, perhaps most, households will see only a modest refund -- possibly $10 or so. Over the past several years, traditional long-distance usage has fallen as cellphones and the Internet have gained in popularity.

Snow said the taxpayers will be able to claim three years' worth of the telephone tax, the legal limit on claiming tax overpayments, on their 2006 tax returns. The Internal Revenue Service, he said, is working on a simplified method by which taxpayers can claim their refunds.

DOJ_NMG_0029784

It is expected that, as with sales-tax deductions, taxpayers will be allowed to claim either a standard amount or an exact amount based on their phone bills. Individuals who are not required to file tax returns will be offered a special form for the rebate.

"It was an antiquated tax that made no sense whatever," Kimmelman added. With advances in telephone technology, cellphones and the Internet, he said, it has become increasingly difficult to determine which party in a call the tax should be assigned to.

"You can't track it," he said. "That made the levy unsustainable."

The $13 billion in rebates will cost the government more than the estimated $10 billion that would have been handed out under Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) short-lived proposal to give taxpayers $100 apiece to offset high gasoline prices.

Snow noted that a similar levy on local calling remains in effect, and he called upon Congress "to terminate the remainder of this antique tax by repealing the excise tax on local service as well."

UPDATE: Treasury Concedes Fight Over Federal Telephone Tax (DOW)

Dow Jones, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Individual and corporate taxpayers will be eligible for an estimated $13 billion in tax refunds after the Treasury Department abandoned a legal fight over a federal long distance telephone tax.

Treasury Secretary John Snow on Thursday announced the government's surrender in a long-running legal fight over the long-distance telephone tax, first imposed in 1898 to fund the Spanish-American War.

It came after the government lost an estimated 10 court cases, including five federal appellate court cases, challenging the legality of a 3% federal excise tax on long-distance services.

Millions of individuals and businesses that paid the tax will be eligible for refunds, plus interest, for taxes paid on long-distance service billed after Feb. 28, 2003. Tax experts said it may be the broadest case involving elimination of a tax through a legal challenge.

"I can't think of a tax situation where there was an issue that affected as many Americans," said George Clarke, an attorney for Baker & McKenzie LLP who represented Radio Shack in a telephone tax lawsuit.

Snow summed up the government's capitulation: "The American taxpayers have been right."

The tax has long been targeted by conservatives for elimination.

Speaking at a Capitol Hill press conference, Snow was visibly pleased to announce demise of the long distance telephone tax, long targeted for elimination by conservatives.

"It's not often you get to kill a tax," Snow said, surrounded by several Republican House members who oppose the tax.

Snow also called on Congress to repeal the remaining part of the telephone excise tax as it applies to local telecommunications services. Today's announcement "marks the beginning of the end of an outdated, antiquated tax that has survived a century beyond its original purpose, and by now should have been ancient history," Snow said.

The Internal Revenue Service has lost at least 10 cases that contend the telephone excise tax can't be collected on flat-rate long distance telecommunications services. The telephone tax is a 3% rate on the value of local, long distance and wireless phone services.

The issue involves companies such as Radio Shack, OfficeMax (OMX) and Honeywell International (HON) that have been challenging an outdated definition of telecommunications services in the tax law.

The current law, which originates from the 1960s, defines "taxable service" as the rate computed based on distance and time of each long-distance call.

The telecommunications companies argue that it is outdated since long-distance services are no longer based on distance and time but instead on flat, per- minute rates or a single rate for unlimited calls. Long distance service also is sold as part of a broader bundle of services.

The Justice Department will no longer pursue litigation concerning these cases.

DOJ_NMG_0029785

Taxpayers will be eligible to file for refunds of all excise tax they have paid on long-distance service for the past three years. Taxpayers will claim this refund on their 2006 tax returns, to be filed in 2007. The IRS said it soon will announce a simplified method to seek the refunds.

Clarke, the Baker & McKenzie attorney, said taxpayers needs to carefully read the fine print of the refund procedures in order to get their money.

Snow said corporations, small businesses and individuals will qualify for an estimated $13 billion in refunded back taxes over three years.

Snow said he didn't know what portion of the tax is paid by corporations and individuals, and he couldn't estimate the size of individual refunds.

Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., told reporters in a separate conference call with Snow that he would pursue eliminating the local portion of the excise tax. With Thursday's announcement, Santorum said the telephone tax would remain on basic local telephone plans and the very inexpensive local plans which are overwhelmingly used by low income individuals.

"This tax becomes what was a regressive tax to an extremely regressive tax," Santorum said. He didn't estimate the cost of repealing the tax on local telephone services, but said it would be less than the long distance tax repeal.

Snow said rising federal revenues, associated with the growing economy, will more than offset cost of the long distance tax, which officially will terminate July 31, 2006.

"The revenue stream of the U.S. government is strong and can easily absorb this," Snow said.

-By Rob Wells, Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-9272; Rob.Wells@dowjones.com

Treasury Disconnects Tax On Long-distance Calls (MRKTWTCH)

By Jeffry Bartash, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, May 26, 2006

3% excise originally established a century ago to pay for short-lived war

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The brief Spanish-American War ended more than a century ago, but not the federal tax assessed to fund the conflict. Until now.

On Thursday, the U.S. Treasury said it would stop collecting the 3% federal excise tax on long-distance calls, a fee originally assessed in 1898. The government also said it will issue refunds requested by consumers and businesses that paid the fee over the past three years. Taxpayers will be able to request refunds when they file 2006 tax returns in early 2007.

The Treasury also said the Justice Department would cease litigation in support of the tax after a handful of federal appeals courts ruled the fee illegal in decisions rendered within the past year. The most recent loss in federal court occurred earlier this month.

"The Federal Appeals courts have spoken across the board," Treasury Secretary John Snow said in a statement. "It's time to 'disconnect' this tax and put it on the permanent 'do not call' list."

The tax, which generates more than $6 billion annually, has survived repeated efforts to eliminate it, most recently in 2000, when President Bill Clinton vetoed a larger bill that included a repeal of the excise fee.

Bills aimed at ending the tax have circulated every year since. Businesses call the tax unfair and outdated. Phone companies say it's costly and complex to administer. Consumer-advocacy groups say the flat-rate fee put an undue burden on poorer Americans. Virtually no one in Washington supported the tax.

Nonetheless, for decades long-distance companies such as AT&T Inc. (T: news, board) and Sprint Nextel Corp. (S: news, board) have been required to collect the excise fee from customers and pass it on to the federal government.

In recent years, however, some large corporations such as Hewlett Packard have successfully sued to get rid of the tax on claims that it was illegal. Others have won large refunds from the Internal Revenue Service.

What's more, rapid changes in telecommunications technology have rendered the tax obsolete, critics say. The Internet, for example, makes it more difficult to discern what sort of communication is taking place over long distance and customers are increasingly billed via flat-rate plans instead of per-minute charges, particularly in the relatively new wireless business.

DOJ_NMG_0029786

The excise tax works out to $1.50 per every $50 in long-distance calls, not a particularly large sum for consumers. Yet for a business that spends, say, $10,000 a month on long-distance calls, the tax would equal $300 a month or $3,600 a year.

If the tax remained in place over the next decade, it would have generated about $67 billion for federal coffers, a congressional panel estimated. Altogether, the excise tax has raised more than $300 billion in its entire existence, the Congressional Research Service found.

The excise fee was originally established in 1898 on long distance because phones were considered a luxury and only the wealthiest Americans could afford service. These days, the tax affects all consumers directly or indirectly, no matter what their annual income.

At its highest point, the long-distance excise reached 25% during World War II and the Korean War and it remained as high as 10% during the Vietnam War. The excise later fell to as low as 1% in 1982 before being bumped up to 3%, a level made permanent in 1990.

In announcing his decision, Treasury Secretary Snow also called on Congress to eliminate the 3% federal excise tax on local phone calls. That tax is separate from the long-distance fee.

"Customers should see a noticeable difference in their phone bills within the next few months," said Herschel Abbott, vice president of governmental affairs at BellSouth." We hope this decision is a harbinger of removal of other discriminatory taxes on communications customers."

Jeffry Bartash is a reporter for MarketWatch in Washington.

FBI And IRS Seek Documents In Land Deal Involving Palm Beach County Commissioner (FLSUNSEN)

By Jerome Burdi, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, May 26, 2006

The FBI and Internal Revenue Service on Thursday went after documents regarding a controversial land deal involving Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti and the South Florida Water Management District.

A subpoena for the documents was served on the water management district, Chairman Kevin McCarty confirmed.

McCarty said the water management district counsel called him to tell him the news.

"We didn't know that Commissioner Masilotti was involved" in the sale McCarty said. "There was a secret trust involved in it ... We thought we were buying it just from the Lee brothers."

In recent months, Masilotti and his ex-wife, Susan, have come under scrutiny for making more than $1.3 million through a series of complex transactions in Martin County, according to court and land records.

The South Florida Water Management District was buying land in southern Martin County for preservation, and Susan Masilotti got into a deal in September 2002 with David and Jeffrey Lee, who sold their Black Diamond nursery in Masilotti's commission district to developers several years before.

Neither the FBI nor IRS would confirm or deny the papers were served.

McCarty said all copies of the sales documents were requested.

"It came as a complete surprise to us," McCarty said, emphasizing that the water district was not served with papers beyond the request for the sale documents. "I guess when you try to keep it a secret like that it raised the curiosity of the authorities."

The water management district will turn over all the documents, which could take up to 30 days, he said.

Masilotti, who could not be reached for comment, despite attempts by phone, has said he did nothing wrong by profiting from the deals. The deals were first revealed in court filings in the Masilottis' divorce case in January, when Susan Masilotti filed a financial disclosure form listing $1.3 million in 10 certificates of deposit she purchased in 2005. Her financial disclosure also referred to the Martin County land deals. The CDs were purchased beginning soon after Susan Masilotti sold a portion of the land she bought.

On May 16, Masilotti, a Republican, said he would not seek re-election this fall amid criticism over the land deal from his own political party.

DOJ_NMG_0029787

The Lees bought huge swaths of land in southern Martin County, about 3,500 acres, for $7.9 million in January 2001, according to land records and an appraisal of the property done for the water management district.

They eventually sold most of the land to the water management district for $43 million, and they brought three partners into the deal before the payoff, according to the water district appraisal. The water management district made its final installment payment last month, McCarty said.

He said he hasn't been in touch with Masilotti and didn't know the federal government was conducting an investigation.

Susan Masilotti's name didn't appear in the public records relating to the land deals because she used a trustee to purchase the land and hold it, records show. The trustee bought 147 acres from the Lees for $367,500 in September 2002.

Then in March 2004, as the Lees prepared to sell their land and that of their partners to the water district, they recorded a series of documents in Martin County land records. They bought back Susan Masilotti's 140 acres for $2.1 million, and sold her another 150-acre parcel for the same price.

In that deal, the Lees agreed to purchase 110 of the 150 acres from Susan Masilotti by April 2005 so long as they sold their property to the water district.

On the day of the deadline, the Lees paid $1.7 million for the 110 acres. Susan Masilotti saw more than a $1.3 million profit, taking into consideration the original $367,500 she invested in the deals.

The trustee recently transferred the remaining 40 acres of land into Susan Masilotti's name, land records show.

In Susan Masilotti's divorce financial-disclosure forms, she listed her husband as the beneficiary of three of the $100,000 CDs. In his court filings, Tony Masilotti listed his "wife's cash" of $1.3 million as a marital asset.

The couple were headed for a divorce trial earlier this month when they reached a confidential settlement, just as their attorneys were about to take depositions concerning the land deals that could be made public.

Other water management board members also were surprised about the subpoena.

"It's an unfortunate situation," said board member Nicolás Gutiérrez Jr., who learned the news from a reporter. "But our hands are very clean on all this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Frist Still Hopeful For Hayden Debate (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP2, May 25, 2006

CIA director-nominee Michael Hayden awaited confirmation from the Senate Thursday evening in a vote that would install the four-star general and veteran of intelligence controversies atop the civilian spy agency.

Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he remained hopeful the Senate could take up Hayden's nomination before departing for the Memorial Day recess.

Hayden, 61, would be the first active-duty or retired military officer to run the CIA in 25 years.

At his confirmation hearing, Hayden sought to assure senators that he would be independent from the Pentagon, but said he would consider how his uniform affects his relationship with CIA personnel. If it were to get in the way, he said, "I'll make the right decision."

Hayden became a lightening rod for the debate about the Bush administration's no-warrant surveillance program, which monitors domestic communications — without court approval — when one party is overseas and terrorism is suspected. Some Democrats and civil-liberties advocates argue the monitoring was illegal.

As head of the National Security Agency from 1999 to 2005, Hayden oversaw the groundbreaking operations, but his defenders have said repeatedly that he was relying on the advice of top government lawyers.

The White House tried to hurry Hayden's nomination through in under three weeks, in part by heeding Congress' five-month-old requests for more information on the classified operations.

But President Bush's selection of Hayden exposed fissures among Republicans who say the administration is making decisions without consulting Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0029788

"That's the way they decided to do business," House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., said in an interview Thursday. "The problem is there are major changes going on in the intelligence community, and the executive branch is doing it on their own."

Hoekstra said a military official shouldn't be in charge of the CIA, but he planned to look ahead and learn more about Hayden's vision for the agency. Hoekstra also said he would use every tool available to Congress — including the power of the purse — to ensure he has a voice in the intelligence reforms.

Hoekstra is among Republicans close to outgoing CIA Director Porter Goss who are angry that the Bush administration dismissed him suddenly from the post. "It was a very ungracious exit for a very gracious man," Hoekstra said of Goss, the former House Intelligence Committee chairman who had a 40-year career in government.

The top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record) of California, said the White House has treated Congress disrespectfully for years. "It is not confined to the process on the NSA program," she said.

At his confirmation hearing, Hayden said he wants to encourage the CIA's clandestine service to take more risks, expand how the CIA shares information with allied intelligence services and encourage the CIA's analysts to make hard-edge assessments.

Hayden said he wants the CIA out of the news — "as source or subject" — but also wants to win back public confidence in America's best-known spy agency.

Senate Clears The Way For Kavanaugh Vote (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, May 25, 2006

The Senate cleared the way Thursday for the confirmation of White House aide Brett Kavanaugh to a federal appeals court judgeship, over Democratic complaints that he is unseasoned and partisan.

By 67-30, senators approved a confirmation vote, set for Friday.

Democrats, however, complained that Kavanaugh has a long record of loyalty to President Bush and too short a record in the courtroom. They highlighted the American Bar Association's recent downgrading of its rating of Kavanaugh from "highly qualified" to qualified.

"It's clear that he is a political pick being pushed for political reasons," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "This is not a court that needs another rubber stamp for this president's exertion of executive power."

The White House and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter say Kavanaugh's Ivy League education, Supreme Court clerkship and other work had prepared him well for a federal judgeship. Specter's panel approved the nomination along party lines.

"It is hardly a surprise that Brett Kavanaugh would be close to the president, because the president selects people in whom he has confidence," said Specter, R-Pa. "Brett M. Kavanaugh must be confirmed."

Democrats initially threatened to filibuster Kavanaugh, but the bluster softened after Specter granted their request for a new hearing at which the nominee appeared.

There, Kavanaugh told Democrats he played no role in the White House formulation of policies on detainees, domestic wiretapping or any relationship with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Avoiding Clash, Senate Sends Judicial Nomination To Floor (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — The Senate cleared the way on Thursday for a top aide to President Bush, Brett M. Kavanaugh, to be confirmed for the federal appeals court, avoiding a partisan showdown over a nomination that had been stalled for three years.

Senators voted, 67 to 30, for a floor vote on the nomination, expected on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0029789

Democrats said Mr. Kavanaugh, who was on the staff of Kenneth W. Starr, the independent counsel who investigated President Bill Clinton, was too partisan and lacked the experience for the appellate bench.

But the senators were unwilling to block the nomination using a filibuster. That tactic could have prompted Republicans to respond with the so-called nuclear option, a rules change permanently barring judicial filibusters.

"I don't believe he's filibuster-able," said Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee who voted to bring the nomination to the floor.

Ms. Feinstein said she would vote against confirmation, saying that she would vote for Mr. Kavanaugh as a district judge, but saying, "the circuit, I think, requires more seasoning."

Mr. Kavanaugh has been nominated to a seat on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the court that produced Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

Mr. Kavanaugh's candidacy revived the fight over Mr. Bush's judicial nominees. For a time, Democrats hinted that they might use the filibuster against him.

They are promising to block the nomination of another nominee for an appeals court, Judge Terrence W. Boyle, a longtime federal judge in North Carolina, if Republicans try to bring it up for a vote.

Mr. Kavanaugh, 41, is Mr. Bush's staff secretary, a position in the president's inner circle. At his confirmation hearing, Democrats pressed him about whether he had a role in White House deliberations over domestic telephone surveillance; had met Jack Abramoff, the center of a lobbying scandal; or had involvement in writing legal memorandums used to justify coercive questioning of people who have been detained on suspicion of terrorism.

"No, Senator," he replied each time.

Democrats also pointed to an American Bar Association downgrading of its rating of Mr. Kavanaugh to "qualified" from "well qualified."

Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, senior Democrat on the judiciary panel, said Thursday that he could not recall any nominee's being confirmed after such a development.

Mr. Leahy said Mr. Kavanaugh had "failed miserably" to demonstrate "that he has the capacity to be independent of the president, to be an independent check on his political patron."

Republicans praised Mr. Kavanaugh as eminently qualified. Senator John Cornyn of Texas called him an "outstanding nominee," adding, "His nomination has been needlessly protracted and contentious."

Artful Dodging (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, May 25, 2006

May 24, 2006 - How different is the shiny new White House Press Secretary Tony Snow compared to his jaded predecessor Scott McClellan?

After more than two weeks inside the West Wing, Snow has pulled off the unusual coup of improving relations with the press corps while offering, at times, less information than McClellan. He has also managed to win widespread forgiveness for a series of foreign-policy fumbles that would have landed McClellan in deep trouble.

How has Snow won over the press corps? Take a look at the toughest of his customers: Helen Thomas, one of the longest-serving reporters at the White House, and--in the opinion of administration officials--one of the most hostile.

During Tuesday afternoon's press briefing, Thomas was grilling Snow on what role, if any, the United States was playing in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians over a two-state peace deal. Snow told Thomas that Washington was operating "the same as it's always been" and was working with Israel and "when possible" with the Palestinians.

"Then why is it bankrupting the Palestinians?" Thomas shot back.

Snow clutched the side of the podium. "The Palestinians are not being bankrupted, Helen," Snow said, smiling. "Hamas is a terrorist organization. We do not give money to terrorist organizations."

"They were democratically elected," Thomas insisted.

"They were democratically elected, and they're still a terrorist organization," Snow replied.

DOJ_NMG_0029790

"By your designation," Thomas snapped.

"Yes, thank you very much, Helen," Snow shot back.

That could have been a scene straight out of one of Scott McClellan's combative press briefings, if it weren't for what happened next. From the podium, Snow looked down at Thomas sitting in her front-row seat and noticed the veteran reporter was clutching a shiny red apple.

"By the way, that's a nice apple," Snow grinned.

"Here," Thomas instantly replied, offering the new press secretary her apple.

As the press room erupted in laughter, Snow dramatically leapt from the podium and grabbed the apple, placing it front and center on the lectern. "Whoever thought that Helen Thomas would kiss up to me," Snow said, laughing. "An apple for the teacher."

"Hardly!" Thomas shouted from the front row. But she was smiling--and so was every other reporter in the room.

Indeed, there's been a lot of smiling and plenty of jokes and laughter during the first two weeks of Snow's tenure as Bush's new press guy. The atmosphere in the briefing room, which only weeks ago seemed poisonous beyond repair, now seems relaxed and different enough to compensate for the fact that reporters don't seem to be getting any more straightforward answers than before.

Snow has openly dodged questions on everything from the NSA wiretaps to immigration reform--all the while admitting to reporters that he's doing so. Perhaps the most artful dodge has been Snow's tendency to say "I don't know"--a phrase that has been cited dozens of times in the last several briefings.

It's not unreasonable to think that Snow can and should only stick to the facts that he knows. But it's interesting to see how Snow has offered noncomments on issues where he should be fully up to speed. In some cases, Snow has been even less forthcoming than McClellan about what Bush and his advisers are doing.

Last week, Snow repeatedly declined to comment on even the most basic information that used to be easily confirmed with the White House. When border-state governors, including Arnold Schwarzenegger, complained that Bush had not consulted with them about his plan to deploy National Guard troops along the border, Snow at first declined to comment on whether the president had phoned the governors at all. "I'm not going to engage in on deliberations," Snow told reporters. When asked if Bush spoke to any members of Congress about his plan, Snow echoed his earlier remarks. "I'm not going to get into what the president did or did not do," he said. The new press secretary later admitted that he just didn't know if Bush consulted with the governors or not--but still declined to comment, though he said he knew "for a fact" there had been "staff contact."

During McClellan's reign at the White House, it was typical for the administration to put out information about the president's daily schedule, including meetings with members of Congress or phone calls between the president and lawmakers. No doubt part of that strategy was to stamp out accusations that relations between Bush and Congress are shaky, but it was also being practical. When lawmakers come to see Bush at the White House, they drive up the West Driveway--past so-called pebble beach, where TV reporters do their stand-ups and right outside the press briefing room. In other words, it was no secret.

But for the past two weeks, Snow hasn't put out such information and has declined to comment on such events--even though the meetings have obviously continued. On Tuesday, a group of congressional Republicans, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, met at the White House with Bush. The subject: immigration reform--a fact confirmed only when lawmakers who attended the meeting told reporters about it after the fact. Asked about the president's message during the meeting, House Majority Leader John Boehner told reporters, "It wasn't any different than everybody's heard before."

More startling is Snow's readiness to plunge into the realm of foreign policy when he seems unfamiliar with some basic details, including some of the most frequently repeated positions of the White House itself.

When asked about a possible military strike on Iran, Snow stumbled over one of the president's most common statements on the subject. Snow was lobbed a softball question suggesting that "nothing is off the table" in terms of military action.

His reply: "We've always said that." But then he continued, "Let me put it this way: The use of force is off the table. All right? Let me be specific. That is what the president has said. Is that not correct?"

Er, not quite. As reporters and White House staff started to shake their heads, Snow plunged back in. "I'm sorry," he said. "Is not off the table. Thank you. Yes, it's on the table."

DOJ_NMG_0029791

That wasn't the only problem for Snow. With Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at the White House, Snow managed to mangle the names of the main players on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

At his morning off-camera briefing, Snow repeatedly called the Palestinian president "Prime Minister Abbas." In fact, the prime minister, Hamas leader Ismail Haniya, is the sworn enemy of Israel and the United States. Later Snow mangled Abbas's nickname, Abu Mazen, when asked about the administration's assessment of his power. "I'm not going to get into whether the president is going to talk about … Abu Mazen, Abu Abbas, whatever you want to call him," Snow said. For good measure, Snow promoted the Israeli prime minister's position to "President Olmert."

Snow started out with good intentions. At his first off-camera briefing earlier this month, he said he wasn't going to deal with questions on foreign affairs or currency, because of one simple reason. "I do not want to set off global tempests," he said, "because I frankly just don't know enough on those." It sounds like he was right first time.

Treasury Secretary To Step Down (WP)

By Peter Baker And Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, who has presided during a period of strong economic growth but at times seemed out of sync with President Bush, has informed the White House that he will resign in the coming days after three years as the nation's chief economic officer, a source close to Snow said yesterday.

Snow asked the White House to announce his resignation in early June and said he plans to stay in the job no later than July 3 while a replacement is sought, the source said. The secretary's decision was intended to bring finality to a process that has played out awkwardly in public over months as Snow's job security has been a regular source of Washington speculation.

Republican insiders said possible candidates to succeed Snow include former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans, a longtime Bush friend; Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, a former Kellogg Co. chief executive; Ambassador David C. Mulford, a former treasury undersecretary who represents the United States in India; and Stephen Friedman, the president's former chief economic adviser and a former Goldman Sachs chief executive.

Two Republicans said Evans and his wife will accompany the Bushes to Camp David today, although they cautioned against reading too much into that because the two couples often spend holidays together. One of the Republicans said Evans would be willing to take the job if Bush indicates he needs him.

"There is a lean toward a person who's on the inside and would have the opportunity to come into the position very easily," said a former administration official, who like others insisted on anonymity to discuss a resignation that has not been formally announced.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, a former trade representative, had hoped to be named the next treasury secretary but does not appear likely to get the job, and has indicated to associates that he plans to resign soon to return to the private sector.

Robert M. Kimmitt, Snow's deputy, is another possible candidate. But his prospects may have been damaged by the controversy over a Dubai company's proposed takeover of terminal operations at U.S. ports; he was Treasury's point man on the process that initially approved the takeover.

Snow's impending departure has been expected for months, but word of his decision began leaking out yesterday and was first reported by the Dow Jones news service.

Bush, when asked about the Treasury secretary at his news conference last night, indicated only that he had not spoken directly with Snow and quickly changed the subject to positive economic indicators. "He has not talked to me about resignation," Bush said. "I think he's doing a fine job. I mean, after all, our economy is strong."

Snow first told then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. around Christmas last year that he was ready to go but said he would stay through the State of the Union address in January until a successor could be found, according to the source close to Snow. But the White House had trouble finding a person of stature from Wall Street to take over a job that, under Bush, has become more about selling policy than making it, which is why his team has turned to current and former government officials, according to several sources.

DOJ_NMG_0029792

Snow grew frustrated as news reports in recent weeks suggested that the White House wanted him out, the source close to him said. Rather than be left hanging any longer, he decided to set a firm July 3 departure date even if a replacement is not named. "He just didn't want it to drag on later than that," the source said. "He's anxious to get back to the private sector."

"With the economy in good shape," the source added, "it feels like a good time to leave on a high note." Snow, the source said, "is leaving on very good terms with the president."

A genial former railroad executive, Snow, 66, has hewed steadfastly to the White House line, in contrast with his feisty predecessor Paul H. O'Neill, who often irritated Bush aides by differing with the president on issues such as tax cuts and steel tariffs. Although Snow's loyalty is appreciated at the White House, he has followed his assigned script so closely that even some boosters concede he has sometimes come across as an ineffective salesman for the administration's policies.

In recent weeks, even amid reports about his impending departure, Snow has continued traveling around the country, delivering speeches touting the economy's strength and the recent surge of tax revenue as evidence that the president's policies are working.

At times, though, he has appeared disengaged. When questioned a few days ago at a congressional hearing on how high inflation has been over the past year, for example, he replied about 5 percent, when the correct answer was 3.5 percent.

But Snow could cite other numbers to bolster his legacy. The government announced yesterday that the gross domestic product grew a brisk 5.3 percent in the first quarter, and in a statement Snow noted that it has averaged 4 percent growth over the last three years. The news, he said, "further demonstrates the strength of the American economy."

Snow Plans To Leave Treasury Post Next Month (WSJ)

By John Harwood And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary John Snow plans to announce his departure from the Bush administration by mid-June, according to people familiar with the matter.

After months of criticism and speculation about his future, Mr. Snow has told the White House he wants to leave, a senior administration official said. He has withheld any announcement until President Bush settles on a successor, a process that is nearly concluded, the people familiar with the matter said.

Mr. Snow is scheduled to attend a meeting of G-8 finance ministers in Russia June 9 and 10, but that is expected to be his last major public event as secretary. The senior administration official said Mr. Snow's departure would be announced "within days."

At a news conference last night, President Bush said Mr. Snow "has not talked to me about resignation," but didn't address how long the secretary would remain on the job. He praised Mr. Snow for "doing a fine job" helping manage the U.S. economy.

White House officials declined to identify leading candidates to succeed him. Among those most often mentioned in Republican circles are David Mulford, currently the U.S. ambassador to India and a former undersecretary of the Treasury under President George H.W. Bush; Steve Friedman, the former head of Mr. Bush's National Economic Council; Don Evans, the former commerce secretary and Carlos M. Gutierrez, the current commerce secretary and former chief executive of Kellogg Co.

Others believed to be potential choices include Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick, though he has discussed leaving the administration in recent days; Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt, who was tarnished by involvement in overseeing the review of potential U.S. ports management by a firm based in the United Arab Emirates; and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, a former deputy Treasury secretary.

One reason Mr. Snow is believed to have stayed as long as he has is that the White House has had trouble identifying desired replacements. Some prominent Wall Street executives, such as Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson, have rebuffed overtures.

A former chairman and CEO of CSX Corp., Mr. Snow succeeded Paul O'Neill as Treasury Secretary in 2003. He hasn't committed major gaffes or repeated Mr. O'Neill's penchant for blunt-spoken independence. Yet he has been faulted for ineffectiveness in communicating the administration's message on the economy, which despite continued growth hasn't stopped the slide in Mr. Bush's poll ratings. As a result, Mr. Snow has endured nearly two years of speculation about when he would be replaced.

DOJ_NMG_0029793

While the economy is relatively strong, the next Treasury secretary will face challenges, in part because many Americans don't seem to feel that their economic situation is improving. A recent Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found that 77% of respondents call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data shows strong economic growth. Rising gas prices and concerns about Iraq continue to overshadow strong economic gains.

New Reports Of Change At Treasury (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — John W. Snow has signaled his readiness to step down as Treasury secretary, possibly by the end of June, or as soon as the White House has a candidate to succeed him, say Republicans with ties to the administration.

Mr. Snow, a congenial former railroad executive who took over the Treasury Department three years ago, has made it clear he did not expect to stay in the job beyond the midterm elections in November.

President Bush said Thursday at a news conference that he had not spoken to Mr. Snow about his plans.

Tony Fratto, the Treasury Department's chief spokesman, refused to comment, saying, "We don't comment or speculate on personnel issues."

But one Republican said Mr. Snow was prepared to leave soon after the Group of Eight meetings on June 8 and 9 in St. Petersburg, Russia.

It was not clear whom Mr. Bush might nominate as a successor. Speculation includes David Mulford, a Treasury official under President Ronald Reagan and the first President Bush who is currently the American ambassador to India; Donald Evans, who was secretary of commerce in Mr. Bush's first term; Carlos Gutierrez, the current commerce secretary; and Allan Hubbard, director of the White House National Economic Council.

Competition for Mr. Snow's job had already heated up within the administration. Robert Zoellick, currently the deputy secretary of state and previously the United States trade representative, is believed to have wanted the top Treasury post but was ruled out. He is now expected to step down and has been said to be talking to firms on Wall Street.

Administration officials have also been reported to have contacted Wall Street executives like Henry Paulsen, the chairman of Goldman Sachs.

Speculation about Mr. Snow's departure has been almost constant since Mr. Bush's re-election in 2004. But the speculation, including some fueled by White House officials, repeatedly turned out to be wrong.

Mr. Snow remained outwardly impervious to all the speculation, including published reports in which anonymous White House officials were quoted as predicting his ouster.

But even before Mr. Bush's re-election, officials suggested they wanted to shake up his economic team to better pursue an ambitious agenda — now stalled — of overhauling both Social Security and the tax code.

Veteran Data Was Removed Routinely, Official Says (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — Officials of the Veterans Affairs Department told angry lawmakers on Thursday that an agency employee had been taking home sensitive data for three years before some of the material was stolen from his residence, compromising the records of 26.5 million veterans.

"He said that he routinely took such data home to work on it, and had been doing so since 2003," George J. Opfer, the department's inspector general, told senators, some of whom expressed amazement at how the department has handled the theft.

Because the data included Social Security numbers and birth dates as well as names, there has been widespread concern that the information could be used by computer-handy criminals for credit card fraud and other forms of identity theft.

DOJ_NMG_0029794

Secretary Jim Nicholson said 105,753 calls had been logged from Monday, when his agency set up a special toll-free information line, to Wednesday night.

Mr. Nicholson said he believed computer security had lagged at the agency, which he has headed for just over a year, because of past "embedded cultural resistance" to change.

That inertia is beginning to dissolve, he told a joint hearing of the Veterans' Affairs and Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committees.

"But I'm not going to tell you it's what it should be," he replied to a question from Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who heads the homeland security panel.

Mr. Nicholson said that just sending letters to veterans whose data was compromised — those discharged since 1975, plus some veterans getting disability compensation — would cost $11 million to $12 million. He did not specify how much the agency expected to spend on telephone banks, Web sites and other measures, but Senator Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington, said she expected him to have to ask for more money.

"This responsibility rests on me," Mr. Nicholson told the senators, who greeted him warmly and seemed angry not at him but at the bureaucracy of the 235,000-employee veterans agency, which has been criticized by its own inspector general's office several years in a row for inadequate data security.

It seemed possible from exchanges between Mr. Nicholson and members of the committees that the full dimension of the current data breach, which came about because an agency employee's suburban house was burglarized after he took the data home without authorization, might not yet be known.

Ms. Murray, who sits on the Veterans Affairs Committee, posed this question: Suppose letters are sent to veterans who have already died and then returned unopened; could spouses or other relatives be vulnerable?

"That's a good question," Mr. Nicholson replied. "We'll have to look at that."

Moreover, he said that the data on some veterans included "numerical disability ratings and the diagnostic codes which identify the disabilities being compensated," enough knowledge for some unauthorized people to compute compensation payments.

Mr. Nicholson said the employee who took the data home had broken no law "as near as I can tell," even though he had violated department policy. He said the employee, a data analyst, had been cooperating with the Montgomery County police and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Nicholson said he continued to be outraged over the delay between the burglary, on May 3, and the date he learned about it, May 16. Senators Collins and Larry E. Craig, the Idaho Republican who heads the Veterans' Affairs Committee, described the time lag as "baffling," "mind-boggling" and "just unbelievable."

Veterans' Data Theft Went Unreported (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, May 25, 2006

The Veterans Affairs data analyst who lost the personal data of 26.5 million veterans improperly took the information home for three years before the data was stolen, government investigators told Congress Thursday.

In a pair of hearings, VA Inspector General George Opfer detailed a series of missteps leading to one of the nation's largest information security breaches. He noted that his office only became aware of the May 3 burglary through office gossip.

"We were never notified," Opfer told Senate and House panels investigating the breach, explaining that one of his employees first heard about a burglary — and that VA electronic records may have been stolen — while attending a routine meeting on May 10.

"It wasn't until we interviewed the employee on the 15th that we knew we had a significant problem" involving a vast cache of Social Security numbers, birthdates and disability ratings, Opfer said. Only then did the VA bring in local and federal law enforcement to investigate.

The disclosure comes as the VA is under attack for a three-week delay in publicizing the burglary. During the hearing, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said he was "mad as hell" that employees did not tell him about the breach until May 16.

DOJ_NMG_0029795

He acknowledged that Deputy Secretary of Veterans Affairs Gordon Mansfield knew immediately about the incident. But he declined to say whether Mansfield would be fired or how the theft could have happened, citing the need to await results of a full investigation.

"As a veteran, I am outraged. Frankly I'm mad as hell," Nicholson said. "I can't explain the lapses of judgment on the behalf of my people. We will stay focused on these problems until we get them fixed."

Lawmakers were skeptical.

"The testimony you gave us is absolutely baffling," said Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), R-Maine, who chairs the Homeland Security Committee. "You seem to be saying it was just one employee. But it's not just one employee. You have a high-risk vulnerable system that has been identified time and again as vulnerable."

At the House hearing, Rep. Bob Filner (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. was even more blunt.

"Your own people don't tell you about the theft involving 26 million veterans. You say you take responsibility but then you tell veterans to go call your creditors," he said.

"You're not taking responsibility for this mismanagement debacle," Filner said. "The most dramatic thing to take responsibility is to resign."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday that wasn't going to happen.

"He'll have his opportunity to testify on Capitol Hill today," Snow said of Nicholson. "I'm sure they will have sharp questions for him. But he's not tendering his resignation."

Congress is trying to determine whether the VA had adequate security measures in place to guard against the unauthorized disclosure of veterans' Social Security numbers and birthdates. It is one of the nation's largest security breaches.

Also at issue is why the department waited so long before acknowledging that a government-owned laptop and disks were stolen in what appeared to be a routine burglary at an agency analyst's home in Maryland.

During the hearing, Rep. Steve Buyer (news, bio, voting record), R-Ind., chairman of the House veterans panel, pressed Nicholson to give the nation's veterans assurances that their information will not be used for identity theft, or that they would be "made whole" if the information is misused.

Nicholson said he could not, saying that the VA would have to get more funding to compensate veterans. Nicholson has previously downplayed the potential danger, explaining that the May 3 theft appeared to be a random burglary.

"Before I can give you that assurance, I have to work with Congress ... if they suffer a loss," Nicholson said, who added that it would take about $25 million alone to improve security procedures at his agency. "It will give piece of mind to veterans if they suffer a loss to have a system to compensate."

Nicholson got an endorsement from President Bush even as lawmakers pressed for greater accountability and awaited answers in the hearings and a subsequent joint meeting of the Senate Veterans' Affairs and the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committees.

Snow said Wednesday said Bush had "full faith and confidence" in Nicholson. Snow originally had declined to issue a statement of support in the president's name, but then said he wanted to clarify his remarks.

Nicholson is a Vietnam War veteran and former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

___

On the Net:

Information for veterans suspecting identity theft:

http://www.firstgov.gov or 1-800-FED-INFO

Worker Often Took Data Home (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Department of Veterans Affairs data analyst who lost 26.5 million veterans' personal information when his home was burglarized had routinely taken such data home since 2003, VA Inspector General George J. Opfer said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0029796

"It wasn't like all of a sudden one night he took home all this data," Opfer said during a break in House and Senate hearings on the massive information security breach.

Authorities announced a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the laptop computer and external hard drive stolen May 3 from the employee's Aspen Hill home. The VA inspector general and the FBI are offering the reward. Montgomery County police asked anyone with information to call 866-411-8477.

Federal investigators have removed other sensitive VA data the worker was not authorized to have at home, Opfer testified. He said his staff will identify all the data the employee had at home and determine which supervisors knew about it.

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said the stolen information was not encrypted or "scrambled." He reiterated that there has been no indication that thieves are using the data to open credit card accounts, take out bank loans or engage in other forms of identity theft.

The electronic file contained names and dates of birth for as many as 26.5 million veterans who have been discharged since 1975, or who were discharged in any year and are collecting disability compensation from the department, Nicholson said. The file also included the Social Security numbers of 19.6 million of those veterans, he said. He said fewer than 100 spouses are believed to be included in the file.

Opfer said his office did not learn of the lost data until May 10, and then only through an offhand remark by a VA employee at a routine meeting. Nicholson was even further out of the loop; he testified yesterday that his subordinates failed to inform him until May 16 -- nearly two weeks after the theft put millions of veterans at risk of identity theft. The FBI was not told until May 17, and Nicholson did not make a public announcement until Monday.

"I'm so damn mad at the loss of veterans' data and the fact that one person can put all of us at risk," said Nicholson, an Army veteran who served in Vietnam. "I can't explain these lapses in judgment on the part of my people. . . . After the inspector general finishes his investigation and finds exactly what happened, I plan to take decisive actions. "

Nicholson said several VA officials have offered their resignations but he will not decide whether to accept them until the investigation is complete. "I am the person ultimately responsible to our veterans, and therefore I am the person responsible for this situation," the secretary said.

He repeated his plan to have all VA employees take a cybersecurity training course by June 30 and to increase background checks of employees with access to sensitive information. He said the employee who took the data home last had a background check 32 years ago.

Lawmakers, besieged by calls from outraged veterans, lambasted Nicholson both for the security breakdown and for the department's sluggish response.

Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, called the entire episode "absolutely baffling."

"If the employee had chosen not to report the theft immediately, VA and the public could possibly still be in the dark," said Hawaii Sen. Daniel K. Akaka, the top Democrat on the Veterans Affairs Committee.

"Something like this should never go unknown by the boss," said Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.).

Several lawmakers noted that the department's information security measures have repeatedly been identified as vulnerable in recent years.

"The system is so poorly designed that one employee can compromise the whole thing," said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), chairman of the veterans panel, said he believes that the VA data analyst was "a dedicated federal employee who took work home with the hope of improving VA operations."

He said the department, and not veterans themselves, should cover the cost of the increased credit monitoring made necessary by the loss of the personal data. "There were many lapses in judgment for which many people are going to have to answer," Craig said. "This was not an error that a veteran made. This was an error that the system that provides services to them made."

Cost To Inform Vets Of Data Theft Starts At $10M (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

DOJ_NMG_0029797

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — It will cost at least $10 million to inform veterans that their personal information may be in the hands of criminals, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson told Congress on Thursday. He warned that the ultimate price tag of the government's response could be tens of millions more.

Letters will be sent to the 26.5 million veterans whose names, birth dates and, in most cases, Social Security numbers were stolen from the Maryland home of a department analyst May 3, Nicholson said at back-to-back hearings. Postage and paper will make up the bulk of the cost.

The department also is considering providing veterans with a credit monitoring or counseling service at a free or reduced charge.

Taxpayers could be hit for much more. When asked for an estimate, Nicholson tossed out the figure of $100 million — or more.

There's no indication the data are being used for criminal purposes, and Nicholson and George Opfer, the agency's inspector general, say they believe the theft was random.

Still, Nicholson told lawmakers, he's “mad as hell” at the employee,

Several lawmakers responded by scolding Nicholson for what they called systemic problems. They pointed to reports from the agency's inspector general that they said identified weaknesses in the information technology system.

“You seem to be saying it's just one employee,” said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. “But it's not just one employee. You have a high-risk, vulnerable system.”

According to the Montgomery County Police Department in Maryland, a laptop computer and an external hard drive with the veterans' information were stolen. The analyst, who has been placed on leave, was not authorized to take the data home, Nicholson said. Nonetheless, he had been doing so since 2003, Opfer said.

The data include the information on 26.5 million veterans and fewer than 100 spouses of veterans, Nicholson said. Social Security numbers for 19.6 million of those veterans also were included.

Even though the employee promptly informed his supervisor and local police about the theft, Nicholson said he wasn't informed until May 16.

On Thursday, the agency and FBI announced a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the stolen data.

Veterans Chief Is Grilled Over Stolen Data (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The theft of a disk containing names, birth dates and Social Security numbers for as many as 26.5 million veterans and their spouses stirred fury in Congress on Thursday, as Republicans and Democrats pounced on Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson, demanding to know why the agency's notorious computer security issues had not been fixed.

With millions in danger of identity theft because a VA data analyst took home a computer disk that was later stolen during a burglary, more than 100,000 aggrieved veterans sought answers from 14 call centers set up by the Department of Veterans Affairs. They also took their complaints to the airwaves and the Internet, where one Vietnam vet set up an online petition urging Nicholson to quit.

Amid calls for Nicholson's resignation, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said President Bush had "full faith and confidence" in the Veterans Affairs secretary.

Nicholson, a 67-year-old former Army Ranger who fought in Vietnam, said in testimony before House and Senate committees that he was "mad as hell" that the employee had taken the disk home, and that his deputy secretary, Gordon Mansfield, had not informed him of the security breach for two weeks.

"As a veteran, I am outraged," Nicholson said. "I'm outraged that this employee would do this so recklessly, and I'm outraged that I wasn't notified sooner."

He added: "Other people are also in my sights as a result of this."

DOJ_NMG_0029798

But neither Congress nor veterans' groups was appeased. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, the nation's largest group of combat veterans, issued a sharp response to the VA's advice to individuals to check their own credit reports.

"Telling 26.5 million veterans to deal with this as individuals is a totally unacceptable response," the VFW's national commander, James R. Mueller, said in an e-mailed statement. "We strongly suggest that the federal government start figuring out a way to deal with this problem computer-to-computer between the VA, national credit bureaus and other national institutions."

During the hearings on Capitol Hill, the VA's inspector general, George Opfer, said the agency had been unable to formally notify the affected veterans because "we don't have 26 million envelopes."

Opfer estimated the costs of buying, addressing and mailing the envelopes at $10 million to $11 million.

Asked the cost for preventing and covering potential losses from identity theft, Nicholson estimated "way north of $100 million" and did not rule out a total as high as $500 million.

He told the House committee that the stolen records were those of veterans who have been discharged since 1975 or who are receiving compensation for disabilities.

The missing data include the names and birth dates of about 26.5 million veterans and some of their spouses, along with 19.6 million Social Security numbers.

Officials at the White House and Veterans Affairs stressed that so far the records have not been compromised and that the FBI is trying to recover them.

In the meantime, veterans were being advised to notify banks and credit card companies, and lawmakers were talking about earmarking funds to pay for veterans to get regular credit reports.

"I'm absolutely furious," said Stewart Resmer, a Vietnam veteran from Santa Monica who started the anti-Nicholson petition at http://www.petitionspot.com .

Noting that the VA had lost thousands of records in a 1973 fire at its National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis, Resmer said:

"Now they make us prove that we were shot or where we were, and we have to get two buddy statements. We've had our tails shot off and lived to tell it. They never sent me a letter about Agent Orange; I don't need them to get me a free credit report check. They should be looking to replace all of our Social Security numbers."

The breach dramatically underscores the risks inherent in information collection in a high-tech age. In Washington, where many government officials take work home or on the road, the advent of powerful, lightweight laptop computers has turned routine home burglaries into major security threats. In 2000, a State Department employee was fired and five others were disciplined over a missing laptop that contained top-secret information.

"The VA is not alone in the potential to suffer a data breach of this magnitude," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), calling the security failure "a wake-up call to the rest of the federal government."

Still, the VA has been famously lagging in computer security — having earned an "F" on an annual federal computer security report card compiled by the House Government Reform Committee in four of the last five years.

Several lawmakers expressed concern that the security lapse was the tip of the iceberg.

"Just unbelievable," said Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), chairman of the Senate Committee on Veterans Affairs. "How is it that VA's computer system permits one person to download the records of 26 million individuals and no one is alerted?"

Others called for Nicholson to leave.

"I don't think the secretary is really up to this job," said Rep. Ted Strickland (D-Ohio), a member of the House Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Added Rep. Bob Filner (D-Chula Vista), another panel member: "You say you take responsibility, but then you tell veterans to 'go call your creditors.' … The most dramatic thing to take responsibility is to resign."

The midlevel data analyst who took home the veterans' information — officials said he was trying to figure out how to reduce the file — has been placed on administrative leave pending an investigation.

Opfer said the employee told investigators that he had been taking data work to his suburban Maryland home regularly since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0029799

The theft involved 5 gigabytes of material, Nicholson said, adding that the employee could easily have accessed the information over a secure connection from his home computer.

He said he has ordered immediate training for all computer employees in security and privacy but suggested Congress might want to consider enacting laws making it unlawful to take records home.

At day's end, veterans were not reassured.

"I really don't know what to do. I've only got one bank and one credit union. I guess I'll kind of watch them," said Don Tetschlag, a 31-year Navy veteran now retired in San Diego.

Referring to the employee who took home the disk with such sensitive information, he added, "If I'd done that, I would be in jail."

Harkin, Kerry Call For Free Credit Watch For Vets After Data Theft (DMR)

By Jane Norman

Des Moines Register, May 25, 2006

Washington, D.C. - Two senators are pushing to give free credit monitoring to those affected by the loss of highly personal data on 26.5 million U.S. veterans that was stolen in a home burglary.

Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Ia., said today that he and Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., are sponsoring legislation that would provide one year of free credit monitoring as well as one free credit report annually for two years after the end of monitoring.

“We owe this to our veterans,” Harkin told reporters. “Doing right by our veterans is a continuing cost of our national defense.” He said the estimated cost of the credit protection is $1.25 billion though “we don’t think it will cost that much.” He said the bill could be approved by the Senate yet this week.

A Department of Veterans Affairs staff member took the data on a disk drive to his suburban Maryland home to work on a project, without authorization.

The data had identifying information such as names, Social Security numbers and dates of birth for veterans, although not financial information, VA officials say.

The disk drive was stolen on May 3, and VA Secretary Jim Nicholson, an Iowa native, told a congressional committee today he is “mad as hell” he was not informed until May 16. There is no indication that the data is being used yet for identity theft.

“There has to be some accountability,” said Harkin, though he said he was not ready to call for Nicholson’s resignation. “I don’t want to hang someone before the trial,” he said.

In Iowa, Patrick Palmersheim, executive director of the Iowa Department of Veterans Affairs, said about 75 veterans have called with questions about the theft. But he said that it’s difficult to know the extent of the problem among Iowa’s 276,000 veterans. “We as state directors can’t get all the answers,” he said.

John Derner, department adjutant for the American Legion of Iowa, said just three veterans have contacted his organization. “Actually, I am a little surprised we haven’t had many phone calls,” he said.

Veterans are being advised to keep a close eye on their credit card bills and bank accounts, he said.

The VA has set up a manned call center for veterans to obtain information at 1-800-333-4636, operating Mondays through Saturdays from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Central time.

Edwards: Investigate Records Theft (AP)

The Associated Press, May 25, 2006

DES MOINES, IA - Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said Thursday that a full congressional investigation into the theft of millions of veterans records is necessary and that Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson should be held responsible.

Nicholson's role in the lost records should be investigated because his future "depends on the degree of his involvement," Edwards said.

"Those (records) are more important now than they have ever been," Edwards told The Associated Press before a series of Democratic fundraising events in western Iowa. "They can be used to deny people health coverage, they can be used to deny people treatment."

DOJ_NMG_0029800

The issue surfaced when VA officials reported that a worker at the agency took home a laptop computer and disk containing the medical records of 26.5 million veterans. The computer and disk were stolen in a burglary.

Many lawmakers were angered to learn that it took more than two weeks for the VA to make the theft public.

Edwards said a full congressional investigation is needed because it's unclear what actually happened.

During the 2002 midterm election, Edwards spent considerable time raising money and donating computers to campaign organizers. That grassroots involvement paid off with a surprising second-place showing in the 2004 Iowa caucuses, and Edwards went on to become the running mate of Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry.

Edwards has not ruled out making another run for the Democratic nomination, and he is seeking to repeat the grassroots campaign of the last cycle with repeated visits to Iowa.

He was attending fundraisers for state Rep. Paul Shomshor, and for the Democratic Party in Woobdury County.

Edwards also met privately with people living in poverty. Since losing the last election, Edwards has established a center for studying poverty issues at the University of North Carolina, and he travels the country talking about the issue.

With War On, Americans Have Troops In Mind (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

Americans will still fire up their barbecues, watch parades, and go camping this weekend. But for the first time in a generation, Memorial Days are coming during prolonged armed conflict. That has strengthened ties between civilians and soldiers, bringing a marked change in the way people will observe the holiday this year.

Politicians of all persuasions are pushing for better veterans' services, including healthcare for the living and survivors' benefits for those who've lost loved ones. Many states are now providing free tuition at public colleges and universities for the children of those killed in war zones.

Since terrorists attacked the United States in 2001, communities around the country have begun to bring back traditional Memorial Day ceremonies - many of them featuring Iraq war vets.

It's part of growing public interest in military affairs, historians say. And this time, unlike in the Vietnam era, declining support for the war has not eroded backing for the troops, say many of those taking part in Memorial Day cer- emonies.

Gainesville, Ga., started having parades again in 2003. On Monday, about 700 veterans, police officers, firefighters, marching bands, baton twirlers, and Boy Scouts will march up Green Street, a shady lane bordered by antebellum homes. Charlie Company of the local National Guard unit, recently returned from Iraq, will serve as honorary grand marshal.

"We just decided that it was time to bring it back with the main thing being just to honor our veterans," says organizer Cheryl Vandiver, whose son is an Iraq war veteran.

In Chattanooga, Tenn., the Command Post Military Museum, which was started to commemorate World War II, now includes the current conflict in Iraq and Afghanistan. While "reenacters" will dress as soldiers from earlier wars this weekend, recently returned Iraq war GI's will bring real-life immediacy to the displays of uniform and military gear.

"What we try to impress upon students, especially with the current conflict going on, is that we're not here to glorify war," says museum curator and former middle-school history teacher Louis Varnell. "We don't want to lose sight of the fact that war itself is terrible."

Many of those involved with Memorial Day ceremonies see a marked difference with the last era of sustained US military combat abroad.

Despite mounting criticism of the war in Iraq, American support of troops serving there has not waned, says Jerry Rivers, director of veterans' services in Montgomery County, Tenn., which is near Fort Campbell, home to the US Army's 101st Airborne Division. "We wanted to make sure at least in our community that they weren't treated as poorly as those guys that served in Vietnam."

Part of this post-Vietnam urge to separate the warrior from the war has to do with the portrait of the typical soldier today. Unlike his or her father, who probably would have gone to Vietnam right out of school, today's GI is more likely to be older, to be married, and to have children. Especially among those in National Guard or Reserve units, he or she is likely to have strong work and community connections. Taking care of soldiers' families

DOJ_NMG_0029801

More family men and women in the war zone also means more dependents to care for in the wake of combat casualties. The 2,404 men and 55 women killed in Iraq have left an estimated 1,700 children without their parent.

In concluding his second presidential inaugural speech in 1865, Abraham Lincoln spoke of the need "to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan."

In that same spirit, Congress this year voted to increase the "death gratuity" for service member survivors from $12,000 to $100,000 and to increase group life insurance payments from $250,000 to $400,000.

Last week, members of Congress heard testimony on the estimated 200,000 homeless veterans. "In the battlefield of life, they are wounded, and we cannot leave them behind," said Rep. Bob Filner (D) of Calif., who convened the forum.

Like other programs in at least three dozen states, the University of Minnesota this fall will begin waiving tuition costs for children of war casualties. "It's our responsibility to watch over the families of those soldiers who have watched over us and paid the ultimate price," said state Rep. Lloyd Cybart (R), an Air Force veteran.

Communities and local businesses around the country are finding ways to bring a bit of home to service members halfway around the world. Earlier this month, Vermonters sent 825 gallons of maple syrup to Iraq, Kuwait, and Afghanistan.

"Memorial Day is about thanking those who are there and honoring those who didn't come back," says Rick Marsh, president of the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association. "So we're sending them a little bit of Vermont, a little thank-you." Soldiers' heartfelt letters

Meanwhile, some Memorial Day services this weekend will bring the war closer to home. At Shiloh National Cemetery in rural Tennessee, a children's choir will sing the National Anthem and military hymns. High school thespians will read last letters sent home by American soldiers.

Among these is one that Marine Cpl. Blake Mounce meant for his wife after his death. Killed last July when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb, he was buried on his 23rd birthday.

"To read that over and to know that he was aware of the danger that might possibly happen and wanted to send that last message to her, that's especially poignant," says Woody Harrell, superintendent of Shiloh National Military Park.

In addition to the parades and speeches, many Americans will observe the official National Moment of Remembrance (one minute at 3 p.m. local time).

Rita Payne, who runs Roman Catholic programs at Fort Campbell, sees a growing reverence for Memorial Day.

"There is a more deepening of faith, of spirituality and just prayerfulness," she says. "People take it upon themselves to do something positive, and prayer seems to be our greatest weapon right now."

1 War. 2 Deaths. 1 Year Later. (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Memorial Day 2005: America is at the park, in the water, around the grill. At a walleye fishing tournament in Dubuque, Iowa, a lawn mower race in Hillsborough, N.J., a techno-music festival in Detroit. Dania Jai-Alai near Miami offers free U.S. flag magnets, while supplies last.

There are countless sack races, eating contests and tugs of war, endless sales on everything from RVs to bikinis. All patriotic T-shirts are $5 at eight Sears stores in greater Phoenix, while supplies last.

This is how most of us spend Memorial Day, an occasion for remembrance that morphed, through years of peace, into beer, ball, boats and barbecue.

But three years of war have revived the holiday's original meaning. Today, for the families of two young Air Force officers, the gateway to summer will become a portal to grief.

In Iraq, Derek Argel and Jeremy Fresques — both Air Force Academy class of 2001, both commandos, both promoted this day to captain — prepare to fly off on a classified mission.

DOJ_NMG_0029802

In Fort Walton Beach, Fla., Capt. Argel's wife, Wendy, sits down at the computer as their 10-month-old son, Logan, plays on the floor. She wants Derek to have an e-mail from her when he gets back.

The television shows scenes of parades and cemetery services. In the e-mail's subject field, she types, “Memorial Day.”

In nearby Destin, Fla., Capt. Fresques' wife, Lindsey, also an Air Force captain, joins the annual “Gate to Gate” road race at Eglin Air Force Base. She and other runners drop carnations at the base Veterans Memorial as they jog past.

In Yuma, Ariz., Fresques' father, Nick, has gotten a call from his wife, Sherry, asking him to come home early from work. After all, it's Memorial Day. In Santa Barbara, Calif., Argel's mother, Debbie, enjoys a poolside martini in her father-in-law's backyard.

All are patriotic Americans who have relatives at war. Still, for them as for almost everyone else, Memorial Day is 90% recreation and 10% recollection. Before the day is over, that will change forever.

More than a dozen communities claim to be the birthplace of Memorial Day, including Waterloo, N.Y., (designated as such by Congress in 1966); Columbus, Miss. (recognized by the Library of Congress in 1958); and Boalsburg, Pa., where in 1864 three women started a tradition of decorating Civil War soldiers' graves with flowers.

On May 30, 1868, Union veterans first officially observed Decoration Day. Over the next century, a succession of wars swelled the importance of what became known as Memorial Day.

In 1971, Congress divorced Memorial Day from May 30, making it the last Monday in May. By 2000, the day's original meaning had become so subsumed in the festive three-day weekend that Congress passed the national Moment of Remembrance Act, asking for a moment of silence at 3 p.m.

Years of peace also took their toll. For many, Memorial Day was old men walking around in funny hats and outfits wearing obscure ribbons and medals — forgotten heroes of forgotten wars.

In Farmington, N.M., where Jeremy Fresques grew up, his mother mostly recalls the kids' baseball games and soccer tournaments. His father sums it up: “Memorial Day was a picnic.”

In Lompoc, Calif., where Derek Argel grew up near Vandenberg Air Force Base, Memorial Day was different. The main street was lined with flags. Hundreds of people gathered at the cemetery. A clergyman read the names of the war dead, Scouts placed a flag on every veteran's grave and a bugler played taps.

Derek's grandfather was a career Marine who fought in World War II.

In the sixth grade, Derek wrote that on Memorial Day, “We should put the flag out at our homes, and go to the service at the cemetery. On this day we show respect to the veterans who risked their lives or were killed protecting our freedom and flag. I am happy to see them put a little flag on my grandfather's grave.”

In Iraq on Memorial Day 2005, Fresques, 26, and Argel, 28, have made captain. However, there's no time for a promotion ceremony. Because they're on a mission, they're not even wearing their new silver bars. A promotion “would have been the last thing on their minds,” says Col. Kenneth Rodriquez, their group commander. “These guys were very mission-focused.”

Only a few cadets from each Air Force Academy class are selected to wear the red beret of the Air Force's Special Tactics unit. They're called combat controllers, a dry term for shock troops trained to land in hostile territory, set up and protect landing fields, and direct aircraft into them.

Argel: water polo star, 6-5, 210, 4% body fat. Wanted to go to the Air Force Academy so badly he attended two prep schools after high school to get in. On a whim, entered academy boxing tournament, having never boxed before, and made the finals, losing a split decision. Set so many records in commando training he had to lug a hunk of driftwood as handicap.

Fresques: hard worker, deep thinker. Considered military academies because he didn't want to get a loan to attend University of Arizona. Joked that he chose Colorado Springs over West Point because female cadets were better looking; said the Air Force treated officers better. Found Jesus in his senior year at the academy. Upon seeing copy of Maxim, the men's magazine, on the desk of a superior officer, he said, “Sir, you aren't going to read that, are you?” Disqualified by eyesight for flight school, he became a communications officer. Applied for elite special ops unit after deciding that he'd “go crazy sitting at a desk.”

Argel, a rising star in Special Tactics, has decided to make a career of it. Fresques plans to leave the Air Force in 2006 and possibly go into real estate. Both will finish their tour in a month and go home.

DOJ_NMG_0029803

"I'm definitely ready," Fresques e-mails his parents on May 26. Three days later he writes in his journal that he's not afraid of dying, only "the process of dying." He says his fondest desire is to be "raptured with Lindsey" into heaven to be with Jesus.

On Memorial Day, the two captains board the surveillance plane to scout potential emergency landing sites. Winds are calm, visibility unrestricted.

In the early afternoon, a holiday rooted in wars past is transformed by news from war today:

Four U.S. airmen and an Iraqi Air Force pilot were killed when their light plane crashed and exploded into flames 80 miles northeast of Baghdad. The plane went down about an hour after takeoff from Kirkuk. The cause of the crash was under investigation.

Wendy Argel is on an errand when she gets a call from her mother at home with little Logan. There are soldiers there to see her.

Wendy's father was an Air Force pilot. She knows what that means.

While she was writing that e-mail, her husband was dead.

A few miles away, Lindsey Fresques is bustling around her town house getting ready for a barbecue when there's a knock on the door. Four soldiers are standing there.

One is a major who attended her wedding, and the look on his face says this will be the worst day of her life. The carnation she'd dropped at the memorial had been for her own husband.

The young widows spread the sad news. Wendy reaches her mother-in-law in Santa Barbara. Debbie sinks to her knees. Her husband thinks she's having a stroke.

Lindsey calls Sherry Fresques, who again calls Nick at work. "Jeremy won't be coming back," she explains.

In Iraq, where an investigation will later rule out hostile fire and mechanical failure, only a few personal items are recovered from the wreckage. They include a silver cross Jeremy had bought in Jerusalem and wore around his neck, and Derek's gold wedding ring.

Some of the human remains are burned too badly for identification. Later, these intermingled ashes will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery. The pilot will become the first Iraqi interred there.

Four days after the crash, a ceremony is held in a hangar at Hurlburt Field in Florida, where the four airmen were based. Each is awarded the Bronze Star. Each soldier is represented by combat boots, a rifle, a helmet and, of course, a red beret.

This year, for the friends and relatives of Jeremy and Derek, Memorial Day will be no picnic.

Nick Fresques: "It always meant something to me, but it wasn't a real important day. I didn't know anyone real close that even served in a war. Now that my son … Now it's completely different. Until something like this happens, unfortunately, it's hard to realize the true meaning of Memorial Day."

Sherry Fresques: "It's a new experience for me, picking out what to put on your son's grave. I've selected two white roses, symbolizing purity, as well as a spray of red, white and blue stars that kind of reminds me of fireworks — Jeremy loved fireworks. And I'll probably put up this little flagpole. The flag's one of those sparkly ones."

Wendy Argel: "Memorial Day is a big deal down here, but I know in some other places it's not. But we're living in wartime. I hope people remember that. It's not just numbers. One of those numbers happens to be my husband."

Lindsey Fresques: "It reminds you that there really are people who make sacrifices. Jeremy and I used to think, 'You go in and do your time, and then you get out.' So what happened makes the meaning and honor of military service a lot more real."

Debbie Argel Bastian: "Memorial Day will always be difficult for me now, but it will also have so much more honor attached to it."

For tough guys, Derek and Jeremy were never very aggressive around women.

Wendy basically picked up Derek, making eyes at him in a bar on St. Patrick's Day. Lindsey and Jeremy met when she was his superior officer and instructor in air traffic training school. Taking a cue from Top Gun, she passed him a note inviting him to dinner.

Now there's an overwhelming sense of what might have been. Derek was away for about half of his two-year marriage. Jeremy was overseas on his only wedding anniversary. Wendy wears Derek's ring around her neck. Lindsey wears Jeremy's cross around hers.

DOJ_NMG_0029804

Last month, Wendy and Lindsey went sky diving, each for the first time, doing something their guys enjoyed doing.

On Memorial Day, they'll be at Walt Disney World, where Wendy's looking forward to the roller coasters. “It's the adrenaline,” she says. “You can't help but smile.”

Disney — “the happiest place on earth,” Lindsey says, reciting Walt's famous claim. But there's a touch of irony in her voice, suggesting that there are days when there are no happy places on earth, and that this Memorial Day could be one of them.

Remember The Guys In The Foxholes (USAT)

By Capt. James Key

USA Today, May 26, 2006

One evening, a casualty officer and I drove down the road on our way to inform a soldier's spouse that her husband had died in Iraq. As an Army chaplain, I thought about how difficult it would be for this young mother and how empty the two children's' lives would be without their dad.

On our way to the house, the casualty officer had assured me that he would be able to deliver the sad news. But when we got to our destination, his confidence disappeared. "Chaplain," he asked, "will you pray for me?" I placed my hand on his shoulder and began to pray. I asked God to give us the strength to perform our duty. I asked God to control our thoughts and actions and comfort the household we were about to enter. When I finished, we got out of the car and with great pain did the job that we were both called to do.

Memorial Day reminds us of the soldiers who gave their lives for our country. But often we forget to also honor the families they left behind.

Military chaplains guide soldiers and their families through the "Circle of Life" from births, baptisms, confirmations, marriage, illness to death. Our role is broader than a typical civilian minister's because we have to connect soldiers to God on a daily basis.

There was a time when I considered leaving the ministry. Then a friend asked me to join the military chaplaincy. It changed my life. The past year, I served as chaplain for a 600-soldier logistics battalion in Baghdad. Whoever said that "there are no atheists in the foxhole" was absolutely right. These soldiers had to deliver supplies along the most dangerous routes in Iraq. When bombs exploded, reality of war forced many to do some serious soul searching.

Countless soldiers came to talk to me about war, death and faith. They presented me with many perplexing theological questions: Is God on our side, and will he protect me from death? Will God forgive me if I kill an innocent person by mistake? Will God be angry with me for participating in this war? Exactly where do we really go when we die?

I am back home in the states now, a safe distance away from the death and war that challenge many servicemen and women in ways most people in our country will never fully understand.

This year, as we celebrate Memorial Day, we should pause as a nation from talk about high gas prices, what language our national anthem should be sung in and the latest celebrity gossip, and instead think about the men and women who continue to fight and die in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan. It is true: War is hell, freedom is expensive, death is painful and faith still matters — especially to those in the foxhole.

Capt. James Key is a chaplain in the U.S. Army at Fort Irwin, Calif.

Honoring Soldiers, Not Pitying Them (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Here's a Memorial Day quiz:

1. Who is Jessica Lynch?

Correct. She's the Army private captured, and later rescued, in the early days of the war.

2. Who is Leigh Ann Hester?

Come on. The Kentucky National Guard vehicle commander was awarded a Silver Star last year for fighting off an insurgent attack on a convoy in Iraq. The first woman to receive a Silver Star since World War II, and the first woman ever to receive one for close combat.

DOJ_NMG_0029805

If you don't recognize Sergeant Hester's name, that's not surprising. While Private Lynch's ordeal appears in some 12,992 newspaper and broadcast reports on the Factiva news service, Sergeant Hester and her decoration for extraordinary valor show up in only 162.

One difference: Sergeant Hester is a victor, while Private Lynch can be seen as a victim. And when it comes to media reports about the military these days, victimology is all the rage. For every story about someone who served out of conviction and resolutely went on with his civilian life, there are many more articles about a soldier's failure or a veteran's floundering.

It's a sign of some progress that the men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan are not spit upon and shunned as Vietnam vets were. Yet there may be something more pernicious about mouthing "Support Our Troops" while also asserting that many of them are poor, uneducated dupes who were cannon fodder overseas and have come home as basket cases, plagued by a range of mental, emotional and financial problems.

The vast majority of vets don't fit that description. Many, like one returned Army guardsman we talked to, chalk up this portrayal to the media's fascination with bad news in general. As for his combat in Iraq, both "going to war and coming home is very overwhelming," he says. "But you make choices in life . . . and through inner strength and support, I am making a choice that I want to be healthy."

In some cases, the depiction of military personnel as damaged goods serves the antiwar agenda. Yet retired Marine Lieutenant Colonel Tom Linn sees more basic impulses at work. "I honestly believe it is guilt" and even resentment, he says. The military type as misfit "is a stereotype that a lot of people from the Vietnam era have held on to." Then, as now, "they saw men and women who did more than they did . . . and they'd compensate by casting those folks in an inferior status."

This Memorial Day, most of us will remember the Americans who have served their country since the Revolutionary War not with pity but with admiration. For those who want to show their gratitude, Major John Morris has some recommendations. He's deputy chaplain for Minnesota's Army National Guard and a founder of a state program called Reintegration: Beyond Reunion. Its broad goal, he explains, is to help returning guardsmen and reservists frame their "experience, to draw from it everything that they can to grow into productive citizens."

How can we help? For one thing, he says, don't assume that all struggling vets are sick, since what looks like abnormal behavior may be culture shock. But do give vets and their families the tools to adjust. Major Morris explains: "Schools, look out for these military kids. Neighbors, cut their grass and shovel their snow, babysit and do chores around the house. Employers, make sure those jobs are still there." It's the least we can do, he says: "Since there are so few of us fighting the war, it's easy for the rest of us to try."

GAO Review Finds Flaws In Hiring By Federal Agencies (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

An investigation of hiring practices by federal agencies during the first four years of the Bush administration has turned up 18 cases where political appointees apparently schemed to obtain career jobs in the civil service and stay on the public payroll for the long haul.

The practice is popularly known as "burrowing in" and happens in almost every administration. A similar investigation during the Clinton administration found 17 cases where political appointees benefited from cronyism or were given an inside track for a career job.

In a government of about 2 million employees, the job finagling is rather small. Still, allegations of favoritism trumping expertise are being taken more seriously these days on Capitol Hill because of renewed attention to the government's ability to respond to terrorist threats and to natural disasters, such as Hurricane Katrina.

One case turned up by the investigation found that a Bush administration political appointee at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, working as a staff assistant, had been selected as a program specialist despite "limited qualifications and experience."

DOJ_NMG_0029806

There were 39 applicants for the job, including a career FEMA employee with more than 10 years of experience as an emergency management specialist. The experienced employee and the appointee were deemed the "best qualified," although investigators said "it is unclear" why they were given the same rating.

The appointee had worked four years in the private sector for a former FEMA director before coming to the government. The career job paid $71,357, slightly more than the staff assistant position, the investigators said.

In addition to political appointees landing jobs over more qualified applicants, investigators said some agencies created jobs for appointees and some agencies allowed appointees to jump ahead of military veterans by ignoring laws that give a hiring preference to veterans.

The investigation was conducted by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, between May 2001 and April 2005 at the request of two House Democrats, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Danny K. Davis (Ill.).

They released the GAO's report on the probe yesterday. The report, which covered 41 agencies, does not name the appointees or the bosses who made the conversions possible, and it does not show whether the converted employees remain on the federal payroll.

The GAO recommended that the Office of Personnel Management undertake an executive branch review, which the OPM has agreed to do.

The GAO review found that 23 agencies converted 144 individuals from non-career to career positions during the time period studied. They ranged in salary from about $31,000 to $146,000 annually. (In the similar review of the Clinton administration, which ran from October 1998 through April 2001, the GAO found 100 appointees who had been converted to career status.)

For the Bush administration years, the GAO examined 130 conversions at the General Schedule 12 or higher pay levels, finding that 37 did not follow normal hiring practices. The GAO determined that 18 were improper, and could not find enough information about the rest to render any judgment.

In a letter to the OPM calling for corrective action, Waxman and Davis said improper conversions "are a threat to the civil service both because they implant less qualified personnel into the government and because they tarnish the integrity of the federal merit-based hiring system."

Civil service law calls for fair and open competition for federal jobs, based on what an applicant knows, not who they know. But the GAO probe found instances where agencies did not adhere to the highest hiring standards.

The Justice Department, for example, converted an appointee with less than six months of immigration law experience into an immigration judge, raising questions of fairness, the GAO said.

In one case, Waxman and Davis said, a longtime aide to a former secretary of Health and Human Services was given a career job that had been created to match the appointee's work experience. The employee received about the same in salary after the conversion, $57,550 annually.Talk Shows

Craig W. Floyd , chairman and executive director of the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Richard L. Gregg , commissioner of the Financial Management Service at the Treasury Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Get the message?

Top Democrats crowded into the Sulgrave Club on Massachusetts Avenue on Wednesday evening to celebrate the first political tome of Ben Barnes, the powerhouse lobbyist and one-time Texas lieutenant governor who former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle once dubbed the "51st Democratic senator."

It was Mr. Barnes who came forward to say that in 1968 he pulled strings to get young George W. Bush into the National Guard and out of possible harm's way.

DOJ_NMG_0029807

Picking up personal copies of "Barn Burning Barn Building: Tales of a Political Life, From LBJ to George W. Bush and Beyond," were Mr. Daschle, former White House Chief of Staff Mac McLarty, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, former Democratic Party leader Terry McAuliffe, former Virginia Sen. Chuck Robb and one-time Democratic Party Chairman and Ambassador to the Soviet Union Robert S. Strauss, whose wife, Helen, died a few weeks ago.

"To have Bob Strauss there saying kind words about me made for a sentimental evening," Mr. Barnes told Inside the Beltway afterward. As for the future of the Democratic Party?

"I am optimistic ... if the party message is reasons to vote for Democrats as opposed to reasons to vote against Republicans," he told us. "If they come up with that message, then there is a good chance we can win back the House, and win Senate seats, and retake the White House."

Show me the money

Want a high-paying government job? Become an air traffic controller.

While the average union-backed controller compensation already totals $166,000 per year, Congress has until June 5 to decide whether salaries will rise to the $187,000 level the Federal Aviation Administration has offered to pay, or perhaps as much as the $200,000-plus the controllers have been demanding.

All of which has led to an impasse in negotiations that began eight months ago and shifted the matter to Congress to decide, as law requires.

"Taxpayers will save $600 million if Congress allows the FAA's contract to take effect," according to Heritage Foundation fellow Ronald D. Utt. "Incredibly, a bipartisan majority in the House ... is siding with the controllers in their effort to force the taxpayers to provide them with one of the most generous pay and benefit packages available to any group of American workers."

That effort is being led by Reps. Steven C. LaTourette, Ohio Republican, and Jerry F. Costello, Illinois Democrat.

The FAA, at the same time, points out that the base pay for the estimated 14,500 controllers already has soared 75 percent over seven years, rising from $64,877 in 1998 to $113,615 last year. But when benefits are included, total compensation averaged $166,000 last year, according to Mr. Utt.

In addition, about 1,300 senior-level controllers made more than $200,000 last year with overtime and other benefits included.

One source close to the negotiations tells Inside the Beltway the controllers "cannot reasonably expect to replicate the lavish deal they were given [in 1998] by the Clinton administration — these are very different times for the aviation industry and the federal budget."

"That 1998 contract has proven to cost the U.S. taxpayer billions of dollars more than the administration had estimated at that time. This new proposal will cost taxpayers a $2.6 billion in additional costs."

Almighty power

Democrats had better not mess with Pat Robertson. One kick in the you-know-where, and who knows how far they'd travel.

The Christian Broadcasting Network is touting the fact that through "rigorous" training, its founder, a former Republican presidential candidate, recently leg-pressed a whopping 2,000 pounds — an entire ton, ladies and gentlemen, or about the weight of a compact car.

"Pat Robertson worked out at the gym on an incline leg press machine with weights up to 570 pounds," according to the CBN Web site (www.cbn.com). "Working with his physician, who was an amazing strength trainer, he worked up to 800 pounds, then 1,000 pounds.

"Then one day he was able to leg press 1,500 pounds one time. Then over the succeeding months, he trained with multiple reps of 1,200 pounds, 1,300 pounds and 1,400 pounds. One Saturday morning, his physician said, 'I'll get you bragging rights. Let's go to 2,000 pounds.'

"When 2,000 pounds was put on the machine, two men got on either side and helped push the load up, and then let it down on Mr. Robertson, who pushed it up one rep and let it go back down again."

The TV preacher says one of his secrets is consuming a high-protein shake with energy-producing nutrients.

We'll be the first to report when Mr. Robertson walks on water.

DOJ_NMG_0029808

Smithsonian Hands Over TV Contract (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Smithsonian Institution is locked into its semi-exclusive television contract with Showtime Networks Inc. for 30 years, Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small told a House oversight committee yesterday.

Filmmakers, historians and members of Congress have criticized the contract, which has never been made public.

Small disclosed several other details about the deal:

· The Smithsonian is guaranteed $500,000 a year, and can earn additional money if Smithsonian on Demand, Showtime programming based on Smithsonian holdings, is popular with cable subscribers.

· Showtime invested "tens of millions of dollars upfront" to start Smithsonian on Demand.

· The Smithsonian can do six television programs a year with other filmmakers outside the Showtime contract.

Summoned by the House Administration Committee, chaired by Rep. Vernon J. Ehlers (R-Mich.), Smithsonian officials explained how the deal originated and what the new partnership means to scholars and historians seeking access to the Smithsonian's voluminous collections and its experts.

The committee was given a copy of the 170-page contract, Ehlers announced as he opened the hearing, but he said he would keep it confidential. He added that the first copy he had received was incomplete. "Large portions of the contract were redacted in the version that was submitted, making it difficult to gain a complete picture of its substance," he said. He thanked Small for providing a full text, but some committee members said they hadn't had time to read the entire document.

Some members of Congress have strenuously objected to the secrecy around the contract. They also complained that it wasn't shared with them before it was announced in March. As a sign of its displeasure the House Appropriations Committee reduced the proposed Smithsonian budget by $20 million.

Yesterday's hearing was the first time Small and Gary M. Beer, chief executive of Smithsonian Business Ventures, the brokers of the Showtime contract, have spoken publicly about the contract. Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) said the unusual aspects of the contract should have prompted the Smithsonian officials to consult Congress.

"We apologize for the hullabaloo this has caused for Congress," Small said.

With the deal, the Smithsonian said, researchers and scholars would continue to have access to the archives and other Smithsonian resources. But commercial filmmakers could make only "incidental" use of the materials unless they were working with Showtime or got special approval. Smithsonian officials have said only a very small number of filmmakers would be affected. Small said that of the 900 media contracts signed between 2000 and 2005, only 17 had more than an incidental use of Smithsonian resources.

The objections were loud and were repeated yesterday at the hearing.

"What we do know is that the resources of the Smithsonian should not be made exclusive to anyone," said Margaret Drain, vice president for national programming at Boston station WGBH, one of public television's leading producers.

Several committee members said they were deeply troubled over the length of the contract, especially if access continues to be an issue. "I'm worried about stifling people for 30 years, and Showtime doesn't want the competition," said Rep. Robert A. Brady (D-Pa.). Small said it took time to build a cable company, and establish a brand.

Small explained that the Showtime project was one way that Smithsonian was trying to bring in extra revenue. It receives 75 percent of its money from Congress. Its other funds come from a private account that includes an $800 million endowment. Small said yesterday the Smithsonian had raised $1 billion from private sources since 2000. But he also reminded the panel that the Smithsonian has a backlog of repairs that would cost billions of dollars.

The contract also gives the Smithsonian a 10 percent ownership in the Smithsonian on Demand venture. "Since the Smithsonian is not investing any money, the percentage is unusually good," Small said.

The Showtime agreement, Beer said, was reached after discussions with 10 other media companies. The conversations with Showtime started in March 2005 and were announced a year later.

Besides Drain, the committee heard from two other critics of the deal. Emily Sheketoff, executive director of the American Library Association's Washington office, suggested that the Showtime contract be annulled and that the terms of another deal with HarperCollins Publishers be disclosed. Carl Malamud, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a Washington think tank, said in a rapidly changing media age, a 30-year contract was impractical. "In this Internet era, even three-year distribution contracts can be considered long," Malamud said.

DOJ_NMG_0029809

Whatever the future of Smithsonian businesses, the panel emphasized that Congress needs to be keep informed.

"If we have even an idea we will come to you," Beer said.

OTHER NEWS:

GDP Growth Rate Revised Upward, But Housing Slowdown Looms (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

It is official: The U.S. was one of the world's fastest-growing advanced economies in the first quarter of 2006. Downbeat data on home sales, however, support economists' expectations that the distinction won't last.

The Commerce Department yesterday revised its estimate to an annualized rate of 5.3% of first-quarter growth in real gross domestic product -- a measure of the nation's output, adjusted for inflation -- from an initial estimate of 4.8%. The upward revision was smaller than expected, but still made the U.S. the second-fastest-growing economy among advanced members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development that have reported first-quarter data. Greece is in first place, with an annualized growth rate of 8.2%, according to the OECD.

Economists see the first-quarter number more as a one-time payback for an unusually slow fourth quarter -- which took the hit for Hurricane Katrina -- than an indication of how fast the economy will grow this year.

"It was a hot quarter, but it was a bit of a fluke and overstated the underlying strength of the U.S.," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consultancy Global Insight. Combined, the two quarters yielded average annualized growth of 3.5%, about the rate at which the economy has tended to expand in the long term.

The first-quarter spurt contributed to another strong quarter for business. After-tax corporate profits rose 8.8% in the first quarter to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.115 trillion. That was less than the 13.8% rise in the fourth quarter. But profits in the latest period were up 24.8% from a year earlier, the largest year-on-year increase since 2002. At 8.9%, after-tax corporate profits' share of the entire economy reached the highest level in at least 60 years.

New data on home sales, however, supported economists' predictions that the economy is likely cooling. The National Association of Realtors reported yesterday that sales of existing, or previously owned, homes fell 2% in April to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.76 million units.

Housing has been a major pillar of the economy in recent years as low mortgage rates fueled a home-buying boom that created lots of new jobs in everything from construction to mortgage finance. As home values rose, consumers were able to tap the equity in their homes to finance spending. A cooling housing market is expected to damp consumers' desire to spend.

Most home prices still are rising, but a growing backlog of unsold properties is putting more pressure on prices to fall. The median single-family home price in April was $222,700, up 4.3% from a year earlier, while the median price of condominiums and cooperatives was $222,000, down 0.2% from a year ago. At April's rate of sales, it would take six months to sell all the homes on the market, up from 5.6 months in March. The inventory of single-family homes, at 5.9 months, was up 40.5% from a year earlier -- the largest year-on-year rise since 1982, when the Realtors' association began collecting the data.

"What's interesting is the unbelievable speed with which people are dumping houses on the market," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at consultancy High Frequency Economics. "I don't think the market can absorb this much supply this quickly."

The factors that led to the bump up in GDP also point to slower growth ahead. A smaller-than-expected trade deficit reflected some strength in U.S. exports, but was driven mostly by a drop in oil imports that economists expect will reverse in coming months. Businesses produced more to rebuild inventories depleted by robust first-quarter sales, but that means they won't need to restock as much in the current quarter or later.

DOJ_NMG_0029810

"The upward revisions leave a little less growth on the table for the remainder of 2006," said Steve Wieting, senior economist at Citigroup in New York.

Separately, a report on jobless claims suggested companies might be slowing their hiring. The Labor Department reported that 329,000 people filed for unemployment benefits in the week ended May 20. The seasonally adjusted number was down 40,000 from the previous week, but higher than economists had expected.

5.3% Growth May Be 'last Hurrah' (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy expanded at a rapid clip in the first quarter of 2006, though more recent data — including April's existing home sales — suggest the pace of growth is slowing, according to reports Thursday.

The Commerce Department said gross domestic product, the broadest measure of goods and services produced in the country, expanded at a brisk 5.3% pace in the first three months of 2006, well above a previous 4.8% estimate.

The new numbers reflect stronger exports and inventory replenishing by U.S. firms. But economists said business activity is not likely to sustain that robust pace.

"The strong first-quarter data may well be the last hurrah of this phase of the current expansion," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight, who expects growth to slow to a 3% to 3.5% pace in the second quarter, and 3% in the second half of the year.

Behravesh says the report contained some cautionary signs for the Federal Reserve as it debates whether to continue raising its target for short-term interest rates, now at 5%. A measure of core inflation, a gauge of prices that excludes food and energy, rose at a 2% rate. That's at the top of the Fed's comfort level.

In other economic news:

•The National Association of Realtors said existing home sales, the bulk of the housing market, fell 2% in April from the previous month and were nearly 6% below year-ago levels. Home prices rose, but at a much more moderate pace than the frenzied increases of recent years. The national median home price was $223,000 in April, up 4.2% from a year ago.

"Higher interest rates are slowing home sales, but we see this as another sign of a soft landing in the housing sector," says David Lereah, chief economist for the National Association of Realtors.

•Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said the central bank needs to track stock and housing prices when setting interest-rate policy but emphasized that it is not the Fed's job to try to influence asset prices or pop bubbles.

"A central bank cannot ignore movements in stock prices, home values and other asset prices but should respond to them only to the extent that they have implications for future output and inflation," Bernanke said in a letter in response to questions from Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J.

•The American Trucking Association's index of trucking volume rose a seasonally adjusted 2% in April, the biggest increase since January 2005. The increase followed two months of declines and suggests a strengthening economy. Nearly three-quarters of the goods shipped around the country are transported on trucks, so the ATA's gauge can be considered a barometer for the overall economy.

"April was a good sign that truck volumes are improving from the challenging first quarter," says ATA chief economist Bob Costello.

Dow Industrials Climb 93.73 Points As Economic Data Come In Just Right (WSJ)

By Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Emboldened by just-right readings on the economy, investors gave the Dow Jones Industrial Average a two-day winning streak for its 110th birthday.

Jittery traders cheered a Commerce Department report showing ample economic growth in the first quarter, but not enough to stoke the inflation and interest-rate-increase fears that rattled the markets for two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0029811

The Dow industrials gained 93.73 points, or 0.84%, to 11211.05 amid a flurry of late-afternoon buying. It was the industrial average's biggest gain in almost three weeks. The Dow average, which made its debut on May 26, 1896, is up 4.6% on the year and is back within 4% of its all-time high of 11722.98 that it neared on May 10.

"After a difficult couple of weeks, stocks were oversold," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at money-management group T. Rowe Price. "The economic figures made people comfortable."

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 14.31, or 1.14%, to 1272.88, while the tech-laden Nasdaq Composite Index gained 29.07 or 1.34% to 2198.24. Small stocks posted the biggest gains with the Russell 2000 adding 14.31 points, or 2.01%, to 725.58.

Commodities recovered from declines posted Wednesday. Crude oil gained $1.46, or 2.09%, to $71.32 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold advanced $11.40, or 1.79%, to $648.40 a troy ounce on the Comex division of the Nymex. Crude and gold are up 17% and 25%, respectively, so far this year.

Bond prices and the dollar slipped.

Traders' spirits were buoyed before the market opened when the Commerce Department raised its estimate of the economy's first-quarter growth, but left inflation measures mostly unchanged. Investors also digested unsurprising tallies of jobless claims and existing-home sales.

A deal between two behemoths helped pushed technology shares higher. Online giants Yahoo and eBay unveiled a partnership to better compete with search-engine giant Google Inc. Shares of Yahoo and eBay rose 3.6% and 12%, respectively, on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Markets didn't seem to react when a federal jury in Houston found former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling guilty of conspiracy and fraud charges stemming from that company's 2001 collapse.

Still, yesterday's gains may be a brief respite, with investors scrutinizing each economic data point. "This is the fox-trot economy," says Jeffrey Saut, chief investment strategist at Raymond James. "One figure is fast and the next is slow."

Shares of General Electric, the only initial Dow component included in the current industrial average, rose 16 cents or 0.5%, to $34.42 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.58, or 0.75%, to 212.95.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the Big Board was 2.46 billion shares, as 2,541 issues rose and 745 fell.

Bonds fell2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 9/32, or $2.81 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.076%. The 30-year Treasury fell 1/2 to yield 5.173%.

The dollar fell3. Late in New York, the currency traded at 111.78 yen, down from 112.66 yen. The euro rose against the U.S. currency to $1.2795 from $1.2778.

Home Economics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The political left insists that the current economy, however strong, is leaving minorities behind, and that the gains of some have come at the expense of others. But a new study on homeownership by the National Association of Realtors suggests that the benefits of recent economic growth have been more widespread than critics want to admit.

We already knew that U.S. homeownership overall is at an all-time high of nearly 70%. The minority homeownership rate of 52% is also unprecedented. Now comes news that minorities are also increasing their share of second-home purchases. According to the Realtor report, minorities accounted "for 11% of vacation home purchases between 2003 and 2005 in contrast with 6% of purchases in 2002 or earlier. In the investment property segment, minorities accounted for 17% of transactions between 2003 and 2005 compared with 11 percent in 2002 or earlier."

DOJ_NMG_0029812

Among minorities, black and Latino gains were most impressive. In 2002, Latinos comprised 2% of vacation homeowners. That number jumped to 7% last year. The percentage of black investment property owners increased to 8% from 3% over the same period.

Homeownership, a traditional measure of economic well-being, does more than just help families build equity. The children of homeowners tend to perform better in school and have fewer behavioral problems. And home equity is a major source of collateral for people seeking bank loans to start new businesses.

The media prefer to focus on economic disparity rather than minority progress, especially when a Republican happens to be occupying the White House. But these homeownership figures indicate than an increasing number of racial and ethnic minorities are doing a whole lot better than just getting by. Many are thriving. More surely will.

Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Help Settle Abuse Claims (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Spokane, Wash., is selling its headquarters and other property valued at about $11 million as part of its effort to settle claims by victims of sexual abuse by members of the clergy.

The diocese is one of three in the country that have filed for bankruptcy; the others are those in Portland, Ore., and Tucson.

Although the Spokane diocese announced its intention to sell diocesan assets when it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2004, the fact that those assets are now going on the market underscores the financial strain many dioceses face as they address hundreds of millions of dollars in claims by victims of sexual abuse.

"I think it is symbolically significant," said the Rev. John J. Coughlin, a Franciscan priest and a law professor at the University of Notre Dame, specializing in civil and canon law. "The diocese doesn't need the physical building to exist. But the sale shows that the effects of the sex abuse crisis are serious, for this and other dioceses as well."

In a report issued in March, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said that in 2005, dioceses in the United States paid $399 million in settlements with victims of sexual abuse and $68 million in legal fees and support programs for victims, a sharp increase from the year before.

The church's total payments resulting from the sexual abuse scandal have surpassed $1 billion, and many dioceses have yet to reach settlements with victims.

The number of victims has exceeded 12,000. Nearly 5,000 priests have been implicated in abuse dating from as long ago as 1950. Most of the abuse occurred from the mid-1960's to the mid-1980's.

Each diocese has tried to find a way to address the many claims against it, including filing for bankruptcy. Barbara Dorris, victims' outreach director for a group called Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, said bankruptcy was a way to avoid answering charges in court that officials might have covered up sexual abuse by their clergy.

But the experience of the Spokane diocese exposes some of the perils of bankruptcy, Father Coughlin said. The diocese faces 185 claims totaling more than $200 million, said Shaun Cross, a lawyer for the diocese with the Paine Hamblin firm of Spokane.

Recently, a federal bankruptcy judge ruled that the parishes and schools in the diocese belonged to the bishop's office and could be sold to settle abuse claims, Mr. Cross said. The diocese, which argues that the bishop holds those properties in trust, is appealing the ruling to avoid selling the properties.

Those properties are valued at about $80 million, and the judge has yet to rule on seminaries, retreats and charities in the diocese.

The diocesan headquarters, called the chancery, has an asking price of $1.5 million, Mr. Cross said. Once it is sold, the diocesan staff could stay there until the end of 2007.

Spokane's bishop, William S. Skylstad, president of the bishops conference, himself faces an accusation of sexual abuse brought by a woman that dates to the early 1960's. Bishop Skylstad has denied wrongdoing.

By filing for bankruptcy, the Spokane diocese may have thought it would be limiting its financial liability, Father Coughlin said, though that has not been the case so far.

DOJ_NMG_0029813

"One of the things that a bishop has to consider is once a diocese files for bankruptcy protection and goes under receivership, then the federal bankruptcy judge has control of all the assets," Father Coughlin said. "Many bishops rightly are reluctant to hand that kind of authority to a federal judge."

Support Weak For Harris In Senate Poll (AP)

By Brendan Farrington

The Associated Press, May 25, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris had weak support in a poll released Thursday that includes the three little-known entries in the Republican U.S. Senate primary.

Only 37 percent of respondents said they favored Harris, compared to 13 percent for Will McBride, 4 percent for LeRoy Collins Jr. and 2 percent for Peter Monroe. Her three opponents all entered the race May 12, which was the last day to get on the Sept. 5 primary ballot.

More respondents - 43 percent - didn't choose a candidate. In a head-to-head with Democratic incumbent Bill Nelson, Harris trailed Nelson 58-25.

The poll was conducted by Quinnipiac University May 12-22. It surveyed 1,086 registered voters and had an overall margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The poll surveyed 424 Republican voters about the primary, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4.8 percentage points.

"Given how well known Congresswoman Harris is among Republicans and how well thought of she has been by them, it is somewhat surprising that she would only get 37 percent support," said Peter Brown, assistant director of the school's polling institute. "The fact that 63 percent of Republicans say they prefer either the other three or are undecided is remarkable."

Harris spokesman Chris Ingram said, "We don't comment on polls."

Harris's campaign has been troubled nearly from the start with poor fundraising, an effort by GOP leaders to find another candidate, a complete turnover in core campaign staff, her association with a corrupt defense contractor who gave her $32,000 in illegal campaign contributions and her decision to spend $10 million of her own money on the race.

Collins, who's father served as a Democratic governor from 1955 to 1961, is a businessman who retired from the U.S. Navy Reserve as a rear admiral. Monroe is a developer who has worked with the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development and helped manage the government's savings and loan bailout in the early 1990s. McBride is an Orlando lawyer.

Collins and Monroe said they expected the low numbers, considering that the survey was taken so soon after they got in the race.

"I've got to establish identity, I know that. No surprise, nothing disheartening," Monroe said. "That poll in a month will look very different."

Added Collins: "There's no reason for me to expect as much as I'm showing now, simply because I'm not that well known. Probably what's there is a little name recognition from my dad."

McBride's campaign didn't return phone calls and an e-mail seeking comment. McBride earlier this week said he would not discuss his candidacy until later this month.

Monroe, though, suggested that the 13 percent McBride received was probably boosted by voters recognizing the name from the governor's race four years ago, when Tampa lawyer Bill McBride won the Democratic nomination to challenge Gov. Jeb Bush. Bill and Will McBride aren't related.

"A lot of people are going to think 'McBride, Hmmm. I think I recognize that name,'" Monroe said.

Nelson increased his lead over Harris even though Harris ran a statewide television ad since an April 20 Quinnipiac poll, which had Nelson ahead 56-27.

Still, the Nelson campaign refused to gloat about the numbers.

"We're not paying attention to the polls," said Nelson campaign manager Chad Clanton. "We're expecting it's going to be a tough, competitive race in the end and we're doing everything we can every day to be prepared and we take nothing for granted."

A Test Of Our Character (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

DOJ_NMG_0029814

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

In his new movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," Al Gore suggests that there are three reasons it's hard to get action on global warming. The first is boiled-frog syndrome: because the effects of greenhouse gases build up gradually, at any given moment it's easier to do nothing. The second is the perception, nurtured by a careful disinformation campaign, that there's still a lot of uncertainty about whether man-made global warming is a serious problem. The third is the belief, again fostered by disinformation, that trying to curb global warming would have devastating economic effects.

I'd add a fourth reason, which I'll talk about in a minute. But first, let's notice that Mr. Gore couldn't have asked for a better illustration of disinformation campaigns than the reaction of energy-industry lobbyists and right-wing media organizations to his film.

The cover story in the current issue of National Review is titled "Scare of the Century." As evidence that global warming isn't really happening, it offers the fact that some Antarctic ice sheets are getting thicker — a point also emphasized in a TV ad by the Competitive Enterprise Institute, which is partly financed by large oil companies, whose interests it reliably represents.

Curt Davis, a scientist whose work is cited both by the institute and by National Review, has already protested. "These television ads," he declared in a press release, "are a deliberate effort to confuse and mislead the public about the global warming debate." He points out that an initial increase in the thickness of Antarctica's interior ice sheets is a predicted consequence of a warming planet, so that his results actually support global warming rather than refuting it.

Even as the usual suspects describe well-founded concerns about global warming as hysteria, they issue hysterical warnings about the economic consequences of environmentalism. "Al Gore's global warming movie: could it destroy the economy?" Fox News asked.

Well, no, it couldn't. There's some dispute among economists over how forcefully we should act to curb greenhouse gases, but there's broad consensus that even a very strong program to reduce emissions would have only modest effects on economic growth. At worst, G.D.P. growth might be, say, one-tenth or two-tenths of a percentage point lower over the next 20 years. And while some industries would lose jobs, others would gain.

Actually, the right's panicky response to Mr. Gore's film is probably a good thing, because it reveals for all to see the dishonesty and fear-mongering on which the opposition to doing something about climate change rests.

But "An Inconvenient Truth" isn't just about global warming, of course. It's also about Mr. Gore. And it is, implicitly, a cautionary tale about what's been wrong with our politics.

Why, after all, was Mr. Gore's popular-vote margin in the 2000 election narrow enough that he could be denied the White House? Any account that neglects the determination of some journalists to make him a figure of ridicule misses a key part of the story. Why were those journalists so determined to jeer Mr. Gore? Because of the very qualities that allowed him to realize the importance of global warming, many years before any other major political figure: his earnestness, and his genuine interest in facts, numbers and serious analysis.

And so the 2000 campaign ended up being about the candidates' clothing, their mannerisms, anything but the issues, on which Mr. Gore had a clear advantage (and about which his opponent was clearly both ill informed and dishonest).

I won't join the sudden surge of speculation about whether "An Inconvenient Truth" will make Mr. Gore a presidential contender. But the film does make a powerful case that Mr. Gore is the sort of person who ought to be running the country.

Since 2000, we've seen what happens when people who aren't interested in the facts, who believe what they want to believe, sit in the White House. Osama bin Laden is still at large, Iraq is a mess, New Orleans is a wreck. And, of course, we've done nothing about global warming.

But can the sort of person who would act on global warming get elected? Are we — by which I mean both the public and the press — ready for political leaders who don't pander, who are willing to talk about complicated issues and call for responsible policies? That's a test of national character. I wonder whether we'll pass.

U.S. Aide Doubts Tehran Will Bend (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029815

The top American diplomat at the U.N. nuclear watchdog held out little hope yesterday that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will give up programs that could lead to the development of a nuclear weapon.

"We shouldn't fool ourselves. The president of Iran is not someone who is swayed by normal diplomatic demarches," said Ambassador Greg Schulte, U.S. representative to the Vienna, Austria-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

But Mr. Schulte, speaking to reporters and analysts during a Washington visit, said that there also were divisions within Iran's ruling Islamic regime over Tehran's nuclear confrontation, and that the United States and its allies must give Iran a clear path to back down.

Although the hard-line Iranian president "wants a crisis," the U.S. government and its negotiating partners "have to make clear to him and to the leadership that there is a better path to take," Mr. Schulte said.

Diplomats from Germany and the five U.N. Security Council permanent powers -- the United States, France, Britain, Russia and China -- are expected to gather again next week in Europe to try to agree on a package of carrots and sticks designed to induce Iran to give up its nuclear ambitions, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said yesterday.

Envoys from Canada, Italy and Japan are expected to join the negotiations.

U.S. officials said that a meeting Wednesday in London produced progress on the outlines of an offer to Tehran, but that more talks were needed. The package of incentives and sanctions is designed to get Tehran to halt uranium enrichment, which can lead to the production of either electrical power or a nuclear bomb.

Last night, President Bush said he would consider providing incentives to Iran if it agreed to resume a suspension on nuclear-enrichment activities that the United States thinks is aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

Mr. Bush, at a White House press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, said the two leaders spent a lot of time discussing strategy on how to resolve the Iranian nuclear crisis.

Iran insists its programs are solely for peaceful civilian energy needs, but the IAEA's 35-nation board has found that Tehran has refused to cooperate on inspection and verification programs needed to validate those claims.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei, who briefed top Bush administration officials this week, will update IAEA board members at a June 12 meeting in Vienna on Iran's cooperation, Mr. Schulte said.

"At this point, I don't think [Mr. ElBaradei] will have much to report," he said.

On other issues, Mr. Schulte:

• Denied that a proposed U.S. civilian nuclear deal with India -- which never signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty -- had undermined Washington's campaign against Iran. "I hear that argument a lot more in Washington than I do in Vienna," he said.

He said members of the 30-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group, which must approve parts of the special deal for India, expressed growing support for the deal in their most recent meeting.

•Said the United States and its allies hope to present a plan at the June IAEA board meeting that would guarantee nuclear fuel supplies for countries that agree not to enrich uranium on their own soil, with a final deal possible by the end of the year.

•Said IAEA inspectors have found Iran's nuclear scientists to be "technically competent" and "motivated," but he added that there was no hard and fast estimate on when Iran might be able to produce a nuclear weapon.

"Anybody who gives an exact time frame on that probably doesn't know what he is talking about," he said.

US Debates Carrots, Sticks For Iran's Nuclear Program (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY - Amid a din of uncompromising rhetoric from and about Iran, the UN's permanent five powers and Germany this week worked to hammer out a package of incentives and threats they hope will ensure the Islamic Republic's nuclear program is limited to peaceful purposes.

On the table: giving Iran nuclear reactors and providing fuel for energy production, as well as economic and security incentives. In exchange, Iran would have to give up uranium enrichment - a step that can lead to weapons production - or face UN sanctions or even an arms embargo.

DOJ_NMG_0029816

Cutting through layers of mistrust to determine any US role - as well as Iran's ultimate goals - will not be easy, given a relationship calcified by more than 25 years of hostile rhetoric and official silence. But increasingly, analysts say that any deal ultimately depends on direct talks between the US and Iran - and possibly a US "security guarantee" that it will not attack Iran.

"If you are going to solve the problem permanently, US participation is a must," says Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University who was recently at Columbia University in New York. "It's like the ... elephant in the room. Everybody knows [the US] is there, but not talking about it is not going to solve the problem."

Britain, France, and Germany are spearheading the diplomatic effort on the UN Security Council. But Russia and China are loath to back sanctions that they believe could lead to an arms embargo or military action. Senior diplomats from those nations and the US reported "progress" during talks in London on Wednesday, but no agreement.

Foreign ministers of all six countries are expected to meet shortly, and Russia's National Security Council chief Igor Ivanov has been invited to meet with Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani in coming days in Tehran.

Analysts say that "red lines" on both sides have been shifting, but that no deal is likely to stand unless the US and Iran engage in direct talks. An American "security guarantee" for Iran may be required, experts say, but so far US officials dismiss any deal that would ensure the survival of Iran's current government.

"When the US avoids giving a security guarantee [to Iran], it means they surely want to collapse and destroy the regime," says Saeed Laylaz, a political and security analyst in Tehran. "It is very good for the hard-liners in Iran. They like a critical situation in which they can say to the people: 'The United States of America is why we have trouble in the world.'"

Mr. Laylaz says that Iran would be willing to "stop" uranium enrichment completely with the right deal: a security guarantee, then getting the US directly involved in nuclear negotiations. US sanctions should be removed, he adds, and Iran integrated more fully into the global economy.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow did not rule out the possibility of talks on Wednesday, but said that Iran would have to halt enrichment first. "When that happens, all right, then there may be some opportunities," said Mr. Snow.

The result is a dilemma for Iran. "If you know the US wants to destroy you, and the four borders of your country are occupied by the US military, you know that you should accelerate your uranium enrichment, not suspend it," says Laylaz. "But at the same time, [Iranian officials] are asking the US: 'Please come to the table and start negotiating.' Because they realize there is no country in the world ... that can stop the US if it wants to militarily attack Iran."

Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the UN's International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), indicated during talks on Wednesday with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Iran might delay enrichment plans for five or six years and accept the intrusive inspections of the "additional protocol" of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

"The default position in Iranian foreign policy is hard-line, and you have to work hard to bring it the other way," says Shahram Chubin, director of studies at the Geneva Centre for Security Policy.

"The hard-line conservatives in Iran believe that dealing with the Americans and the West is a contaminating thing, that you are going to give up all your values, and end up being ... a nothing," says Mr. Chubin. "And the whole essence of the revolution is as an example, a model in the Islamic world. They have a vanguard reputation, and they're not going to give it up - there is a lot there."

Still, Iran has been signaling that it wants to talk. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a letter to Mr. Bush on May 8, the first such high-level public contact since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution. Though it was full of tough and critical talk, experts suggest that a Bush response - ruled out for now - could be first steps toward dialogue.

One day later, another letter from Iran's former top nuclear negotiator, Hassan Rohani, who remains the influential representative of Iran's top religious leader on the Supreme National Security Council, was published in Time magazine, taking a "good cop" tone to Mr. Ahmadinejad's "bad cop."

"Iran is intent on producing nuclear fuel domestically for reasons both historic and long-term economic," he wrote, laying out an eight-point plan for a negotiated solution.

Past failures to declare aspects of nuclear programs "are not uncommon among NPT members," and "an Iranian secret weapon program is only hype," Mr. Rohani wrote. "A solution imposed on Iran by the Security Council is unlikely to provide assurances the US seeks about the Iranian nuclear program."

DOJ_NMG_0029817

Iran has enriched small quantities of uranium to levels needed for nuclear fuel in recent weeks, using a cascade of 164 centrifuges. Iran wants to start two more such pilot projects in coming months - before beginning production with tens of thousands of centrifuges to fuel a Russian-made reactor at Bushehr. That reactor should be completed later this year. .

Ahmadinejad on Wednesday claimed that Iran had mastered "the entire nuclear fuel cycle from start to finish," and that it would never give it up.

"The minimum [acceptable to Iran] would be at least to have this 164-centrifuge cascade running - this is a red line," says Mr. Hadian-Jazy. The US holds that all enrichment must stop; some Europeans and IAEA diplomats say that is unrealistic.

"Is it worth - and I'm talking about both parties--to go to war for one cascade?" asks Hadian-Jazy. "[Iran] is ready to give a more intrusive inspection regime, real-time monitoring, ratifying the Additional Protocol, accepting some transparency measures..."

The picture in Iran is further clouded by local politics. "When you ask, 'What do the Iranians want?' the answer is: 'Which Iranians?' " says Chubin at the Geneva Centre. "It's certainly true that Rohani and [former president and head of the powerful Expediency Council Ali Akbar] Rafsanjani believe Iran should use the leverage of their ... program to cut an overall deal with the West.

"The other view, of Ahmadinejad and Larijani, is that: 'We've got the power; we don't need anyone's help with our own security,' " says Chubin. "They want nuclear weapons to be the leading power in the region, in order to be in opposition to the West, and they have no interest in a global grand bargain."

And there is another player, whose vote in Iran counts above all others: Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. "They don't want a military attack," says analyst Laylaz. "It's not the hard-liners' [red line], but the Leader's red line."

"I'm not sure about US policy toward Iran," adds Leylaz. "If they test a potential negotiated way, and ask strongly to suspend any uranium enrichment, we can avoid a catastrophe. Otherwise, I'm not sure about the future."

Hizbullah Factor In Iran Fray (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

SHEIKH ABBAD HILL, LEBANON - In the spring sunshine, the 70-mile Lebanon-Israel frontier of olive groves and fields of bright green tobacco appears a picture of rural calm. But the looming confrontation between the West and Tehran ensures that tensions linger here, with Iran-backed Hizbullah fortifying its frontline observation posts and Israel recently increasing its aerial reconnaissance patrols over Lebanon.

One alarming scenario gaining attention is if Iran's nuclear facilities come under attack by the US or Israel, it could inadvertently trigger a violent confrontation between Lebanon's Hizbullah and the Israeli military.

Hizbullah this week aired fresh warnings on the extent of its massive rocket arsenal, reinforcing concerns in Israel that it will be targeted as part of Tehran's retaliation to a strike against its nuclear sites.

"We have the power to destroy important and sensitive targets in northern occupied Palestine," Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbullah's secretary-general said in a speech marking the sixth anniversary this week of Israel's troop withdrawal from south Lebanon.

"The resistance now has over 13,000 rockets. All of north occupied Palestine is within our firing range. This is the minimum range. As for the range beyond the north ... it is best to be silent," he added, hinting at the existence of long-range rockets in Hizbullah's armory.

Earlier this month, Major General Amos Gilad, a senior Israeli defense ministry official, said that while Iran's main strategic arm was its long-range Shihab-3 missiles, "their second arm is Hizbullah, which has 13,000 to 14,000 rockets that threaten Israel."

Still, there are compelling reasons why Hizbullah would refrain from military action, analysts say.

Although Hizbullah looks to Iran for guidance and much of its logistical and financial support, the Shiite organization has spent the past decade and a half shedding its image as a tool of Iranian foreign policy. The party has the overwhelming support of Lebanon's Shiite community, the largest sect within the country, and it is represented by 14 politicians in Lebanon's parliament and entered the government for the first time last summer.

DOJ_NMG_0029818

That assimilation into mainstream politics has helped bolster the party at a time when it faces intense pressure to disband its military wing. Last week, the UN Security Council adopted a French-proposed resolution that in part repeated a call for Hizbullah's disarmament. Hizbullah refuses to disarm, saying it is a vital component of Lebanon's defense strategy and that yielding its weapons would only benefit Israel, an argument that resonates with most Lebanese Shiites, if not other Lebanese.

"The irony is that without a US/French campaign against Hizbullah's arms, the party would have been in a much more difficult position to defend the rationale of continuing resistance," says Reinoud Leenders, assistant professor of politics at the University of Amsterdam and former Beirut-based analyst with the International Crisis Group.

Many non-Shiite Lebanese are uncomfortable with a political party possessing weapons, saying it risks Lebanon becoming embroiled in external conflicts.

Hizbullah officials, however, say that its weapons are for the defense of Lebanon, not Iran. "Iran is capable of launching its own retaliation," says Ahmad Malli, a member of Hizbullah's political council. "It's not logical for Iran as a regional power to ask a small organization to attack Israel."

The domestic constraints on Hizbullah convince many analysts, including some critics, that the party is unlikely to attack Israel in a knee-jerk reaction to a military strike against its Iranian backer.

"Any act that is perceived internationally and domestically as serving Iran would call Hizbullah's Lebanese credentials into serious doubt and confirm the widely circulated hypothesis that Hizbullah is Iran's proxy in Lebanon," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, assistant professor of politics at the Lebanese-American University and author of "Hizbullah: Politics and Religion."

However, Mr. Malli offered another scenario in which Israel launches a preemptive strike against Hizbullah to degrade Tehran's retaliatory options in the event of an attack.

"If Israel attacks Iran, it may well attack other targets at the same time, including Hizbullah in Lebanon," he says. "In that case, Hizbullah has the right to defend itself and Lebanon with all possible means."

Far from a theoretical concept, Malli's scenario is one that is under serious consideration by Israel, says Gerald Steinberg, professor of politics at Israel's Bar Ilan University.

"Hizbullah is seen as the main force of the Iranian response, and IDF [Israel Defense Force] planners could be expected to be prepared for such a strike [against Hizbullah] in the context of a military move against Iran," he says. "Some Israelis would argue that since a Hizbullah response in the event of an attack on Iran is inevitable, not striking against Hizbullah would be irrational."

The uncomfortable proximity in which these bitter foes find themselves is best illustrated on this wind-swept hilltop 2,400 feet above northern Galilee.

Nestled against the Israeli side of the fence is a massive structure bristling with antennae, cameras, and rotating radar dishes. Yards away on the Lebanese side is Hizbullah's bunker of bulldozed earth ramparts surmounted by two metal turrets that Hizbullah has had fitted with bulletproof glass windows. Closer to the fence, Hizbullah has erected surveillance cameras pointing at the Israeli position.

UN officials believe Hizbullah's construction work is probably defensive in nature, to improve the monitoring of Israeli troop movements, rather than preparations for an attack. But in this volatile corner of the Middle East, misreading the intentions of the enemy can have dangerous consequences.

"Hizbullah ultimately benefits from the West's inflated assessment of its capabilities and intentions," says Mr. Leenders, the Dutch academic. "It effectively presents them as a source of deterrence without them having to lift a finger."

Say No To Tehran's Gambit (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029819

All of a sudden, revolutionary Iran has offered direct talks with the United States. All of a sudden, the usual suspects -- European commentators, American liberals, dissident CIA analysts, Madeleine Albright -- are urging the administration to take the bait.

It is not rare to see a regime such as Iran's -- despotic, internally weak, feeling the world closing in -- attempt so transparent a ploy to relieve pressure on itself. What is rare is to see the craven alacrity with which such a ploy is taken up by others.

Mark my words. The momentum for U.S.-Iran negotiations has only begun. The focus of the entire Iranian crisis will begin to shift from the question of whether Tehran will stop its nuclear program to whether Washington will sit down alone at the table with Tehran.

To this cynical bait-and-switch, there can be no American response other than No. Absolutely not.

Just yesterday the world was excoriating the Bush administration for its unilateralism -- on Kyoto, the ABM Treaty and, most especially, Iraq -- and demanding that Washington act in concert with the "international community." Just yesterday the Democratic nominee for president attacked President Bush's foreign policy precisely for refusing to consult with, listen to and work with "the allies."

Another day, another principle. Bush is now being pressured to abandon multilateralism and go it alone with Iran. Remember: In September 2003, after Iran was discovered cheating on its nuclear program, the United States wanted immediate U.N. action. The allies argued for a softer approach. Britain, France and Germany wanted to negotiate with Tehran and offer diplomatic and economic carrots in return for Iran's giving up its nuclear weapons program. The United States acquiesced.

After 2 1/2 years of utter futility, the E.U. Three had to admit failure and acknowledge the obvious: Iran had no intention of giving up its nuclear ambitions. Iran made the point irrefutable when it broke International Atomic Energy Agency seals and brazenly resumed uranium enrichment.

The full understanding we had with our allies was that if the E.U. Three process failed, we would go to the Security Council together and get sanctions imposed on Iran. Yes, Russia and China might still stand in the way. But even so, concerted sanctions by America, Europe and other economic powers could have devastating effects on Iran and its shaky clerical dictatorship.

Which is why the mullahs launched this recent initiative. They know, and fear, that if the West persists on its present and agreed course, they face sanctions so serious that their rule, already unpopular, might be in jeopardy. The very fact that Iran is desperately trying to change the subject, change the venue and shift the burden onto the United States shows how close the mullahs believe we are to achieving major international pressure on them.

Pushing Washington to abandon the multilateral process and enter negotiations alone is more than rank hypocrisy. It is a pernicious folly. It would short-circuit the process that, after years of dithering, is about to yield its first fruits: sanctions that Tehran fears. It would undo the allied consensus, produce endless new delays and give Iran more time to reach the point of no return, after which its nuclear status would be a fait accompli .

Entering negotiations carries with it the responsibility to do something if they fail. The E.U. Three understood that when they took on the mullahs a couple of years ago. Bilateral U.S.-Iran talks are the perfect way to get Europe off the hook. They would preempt all the current discussions about sanctions, place all responsibility for success on the negotiations and set America up to take the blame for their inevitable failure.

It is an obvious trap. We should resolutely say no.

Except on one condition. If the allies, rather than shift responsibility for this entire process back to Washington, will reassert their responsibility by pledging support for U.S. and/or coalition military action against Iran in the event that the bilateral talks fail, then we might achieve something.

You want us to talk? Fine. We will go there, but only if you arm us with the largest stick of all: your public support for military action if the talks fail. The mullahs already fear economic sanctions; they will fear European-backed U.S. military action infinitely more. Such negotiations might actually accomplish something.

That's our condition. Otherwise, the entire suggestion of bilateral talks is a ploy that should be rejected with the same contempt with which it was proposed.

It's Time To Engage With Iran (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0029820

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

"Only connect." That was the trademark line of E.M. Forster's great novel "Howards End." And it's a useful injunction in thinking about U.S. strategy toward Iran and the wider conflicts between the West and the Muslim world.

We are in the early stages of what the Centcom commander, Gen. John Abizaid, calls "the first war of globalization, between openness and closed societies." One key to winning that war, Abizaid told a small group of reporters at the Pentagon yesterday, is to expand openness and connection. He called al-Qaeda "the military arm of the closed order." The same could be said of the extremist mullahs in Tehran who are pushing for nuclear weapons.

America's best strategy is to play to its strengths -- which are the open exchange of ideas, backed up by unmatched military power. The need for connection is especially clear in the case of Iran, which in isolation has remained frozen in revolutionary zealotry like an exotic fruit in aspic. Yet some in the Bush administration cling to the idea that isolation is a good thing and that connectivity will somehow weaken the West's position. That ignores the obvious lesson of the past 40 years, which is that isolation has usually failed (as in the cases of Cuba and North Korea), while connectivity has usually succeeded (as in the cases of the Soviet Union and China).

A telling example was the decision to engage the Soviet Union in 1973 through the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe. At the time, some conservatives argued that it was a dangerous concession that the Soviets might interpret as a symbol of weakness. But the CSCE provided a crucial forum for dissidents in Russia and Eastern Europe, and with astonishing speed the mighty edifice of Soviet power began to crumble. Similar warnings about showing weakness in the face of an aggressive adversary were voiced when President Richard Nixon went to China in February 1972.

I cite this Cold War history because the moment has come for America to attempt to engage revolutionary Iran. The invitation for such a dialogue came this month in a letter to President Bush from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad -- a man whose rabble-rousing, Israel-baiting career gave him the credentials, if that's the right word, to break a 27-year Iranian taboo on contacts with the Great Satan.

Ahmadinejad's letter clearly had the backing of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. In the American context, that's like having the support of Vice President Cheney for a peace feeler. My own Iranian sources say there is broad consensus in Tehran that it is time for talks with the United States. "Iran wants to start discussions the same way the Chinese wanted discussions" with Nixon, an Iranian businessman named Ali Ettefagh told me in an e-mail this week. "Great Satan doesn't sell anymore. More than half the population was not born 27 years ago, and the broken record does not play well." The Iranian offer of dialogue, he says, "ought to be taken as an opportunity, if only to air out grievances and amplify differences."

I suspect Iran wants dialogue now partly because it perceives America's position in Iraq as weak and its own as strong. That may be true, but so what? Washington should still take yes for an answer. The United States and its European allies this week are crafting a package that, one hopes, will include everything the Iranian people could want -- except nuclear weapons. The bundle of goodies should stress connectivity -- more air travel to Iran, more scholarships for students, more exchanges, Iranian membership in the World Trade Organization. The mullahs may well reject these incentives as threatening, but that's the point. Their retrograde theocracy can't last long in an open world. This very week, about 40 police officers were injured in a clash with demonstrators at two Tehran universities. One of the hand-lettered protest signs captured in an Iranian photo said: "This is not a seminary, it is a university."

Karim Sadjadpour, an Iranian analyst with the International Crisis Group, noted in Senate testimony last week that opinion polls show 75 percent of Iranians favor relations with the United States. "Embarking on a comprehensive dialogue with Iran would provide the U.S. with the opportunity to match its rhetorical commitment to Iranian democracy and human rights with action," Sadjadpour said. He's right.

There's no guarantee that a policy of engagement will work. The Iranian regime's desire to acquire nuclear weapons may be so unyielding that Tehran and Washington will remain on a collision course. But America and its allies will be in a stronger position for responding to Iranian calls for dialogue. Openness isn't a concession by America, it's a strategic weapon.

Abbas Threatens Hamas With Measure Implicitly Recognizing Israel (KRT)

DOJ_NMG_0029821

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank - Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas issued a surprise ultimatum to his Hamas rivals on Thursday: Break the political stalemate imperiling the Palestinian government within 10 days or he'll ask voters to approve a measure that would implicitly recognize Israel.

Hamas officials appeared caught off-guard by Abbas' threat to hold a referendum in July. Some leaders voiced optimism that they would be able to work out their differences, while others criticized Abbas for trying to bully them.

A referendum accepting the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel would put the issue directly before Palestinian voters for the first time - and the outcome would be uncertain. While polls have shown broad support among Palestinians for a two-state solution, voters also dumped Abbas' long-dominant Fatah party in favor of the Muslim fundamentalist Hamas in part because of frustration over compromises that Fatah had made in peace talks with Israel.

Speaking at the start of a unity conference, Abbas put Hamas leaders on notice that he's running out of patience with a power struggle that in recent weeks has broken out into confrontations between rival gunmen in Gaza streets.

"Our cause is at stake," Abbas said, in demanding a quick response from Hamas. "We cannot afford the luxury of time."

"There is no need for such threats from the president," said Hamas lawmaker Abdel Jaber Fuqaha. "Let the dialogue take its normal course."

The Palestinian Authority has faced a number of challenges ever since January, when voters catapulted Hamas, a movement formally committed to Israel's destruction, into power over Fatah, which accepts Israel's right to exist.

The United States and Europe have cut off aid, and Israel has been withholding tax receipts it collects on the Palestinians' behalf, creating a financial crisis.

In recent weeks, the factional feud has erupted into near-daily clashes in the Gaza Strip between Hamas militants and Abbas loyalists that have left at least 10 people dead. The latest battle, which left one Palestinian security officer dead, broke out shortly after the unity conference began.

This week's conference was partly a response to a joint political statement issued earlier this month by a group of Palestinian leaders in an Israeli prison. Top Hamas and Fatah members signed the letter, along with leaders of smaller political factions.

The 18-point document calls for the creation of a Palestinian state, with East Jerusalem as its capital, on all the land captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War. It also suggests that Palestinians stop attacking targets in Israel and restrict their actions to targets in the West Bank.

But Hamas' embrace of the document might not go very far toward easing the international pressure on the Palestinian Authority.

The proposal falls short of meeting two critical demands: Explicitly recognizing Israel's right to exist and abandoning violence as a political weapon. And Israel has made it clear that it intends to hold onto major Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

But formal acceptance by Hamas of a Palestinian state in the West Bank could put more pressure on Israel to seek a negotiated settlement instead of pressing ahead with a new plan to ignore the Palestinian leadership and dictate its own borders.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's unilateral proposal got a boost this week during his first official visit to Washington when President Bush praised the idea as a "bold" concept that could lead to peace.

But Bush encouraged Olmert not to move forward with the idea until he tries to reach an agreement with Abbas. But the Israeli prime minister is dubious of working out any deal with Abbas when the government is dominated by Hamas leaders.

Before Abbas issued his vow to put the issue before voters, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh urged the conference to work together to end the internal violence.

"The space of consensus between us is much closer than we imagine," said Haniyeh, who spoke via video link from a simultaneous gathering held in Gaza City for Hamas members who, like the prime minister, are barred by Israel from traveling to the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0029822

Abbas Urges Hamas To Back 2-State Plan (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, May 25 -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas called on Hamas on Thursday to endorse the creation of a Palestinian state on territory occupied by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war. If the radical Islamic movement refuses, he said, he will put the proposal to a referendum within two months.

Abbas gave leaders of Hamas, the principal political rival of his Fatah movement, 10 days to accept a two-state solution to the conflict with Israel, something the group has rejected since its founding nearly two decades ago. Hamas envisions the creation of a Palestinian state across territory that now includes Israel.

If Hamas does not change its position, Abbas said, he will measure public support for a two-state solution within 40 days through a popular referendum. Although it would not be binding, the result would help clarify for recalcitrant Hamas leaders, the Israeli government and the world what course Palestinians favor to resolve the conflict with Israel.

"We must stop with the slogans and start dealing with reality," said Abbas, Fatah's leader. "We must stop dreaming and accept what we can take now. Let us not speak of dreams. Let us take the Palestinian state on the '67 borders. There is a national consensus for this."

Abbas delivered his ultimatum during a meeting of Fatah and Hamas leaders in the West Bank city of Ramallah that was intended to reduce mounting tensions. His comments reflect frustration over Hamas's refusal to soften its views at a time of deepening economic hardship in the Palestinian territories and sporadic armed conflict between the two movements.

Hamas and Fatah gunmen exchanged fire Thursday in Gaza City following the funeral of a senior Fatah security official killed this week in a car bombing. The gunfire killed a member of the Fatah-dominated Palestinian security services and wounded several others.

When Abbas asked Hamas to form the Palestinian cabinet after its January election victory, he urged its leaders to accept agreements backed by Fatah that call for the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem. Israel has occupied those territories since the 1967 war, although it evacuated Jewish settlements in Gaza last year.

Since Hamas took control of the Palestinian government ministries, international donors have frozen foreign aid to the Palestinian Authority, and Israel has suspended the transfer of tax revenue it collects on the government's behalf. The Palestinian Authority has not paid its more than 150,000 employees for nearly three months.

Advisers and allies of Abbas said his comments Thursday were calculated to force Hamas to moderate its position, which international donors have demanded in return for a renewal of aid, or else face a vote that he expects will endorse the two-state solution. The referendum would be based on an 18-point document drafted this month by Fatah and Hamas leaders in Israeli prisons. The Hamas prison leadership is an important element of the movement's decision-making body, along with Hamas members in exile and those in the territories.

"We're escalating the tension a little bit to try to corner them and show them as rejectionists," said a political adviser to Abbas who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly. "The idea is to bring Hamas back inside the national dialogue or to go to the people for a reminder of what the national consensus is."

As president, Abbas has the authority to fire Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a member of Hamas, and disband the cabinet. He has chosen instead to give Hamas an opportunity to govern the poor and often lawless occupied territories, betting that his rivals will suffer politically in the attempt.

But the economic sanctions imposed on the Palestinian Authority have given Hamas something to blame for any perceived political shortcomings. Israel's top general warned this week that the economic squeeze would not topple the Hamas government, citing opinion polls that show its support has not declined.

"We do not fear conducting a referendum, as we know that the Palestinian people support us and support our program," said Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator from Gaza.

The prisoners' plan, as the document has come to be known, endorses a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem. Among other items, it also calls for the release of all Palestinian political prisoners in Israeli jails, the right of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to return to Israel and reforms of the Palestinian security services and political institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0029823

The more radical Hamas leaders in exile immediately rejected the document when it was made public this month. But Haniyeh and other party figures in the territories -- including Masri, who called the document "positive" -- said it could serve as a starting point for further discussion. Polls conducted since show that roughly 80 percent of Palestinians support it.

"If Hamas says democracy, democracy, democracy -- okay. The president is going back to the people," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah member of parliament and the chief Palestinian negotiator with Israel. "He could not continue to have the government defy the guidelines he gave it, and he didn't want to sack it."

Abbas's gambit could also strengthen his hand with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who told President Bush in Washington this week that he would explore the possibility of reviving peace talks before taking any unilateral steps to define the Jewish state's final borders.

Abbas, who as head of the Palestine Liberation Organization manages peace policy, has asked Olmert to restart negotiations under the U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map." Formal negotiations between the two sides have been moribund since January 2001.

Olmert told a joint meeting of Congress, "If there is to be a just, fair and lasting peace, we need a partner who rejects violence and who values life more than death." Some Israeli politicians said Thursday that a Palestinian vote in favor of a two-state solution along the 1967 border would increase pressure on Olmert to pursue a peace process with Abbas.

Abbas Stuns Hamas With Talk Of Referendum (AP-Y2)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP2, May 25, 2006

In a bold initiative, the Palestinian president gave Hamas 10 days to accept the idea of a Palestinian state alongside Israel, saying Thursday he'll submit the plan to a referendum by mid-July if the Islamic militants refuse.

Mahmoud Abbas' surprise announcement is a political gamble that could either help resolve the Palestinians' internal deadlock or lead the Hamas-led government and Fatah into a deeper crisis.

Abbas asked Hamas to endorse a document drawn up by senior Palestinian militants imprisoned in Israel. It accepts statehood in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem — territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Middle East War.

Approving the document would imply recognition of Israel — one of the three conditions imposed by Israel and the West for doing business with the Hamas-led government. The document falls short of meeting the other two conditions — renouncing violence and accepting past peace accords — so it was unclear if the international boycott would be called off even if Hamas acquiesced.

However, a referendum, which Palestinian pollsters expect to pass, could provide cover for the militants to become more moderate without appearing to succumb to Western pressure. Such a vote could also renew pressure on Israel to return to the negotiating table rather than impose borders on the Palestinians.

As Abbas outline his proposal, violence again erupted in Gaza.

A group of policemen on their way back from the funeral of a top security commander in Gaza City clashed with a newly formed Hamas militia, and one of the officers was wounded, security officials said.

At nightfall, three officers in the presidential guard were shot and wounded on patrol in Gaza City, officials said. They said the gunfire came from the direction of a Hamas militia unit. In the past week, 10 people have been killed in clashes between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah Party.

Fatah and Hamas leaders held talks in Ramallah and Gaza to defuse the crisis, and Abbas used the opportunity to challenge Hamas to adopt a program that implies recognition of Israel or to let the people decide.

Hamas, which is facing a crippling international boycott because of its refusal to moderate its position, appeared to be divided over the idea. The Islamic militants won parliamentary elections in January, and took over the Palestinian Authority on Feb. 18. Abbas was elected separately a year earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0029824

The plan was conceived in a wing for 120 Palestinian security prisoners at Hadarim prison, with many sessions taking place in the prison yard, said Khader Shkirat, a lawyer for a key signer, Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti. An inmate from Hamas also signed the document.

Hamas ideology does not accept a Jewish state in the Middle East, and Hamas does not accept interim peace accords with a state it does not recognize. Hamas suicide bombers have killed hundreds of Israelis over the past decade.

Abbas has been seeking to counter Hamas' power, removing authority over security forces from the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry and asserting he has the authority to conduct peace negotiations with Israel.

Hamas fielded a 3,000-strong militia in Gaza in defiance of Abbas' ban, setting off clashes with Fatah-dominated security forces.

Abbas brought things to a head Thursday, giving Hamas 10 days to achieve a political accord with him or face a referendum within 40 days.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas was noncommittal, saying: "We will study how the call for a referendum is compatible with the law, the constitution and politics."

Other Hamas figures were divided over the idea.

Parliament Speaker Abdel Aziz Duaik of Hamas said the prisoners' document was a good basis for dialogue, adding: "Returning to the people is one of the most important principles in democracy."

But Hamas legislator Mushir al-Masri called the proposal a "coup against the democratic choice" of the Palestinians.

The Islamic Jihad group, which also rejects the existence of Israel, opposed the plan.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev called the issue an "internal Palestinian matter," and reiterated that Israel insists on fulfillment of all three international conditions.

Israeli Cabinet minister Haim Ramon, who is close to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the referendum was "worthy of examination." But another Israeli minister, Ronnie Bar-On, said that as long as Hamas does not accept international conditions, Abbas' idea "is like playing checkers with himself."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said: "The only way you can test the proposition is for the Palestinians to go through that process, whether it's a referendum or whether it's through national dialogue or through some other peaceful means, to talk about what the future of the Palestinian people will be."

Olmert returned Thursday from talks in Washington with President Bush, where he explained his plan to draw Israel's borders unilaterally if efforts to resume peace talks fail. Israel refuses to negotiate with Hamas, which it considers a terror group, and is hesitant to talk peace with Abbas because Hamas controls the government.

However, if Palestinians approve a plan that accepts Israel, Israel might be forced back to the negotiating table.

The Palestinians reject Olmert's unilateral plan, and Abbas' announcement Thursday appeared part of a hurried effort to show the world there is a willing Palestinian partner for negotiations with Israel.

Israeli analyst Yossi Alpher said if a referendum is held and the program is approved, Israel would have to consider it.

"The burden of proof will still be on Abbas to prove that he is a viable negotiating partner," Alpher said.

Abbas Challenges Hamas To Endorse Document On A Palestinian State (USAT/AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh, The Associated Press

USA Today, May 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — In a surprise initiative, the Palestinian president gave Hamas 10 days to accept the idea of a Palestinian state alongside Israel, saying Thursday he'll submit the plan to a referendum by mid-July if the Islamic militants refuse.

Mahmoud Abbas' announcement is a political gamble that could either help resolve the Palestinians' internal deadlock or lead the Hamas-led government and Fatah into a deeper crisis.

Abbas asked Hamas to endorse a document drawn up by senior Palestinian militants imprisoned in Israel. It accepts statehood in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem — territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war.

DOJ_NMG_0029825

Approving the document would imply recognition of Israel — one of the three conditions imposed by Israel and the West for doing business with the Hamas-led government. The document falls short of meeting the other two conditions — renouncing violence and accepting past peace accords.

Hamas ideology does not accept a Jewish state in the Middle East. Hamas suicide bombers have killed hundreds of Israelis over the past decade.

Hamas is facing a crippling international boycott because of its refusal to moderate its position. The Islamic militants won parliamentary elections in January, and took over the Palestinian Authority on Feb. 18. Abbas was elected separately a year earlier.

It was unclear whether the international boycott would be called off even if Hamas acquiesced to Abbas' proposal. A referendum could provide cover for the militants to become more moderate without appearing to succumb to Western pressure. Such a vote could renew pressure on Israel to return to the negotiating table rather than impose borders on the Palestinians.

As Abbas outlined his proposal, violence again erupted in Gaza. In the past week, 10 people have been killed in clashes between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah Party. Fatah and Hamas leaders held talks in Ramallah and Gaza to defuse the crisis, and Abbas used the opportunity to challenge Hamas to adopt a program that implies recognition of Israel or to let the people decide.

The plan was conceived in a wing for 120 Palestinian prisoners at Hadarim prison, with many sessions taking place in the prison yard, said Khader Shkirat, a lawyer for a key signer, Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti. An inmate from Hamas also signed the document.

Abbas has tried to counter Hamas' power, removing authority over security forces from the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry and asserting he has the authority to conduct peace negotiations with Israel. Hamas fielded a 3,000-person militia in Gaza in defiance of Abbas' ban, setting off clashes with Fatah-dominated security.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said, “We will study how the call for a referendum is compatible with the law, the constitution and politics.”

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev called the issue an “internal Palestinian matter,” and reiterated that Israel insists on fulfillment of all three international conditions.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert returned Thursday from talks in Washington with President Bush, where he explained his plan to draw Israel's borders unilaterally if efforts to resume peace talks fail. Israel refuses to negotiate with Hamas, which it considers a terror group, and is hesitant to talk peace with Abbas because Hamas controls the government.

The Palestinians reject Olmert's unilateral plan, and Abbas' announcement Thursday appeared part of a hurried effort to show the world there is a willing Palestinian partner for negotiations with Israel.

Abbas Says He'd Put Peace Plan To A Vote (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, May 25 — The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, said Thursday that he would call a referendum on a proposal for a Palestinian state that would recognize Israel, if the governing Hamas party failed to accept the plan within 10 days.

In laying down his challenge, Mr. Abbas seems to be gambling that he can force his Fatah party, Hamas and some smaller factions to agree on a broad framework for dealing with Israel, which Hamas now refuses to recognize. But he runs the risk of provoking a political showdown at a moment when the Palestinians are already plagued by infighting and a worsening financial crisis.

"We differ, it is true," Mr. Abbas said in Ramallah at a conference intended to put an end to internal Palestinian quarreling. "We see things differently, but we need to find middle-of-the-road solutions."

Several Hamas figures said Thursday that they did not object to a referendum, at least in principle.

"We are not afraid of a referendum," said a Hamas legislator, Salah Bardawil. "The election was a referendum, and the majority of the people chose us." He was referring to the vote in January in which Fatah, which previously dominated Palestinian politics, lost its parliamentary majority and Hamas, a radical Islamic group, came to power.

DOJ_NMG_0029826

Like the Palestinians, Israel appeared caught off guard by Mr. Abbas's announcement and had little to say about it. Mark Regev, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry, described it as an internal Palestinian matter.

In the past Israel has strongly rejected two of the plan's provisions: returning to pre-1967 borders and giving Palestinian refugees the right to return to lands they left in 1948.

The proposal, based on a plan drafted earlier this month by prominent Palestinian prisoners from Hamas and Fatah, calls for a Palestinian state and a negotiated peace settlement with Israel, if it withdraws to the borders that existed before the Arab-Israeli war of 1967. The Palestinian state would include all of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, with its capital in East Jerusalem.

Marwan Barghouti, a leading Fatah figure serving five life terms in Israel's Hadarim Prison, is credited as the driving force behind the prisoners' document, though imprisoned members of Hamas also endorsed it.

"We must rise to the level of responsibility," said Mr. Abbas, whose Fatah movement has supported plans along those lines for years. "If within 10 days you don't reach results through dialogue, I will take the prisoners' document to a popular referendum" within 40 days.

The referendum can be authorized either by a decree from Mr. Abbas or by Parliament, Amar Dwik, the head of the Palestinian election commission, told The Associated Press.

In recent years Palestinian polls have generally shown strong public support for a Palestinian state with the 1967 borders. But Hamas has refused to moderate its hard-line policies despite a cutoff in Western assistance that has left the Palestinian government financially crippled.

The Palestinian conference was held simultaneously in Ramallah and Gaza City and connected by video because Israel does not permit Hamas members to travel between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Until Mr. Abbas spoke, the talks were expected to focus on the almost daily clashes in Gaza between Hamas and Fatah.

"Our meeting today aims to cement our national unity," said Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian prime minister and a Hamas leader, who spoke in Gaza City before Mr. Abbas's remarks in Ramallah. "Our difference is with the Israeli occupation."

....

Abbas Delivers Talks Ultimatum To Hamas (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas issued an ultimatum to Hamas yesterday, calling on it to accept the principle of a state alongside Israel in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or submit to a national referendum on the issue.

Speaking in the West Bank city of Ramallah at a public forum aimed at reducing tensions between his Fatah party and Hamas, Mr. Abbas challenged the Islamic militants to reach an understanding within 10 days on negotiations with Israel or face a plebiscite within 40 days.

"Are slogans enough to feed the hungry? You need to stop with these slogans and deal with reality," Mr. Abbas said in an uncharacteristically lively speech delivered off the cuff. "You need to stop with dreaming and get what is possible to get now. Let's not talk about dreams. Let's get a Palestinian state within the '67 borders."

The surprise declaration, in which the embattled Palestinian leader gambled his little remaining political capital, comes amid escalating violence between the rival political parties that has stoked worries of a civil war.

Clashes between Fatah and Hamas gunmen have killed about 10 people in the last few weeks.

Hamas politicians went on the defensive after Mr. Abbas' challenge. Some predicted a Fatah-Hamas agreement that would make a referendum unnecessary; others said the Islamic militants don't oppose the idea of a national referendum as long as the two sides reach agreement on the ground rules.

"It needs some procedures," said Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas spokesman. "It needs to be inside and outside of Palestine," meaning that the several million Palestinian refugees abroad should be permitted to vote.

Palestinian refugees in countries like Jordan and Lebanon are generally more radical than those living in the West Bank and Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0029827

Mr. Abbas wants the vote specifically to approve or disapprove a joint declaration signed recently by Hamas and Fatah prisoners in Israeli jails that backs a two-state solution.

The Palestinian president was weakened when a surprise electoral landslide put Hamas in control of the Palestinian parliament and government. Since the militants took power, Mr. Abbas has been embroiled in an escalating battle of words and bullets with Hamas.

At the same time, he has struggled to earn the respect of Israeli leaders, who called him "irrelevant" and "helpless" after the Palestinian Authority elections.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert gave Mr. Abbas a boost this week by inviting him to hold talks. And Israel's Channel 2 television reported yesterday that Mr. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz had agreed to supply Mr. Abbas' presidential guard with badly needed weapons.

Aides to Mr. Abbas said the Palestinian president is fully aware of the risks of setting a referendum in motion. The vote could become a referendum on Mr. Abbas, who has a reputation as a wooden and aloof politician.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat warned that the Palestinian Authority is following two different policies even though it is supposed to function as one group. He hinted that the Palestinian president might even resign if he doesn't win the vote.

"We know the risks, we know the difficulties," said Mr. Erekat. "He knows the consequences of losing. If we lose, we go home."

Mr. Erekat insisted that the Palestinian president had the authority to call a referendum, and said talks were planned with the Central Election Commission today.

The proposal of a national vote could make the Palestinians the first in the Middle East to hold a referendum.

An Israeli commentator said the Israeli government's contention that "there is no one to talk to" on the Palestinian side came crashing down yesterday.

"Abbas proved that he is the address and there are no excuses," said Ali Vaked, a columnist for the Israeli Web site ynet.co.il. "Abbas said to Olmert that he is the address and there are no excuses."

Israel's 'Realignment' (WP)

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

THOUGH THEY paid lip service to continued Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, President Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in effect inaugurated an entirely different process at their White House meeting Tuesday -- one in which Israel will parley with the United States about the new borders it intends to draw for itself. Despite his promise to pursue talks with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Mr. Olmert has made clear that he doesn't believe Israel will be able to work with the Palestinian Authority anytime soon. Even if a credible partner appeared, Mr. Olmert might prove reluctant. Like his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, he opposes some of the compromises Israel would have to make to achieve a peace settlement.

Mr. Olmert has now won Mr. Bush's de facto consent to pursue a unilateral "realignment," in which Israel would draw a border of its own choosing in the West Bank, dismantle some of the settlements that lie beyond it and thereby "guarantee Israel's security as a Jewish state with the borders it desires," as the prime minister put it. Mr. Bush called these ideas "bold," adding that they "could lead to a two-state solution." But as Mr. Olmert acknowledged, there is one crucial condition: Israel cannot successfully impose its plan on the Palestinians unless it has "the comprehensive support of the United States and the international community."

That means that in the remainder of his term, Mr. Bush will have the opportunity to encourage an Israeli redeployment that would open the way toward the Palestinian state he called for four years ago. But he could also cripple the prospects for that settlement if he provides a U.S. imprimatur for a realignment that disregards essential Palestinian interests. Left to his own calculations, Mr. Olmert probably would settle on such a strategy. According to reports in the Israeli press, he is thinking of dismantling only a small fraction of the West Bank settlements that lie beyond the boundary fence Israel is constructing, which means that settlers and the army would remain in the Palestinian territory indefinitely. He also intends to annex all of Jerusalem's Old City and most of its Arab neighborhoods, even though a previous Israeli government recognized that a peace settlement will require divided sovereignty in the city.

DOJ_NMG_0029828

Mr. Bush has already accepted the idea that large settlement blocks near the present border will be incorporated into Israel. But U.S. officials in the past have expressed skepticism about parts of the emerging Israeli plan, including the extent of West Bank territory to be taken. Those points should be pressed: The closer Mr. Olmert comes to adopting the territorial map that was negotiated by Israelis and Palestinians after the Camp David talks of 2000, the better will be the chances that the realignment will lead to a real peace. Mr. Bush said Tuesday that an Israeli-Palestinian peace "will only be achieved on the basis of mutually agreed changes, and no party should prejudice the outcome of negotiations." As his administration plunges into what will probably be months of detailed discussions with Israel about the realignment plan, it will be imperative to defend those principles.

Harper To Meet Bush July 6, Canadian Ambassador Wilson Says (BLOOM)

By Theophilos Argitis

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper will meet with U.S. President George W. Bush on July 6 in a bid to cement improving relations between the two countries, said Michael Wilson, Canada's ambassador to the U.S.

``The two of them will be getting together in another meeting in early July, July 6, where they will build on their first meeting in Cancun," Wilson told a hearing of the House International Relations Subcommittee on the Western Hemisphere, broadcast today on CBC television.

Harper has sought to repair relations with the U.S., soured under the previous Liberal Party government over a dispute on softwood lumber tariffs and the country's decision not to participate in the U.S. missile-defense system. Harper and Bush negotiated an agreement on softwood duties in April.

This would be Harper's first meeting with Bush since March, when he met with the U.S. president and Mexican President Vicente Fox at a trilateral meeting in Cancun.

Canada's Leader Won't Talk To National Media (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

TORONTO — Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper has declared he won't talk to the national media because they are biased against him, his latest move in a spat with the Parliament's press corps.

After reporters walked out of a news conference this week when he refused to answer any questions, Harper said no Liberal prime minister had faced such effrontery, and he had decided to deal only with more friendly local press.

"Unfortunately, the press gallery has taken the view they are going to be the opposition to the government," the recently elected Conservative leader told a Canadian television network Wednesday.

"We'll just take the message out on the road. There's lots of media who do want to ask questions and hear what the government is doing for Canadians, or to Canadians. So we'll get our message out however we can," Harper said.

Since Harper's minority government took office after the Jan. 23 elections, his relations with the national media have become more and more strained. Determined to impose order on the traditionally chaotic press scrum in which reporters shout out questions, Harper said he would choose questioners from a pre-screened list.

The parliamentary media corps, which includes broadcast and print reporters from all over the country, worried that the new protocol would freeze out journalists perceived to be tough on the prime minister. After journalists refused to sign on to the list, Harper refused to take any questions.

On Tuesday, when Harper's press secretary announced there would be no questions after his announcement of aid to the Darfur region of Sudan, nearly two dozen reporters walked out, leaving the prime minister to make his statement in front of a single camera in a nearly empty room.

"We are responsible for asking questions, and he is responsible for answering them," said Yves Malo, the president of the Parliament's press gallery.

Malo acknowledged that the media culture in Ottawa was less decorous than other places, such as the White House, where reporters stand up when the president enters the room and don't interrupt while he is speaking.

DOJ_NMG_0029829

He said that the once-unruly press corps had tried to compromise by forming a line behind a microphone, but even then Harper refused to recognize some questioners.

"Since the election, certain reporters have never gotten a question. No one is well served. We are not, the public is not, and the government is not," Malo said.

Harper, the first Conservative prime minister after 12 years of Liberal Party rule, has moved toward dismantling many of his predecessors' policies, including gun control, support for medical marijuana and backing of the Kyoto Protocol on global warming. He thinks that the press corps simply doesn't like his politics.

"I have trouble believing that, frankly, a Liberal prime minister would have this problem," he said. "The press gallery at the leadership level has taken an anti-Conservative view."

But across the country, his popularity is growing. Recent polls have placed the party's approval ratings above 40%, which could help it win a majority in Parliament if a new election was held.

Putin Objects To Cheney's Remarks (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Associoated Press, May 25, 2006

President Vladimir Putin said Thursday that Russia wants good relations with the United States but he objected vigorously to Vice President Dick Cheney's recent criticism of democratic backtracking by the Kremlin.

"We see how the United States defends its interests, we see what methods and means they use for this," Putin said at a news conference following a summit meeting of Russia and the European Union in his most direct criticism of Cheney's remarks.

In a speech earlier this month in Lithuania, Cheney accused the Kremlin of rolling back democracy and strong-arming its ex-Soviet neighbors.

"When we fight for our interests, we also look for the most acceptable methods to accomplish our national tasks, and I find it strange that this seems inexplicable to someone," Putin said, replying to a reporter's request for his reaction to the vice president's remarks.

Even before Cheney's speech, Russian-U.S. relations had been on a steady downward slide. Last month, Putin claimed the United States had put up artificial obstacles to slow Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, and the Pentagon accused Moscow of giving intelligence on U.S. troop movements in Iraq to Saddam Hussein in 2003.

The crisis around Iran's nuclear program has seen the two countries, which proclaimed themselves "strategic partners" just a few years ago, firmly in opposing camps.

Putin said that despite the friction, the United States remains "one of our major partners."

But he suggested no nation had the right to interfere in Russia's relations with third countries.

"As far as the view of our relations with other countries, we will discuss our relations with them directly," Putin said icily.

The growing rift with Washington threatens to mar the summit of the Group of Eight leading industrialized nations in St. Petersburg in July.

Speaking of U.S. criticism of a hard-fought Russian-Ukrainian gas deal, which many Ukrainian politicians and the U.S. government have objected to as putting the two sides on unequal terms, Putin asked: "How can leaders of other states say it is bad for the Ukrainians?"

"I don't understand if this criticism is addressed to us or the Ukrainian leadership. But you should ask those who make these comments."

Putin and European Union leaders agreed their countries had common interests in easing their dispute over energy supplies and markets, but acknowledged differences.

"We are aware of our common interests," European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said at the final press conference. "What we want is a relationship based on ... the principle of interdependence."

DOJ_NMG_0029830

The energy disputes have hung over the relationship since January, when a brief disruption in Russian gas supplies to Western Europe amid a price dispute with Ukraine tarnished Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier and encouraged the EU to intensify a search for alternative supply routes.

"We are as interested as Russia to avoid further misunderstandings," said Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, whose country currently holds the EU presidency.

But Barroso said there were still "sensitivities" that needed to be addressed.

"This is not at all, I want to underline this on our side, a problem of lack of trust in Russia as a credible supplier, as Russia has always been," he said. "But there are some sensitivities, it is true."

He said the sensitivities included the way public opinion in the EU reacted to the problems between Russia and Ukraine earlier this year.

Putin tried to assure his EU partners that China was no substitute for Europe as a market for Russia's oil and gas although Russia was developing markets for its energy resources.

"China is not an alternative to Europe for energy supplies," Putin told a news conference following the Russia-EU summit.

The New Year's shutdown, which was followed by gas shortages amid a harsh winter, came as Russia declared energy security to be a top priority of its leadership this year of the G-8.

European fears of excessive energy reliance on Russia, which supplies a quarter of Europe's gas and is its second-biggest supplier of oil, increased further amid talk that Russia's state-controlled natural gas giant, Gazprom, was considering acquiring Britain's largest gas distributor and negotiating similar deals in other EU nations.

EU leaders on Thursday spared Russia from any criticism similar to Cheney's, but they emphasized the need for Moscow to adhere to democratic values.

"Russia has now very important chairmanships, it's not only the chairman of the G-8, it's also chairman now of the Council of Europe, and therefore we do think that Russia has a special responsibility also to take forward questions like human rights, rule of law, good governance — all these basic values we in the European Union hold up," EU External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner told reporters.

Putin Group Races Past Soviet Party (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- Just four years after its founding, President Vladimir Putin's United Russia party is growing twice as quickly as the Communist Party under the Bolsheviks. And like the Communist Party of the past century, it has become the surest path to success in Russian society.

The party formed by the Kremlin to support Mr. Putin registered its 1 millionth member earlier this year, reaching a milestone that took the Bolsheviks eight years after the Russian Revolution.

More than two-thirds of the country's federal and regional parliamentarians, and 70 of 89 regional governors are members of United Russia. Thousands of civil servants, celebrities and leading business people have joined in recent years as the party has grown into a dominant force in national and local politics.

Party officials have begun an ambitious program to sign up another million members in time for the 2007 parliamentary elections and 2008 presidential vote, when a successor to Mr. Putin will be chosen.

Supporters say United Russia's success is proof of democracy in action in Russia.

"United Russia is so popular because the people know that it is promoting the best interests of Russian citizens," said Oleg Morozov, the deputy leader of the party's faction in the State Duma, the lower house of parliament.

But critics say that United Russia is little more than a Kremlin fan club and that through it Mr. Putin is essentially re-creating the Soviet Communist Party system. At its height, the Communist Party had 22 million members, and joining was considered essential for anyone to advance his or her career.

DOJ_NMG_0029831

"United Russia is not a real political party and is not even truly popular," said Sergei Mitrokhin, the deputy leader of the liberal Yabloko opposition party. "It is only successful because it has the full resources of the state behind it and because people are forced to join the party."

Political parties were slow to develop in Russia after the 1991 collapse of the Soviet Union. Throughout the 1990s, Russian parliaments were a chaotic mix of communists, liberals and nationalists, with none able to win over a significant portion of the voters.

That changed under Mr. Putin, who created United Russia by merging the Unity and Fatherland-All Russia parties. With the full backing of the Kremlin, United Russia swept to power in the 2003 elections to the State Duma, winning more than two-thirds of the seats. In regional elections earlier this year, United Russia won majorities in all eight local legislatures up for grabs.

At the same time, membership in the party has surpassed all other political parties combined.

United Russia's nearest rival, the Communist Party, has about 180,000 members, many of them pensioners pining for the days of the Soviet Union. The nationalist Rodina (Motherland) party has 105,000 members, while the Yabloko and the Union of Right Forces parties barely have 50,000 members, the minimum required under a law on political parties passed last year.

United Russia's platform is ostensibly based on a philosophy its leaders call "social conservatism" -- an improbable mix calling for both a strong, centralized state and free-market reforms.

But even party members acknowledge that most of United Russia's support stems from its close connection to Mr. Putin, who is widely popular, and its reputation as the "party of power."

"United Russia has had brilliant successes in elections, and a lot of that is because President Putin is so popular," Mr. Morozov said. "And we don't hide the fact that the party puts its members forward to be in the leading positions in all spheres of society, including in business."

Financial newspaper Kommersant reported earlier this year that joining United Russia is becoming essential for anyone dealing with the government.

"Like membership in the Communist Party once was, membership in United Russia is now a way of making it easier to solve all sorts of problems, from getting promotions for state officials to settling conflicts with the police and tax structures for businessmen," the newspaper reported.

Russia Calls To Review Foreign Oil Deals (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

Russia's natural resources ministry called on Thursday for a review of the two largest foreign oil projects in the country, even as senior Russian officials sought to assure EU leaders that Russia was a reliable energy partner.

The ministry said the legal agreements underpinning oil and gas developments on Sakhalin island, on Russia's eastern flank, were ineffective and should be reviewed.

It said it planned to ask the Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, to review production-sharing agreements signed in the 1990s, saying they were damaging Russia's national interests.

Any review of PSAs would threaten the two largest foreign investments in Russia: the Sakhalin-1 project, on which ExxonMobil and its partners have already spent nearly $5bn; and the Sakhalin-2 project, in which Royal Dutch Shell and its partners are investing $20bn.

However, two Russian ministers insisted separately that all Moscow's agreements with foreign energy companies would be honoured, suggesting a rift had opened within the government.

Speaking on the margins of a European Union-Russia summit in Sochi, Viktor Khristenko, energy minister, told the Financial Times that there were elements of the agreements Russia was no longer happy with.

"If I was signing them again today, I would do it differently," he said. "But they are legal obligations for us. We are fulfilling them and we expect our partners to fulfil them."

German Gref, Russia's economy minister, added: "We can only work in the framework of the existing agreements."

DOJ_NMG_0029832

Chris Finlayson, the head of Shell's Russia operation, said the company had been recently told by the energy ministry that existing PSAs would be honoured. "I have no reason to doubt this," he said.

Nevertheless, the statement by Russia's resources ministry comes as the Kremlin moves to reassert control over energy resources, helping state-controlled companies such as Rosneft and Gazprom gain influence.

Affiliates in Rosneft hold a 20 per cent stake in Sakhalin-1. Under the terms of an asset swap agreed last year, Gazprom is also set to acquire a 25 per cent state in Sakhalin-2.

Russia's natural resources ministry also said it would start legal proceedings against Total, the French oil company, for allegedly violating its licensing conditions for the development of the Kharyaga oil field in the north of Russia.

Rinat Gizatulin, the spokesman for Yuri Trutnev, the minister for natural resources, yesterday told the FT: "We have all the evidence that Total's use of the oil field is not effective."

He said Total was unlikely to win a tender to participate in the development of a massive Shtokman gas field in the Barents Sea.

Total declined to comment.

Australian Forces Intervene To Halt Fighting In East Timor (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SINGAPORE, May 25 — Several hundred Australian commandos landed Thursday in the tiny Indian Ocean nation of East Timor to try to quell escalating fighting in an ethnic dispute involving the country's armed forces and police.

Explosions, apparently from grenades, and widespread small-arms fighting were heard across Dili, the capital. Nine people were killed and 27 others were wounded, including two United Nations police advisers, during an attack on the national police headquarters, the United Nations said.

By midnight, gunshots could still be heard, said an Indonesian diplomat, Budi, who spoke by telephone from his embassy. "There is danger for everyone in Dili," said Mr. Budi, who uses only one name. "We are protecting about 50 people in the embassy. They are afraid."

East Timor's foreign minister, José Ramos-Horta, appealed for the outside help to disarm "renegade troops and police rebelling against the state." Mr. Ramos-Horta, who shared the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize, said his government could not counter a breakdown of law and order, with about 800 loyal members of the army fighting a group of about 600 rebellious soldiers.

An additional 1,300 Australian soldiers, as well as forces from Malaysia and Portugal, the country's former colonial power, are expected in the next several days.

Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, dispatched a special envoy, Ian Martin, to East Timor on Thursday. Mr. Martin, the United Nations' human rights envoy to Nepal, was Mr. Annan's special representative in East Timor in 1999.

The violence was the worst since East Timor, an extremely poor country of 800,000 people, gained independence from Indonesia four years ago after a United Nations-sponsored referendum. About 1,000 people died after the referendum as a result of violence by pro-Indonesian militias.

The current unrest has been simmering since earlier this year. About 600 members of the army, known as Loromonu, from the western part of the country, went on strike to protest what they contend is ethnic discrimination and a lack of promotions at the hands of the military leadership.

In April, the strikers were fired, and they formed a dissident group that has battled the remaining army, made up mostly of Lorosae, from the east.

The fighting between the groups intensified this week after many policemen of the same ethnic background as the rebellious soldiers defected to the rebel side, officials said.

Because of the fighting, roughly half of a contingent of about 200 Americans, mostly contractors for the United States Agency for International Development, left in the last few weeks, said a Western official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for attribution. All 47 Peace Corps volunteers, many of whom were stationed in remote areas, were evacuated at the beginning of May, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029833

The shootings outside the police headquarters on Thursday were the worst bloodshed of the conflict, the Western official said.

Stéphane Dujarric, the United Nations spokesman, said in New York, based on information from staff members in Dili, that after an hourlong attack at the Dili police headquarters, United Nations police and military advisers had negotiated a cease-fire that was agreed to on condition that police officers surrender their weapons and leave the headquarters unarmed. As they were being escorted out, he said, soldiers opened fire on them, killing 9 police officers and wounding 27 other people, including the 2 United Nations police advisers.

In the Australian Parliament, Prime Minister John Howard described the situation as "exceptionally dangerous." He said Australian troops, who have helped train the East Timor armed forces, would try to separate the warring factions and disarm them. The Australians will try to create a secure enough environment to conduct a dialogue that would end the conflict, he said.

In a hopeful sign, the Australian commandos were warmly welcomed at the airport by women and children holding signs reading, "Viva Australia."

Since gaining independence, East Timor has been almost totally dependent on foreign aid, and that is likely to continue for a long time, experts say. The United Nations Development Program estimates that the life expectancy in East Timor is 57 years.

The country, depleted of the coffee and sandalwood that once made it a small trading center, has valuable offshore reserves of natural gas. East Timor recently completed an agreement with Australia to exploit those reserves, but it is not expected to reap the benefits for years.

Extreme poverty, especially among young unemployed men, has encouraged the formation of gangs that have taken part in the violence.

Troops Land In Restive East Timor (WP)

By Alan Sipress And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, May 25 -- Soldiers in East Timor opened fire on unarmed police officers Thursday, killing nine people and injuring 27, as Australian commandos arrived in an effort to quell surging violence on the tiny island nation.

The soldiers launched an hour-long attack on a police headquarters in Dili, the capital, in the deadliest clash since violence flared in East Timor several weeks ago. The unrest has been fueled by veterans angry over their dismissal from the army.

The violence jeopardized attempts by the government to assert control and represented a major setback for the United Nations, which had cited East Timor's independence in 2002 as one of the organization's greatest achievements of the past decade.

On Thursday, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan said he would dispatch a senior adviser to East Timor, and the Security Council met in an emergency session. Meanwhile, an initial planeload of Australian forces secured Dili's airport ahead of the full deployment of about 1,300 international troops requested by East Timor's government.

Before the attack on the police headquarters, in which two U.N. police advisers were wounded, five people had been killed in violence this week. Fierce gun battles forced residents to remain indoors while foreigners started to evacuate, according to news service reports. Several houses and shops were set on fire as rival factions carried their fight to the capital's downtown area, including streets by the presidential office and the U.N. compound.

East Timor's armed forces have launched attacks against police strongholds, including the Interior Ministry, U.N. Undersecretary Jean-Marie Guéhenno told the Security Council in a briefing.

He said the country's nascent police force was in "total disarray," noting that its commander, Paulo Martins, had not come to work in days and that his deputy and other officers had reportedly joined a dissident group of military police.

The investment in East Timor "is in danger of being seriously undermined should the international community fail to extend its support at this critical time of need," Guéhenno said. Besides Australia, Guéhenno said Portugal, New Zealand and Malaysia had made commitments to send troops.

DOJ_NMG_0029834

Since East Timor won its independence from Indonesia, the government has struggled to absorb former rebel fighters into a modern military. The latest troubles began in March, when senior officers fired nearly half the army after hundreds of soldiers went on strike, alleging discrimination inside the armed forces. Those grievances erupted into deadly riots last month before reappearing in the form of a nascent guerrilla campaign by about 600 former soldiers based in the hills outside Dili. It was unclear if the violence on Thursday was led by the breakaway army faction.

The rebel commander told the BBC that the deployment of outside peacekeepers was vital to heading off civil war.

"There is no other way, or it will be war forever," said Maj. Alfredo Reinado, commander of the renegade force. "The government has taken too long. It is not capable of resolving this."

East Timorese voted for independence in 1999 following mob violence by Indonesian-backed militias. That violence ended only after the deployment of an Australian-led peacekeeping force. Today, the government in East Timor remains weak and strapped for cash, leaving it dependent on assistance from foreign governments and private organizations. The United Nations has substantially reduced its role on the island since early last year.

When the first contingent of Australians emerged from their plane Thursday and fanned out across the airfield, they were met by hundreds of cheering East Timorese.

"Welcome, Aussie soldiers. Please help us again," Judit Isaac, a homemaker, said as she watched the troops arrive, the Associated Press reported.

As international troops prepared to deploy, the U.S. Embassy ordered the evacuation of all nonessential personnel and advised U.S. citizens to leave the country.

"We can't control the situation," said Foreign Minister José Ramos-Horta, according to the AP. He said the foreign forces would help "disarm renegade troops and police rebelling against the state."

Raiders From Sudan Killed 118 In Chad, Rights Watch Reports (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

LONDON, May 25 (AP) — Raiders from Sudan have killed more than 100 villagers in Chad, Human Rights Watch reported Thursday, and the group expressed concern that the violence in Darfur was spreading.

Survivors told Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group, that the massacre was carried out last month by the janjaweed, an Arab militia that Sudan has been accused of unleashing on African villages where Darfur rebels might find support.

The Sudanese government denies backing the janjaweed but agreed to rein them in under a May 5 peace agreement. Violence, though, has increased since the government and the main rebel movement signed the accord. More than 180,000 people have died in Darfur, in western Sudan, since 2003.

"Sudanese militiamen are moving further and further into Chad, and are looting and killing Chadian villagers," Peter Takirambudde, executive director of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch, said in a statement.

The Darfur war has destabilized the region where Sudan, Chad and the Central African Republic meet. Some 200,000 Darfur refugees have sought shelter in Chad.

Chadian rebels have bases along the border and Chad's government accuses Sudan of backing them, while Sudan accuses Chad of backing Darfur rebels. There are also reports that opponents of the Central African Republic's government are gathering in the area to prepare an attack on their government.

The massacre denounced by Human Rights Watch on Thursday occurred April 12-13, when Chadian security forces were preoccupied with an abortive attack by Chadian rebels on the capital.

Human Rights Watch, quoting witnesses, said 118 people were killed in four neighboring villages. Survivors said attackers shot or hacked to death unarmed villagers. The United Nations refugee agency has reported cross-border attacks on Darfur refugee camps in Chad as well as on nearby Chadian villages.

But attackers struck far from the camps in April, "in an area where there's almost no international presence ... very little government presence," a Human Rights Watch researcher, Leslie Lefkow, said in a telephone interview from Amsterdam.

Chadian officials had no immediate comment.

DOJ_NMG_0029835

Human Rights Watch researchers learned of the massacres weeks later during a rare visit to the southern border area, Ms. Lefkow said.

The rivalry over resources and the complex ethnic dimension of the recent fighting in Chad is reminiscent of the roots of the conflict in Darfur.

The western Sudanese region saw decades of low-level tribal clashes over land and water before members of its African tribes rose in revolt in 2003, accusing the Arab-dominated central government of neglecting their impoverished region. Besides the 180,000 dead, 2.5 million people have been forced from their homes since the widespread fighting erupted.

Militia Fighting Intensifies In Mogadishu (WP)

By Tom Maliti

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

NAIROBI, May 25 -- Islamic and secular militias battled in Somalia's capital Thursday, the most widespread and some of the deadliest fighting in Mogadishu in 14 years. Dozens of people were killed and thousands fled their homes on foot.

The fighting spread from northern Mogadishu, the scene of fierce battles in recent weeks, into the southern and eastern parts of the city, where the Islamic Court Union militia made a rare foray, witnesses said.

Islamic militiamen captured a strategic road junction, known as K4, and seized the historic Sahafi Hotel, owned by a member of the rival secular militia, the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism.

The fight for control of Mogadishu comes despite a May 14 cease-fire agreement. The alliance says the self-appointed Islamic Court leaders, who have their own militias, have links to al-Qaeda, while the Islamic militia accuses the alliance of working for the CIA. U.S. officials decline to confirm any association with the secular militia.

More than 140 people were killed in eight days of fighting earlier this month, and at least six people were killed in battles that erupted Wednesday in north Mogadishu. But residents said that Thursday marked the first time since 1992 -- when international forces came to Somalia, resulting in the failed U.S. military operation described in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down" -- that battles had broken out in different parts of Mogadishu on the same day.

At least 48 people were killed and about 90 injured, said Abdi Ibrahim Jiya of the Somali Doctors Association, citing information collected from the main hospitals in Mogadishu. He said the death toll would probably rise because many civilians were unable to make it to a hospital.

Thousands of civilians fled their homes on foot, some carrying children on their backs, trying to avoid the crossfire or stray rockets, shells and bullets.

Among those fleeing southern and eastern Mogadishu were residents who had sought refuge there after leaving the north.

"I have fled from northern Mogadishu. Now the fighting has affected me in the south. So I would prefer to go back to home since there is no safe place in the city," said Sadumo Imaam, whose youngest child was killed Thursday by mortar fire.

The Islamic militiamen portray themselves as an alternative force capable of bringing order to Somalia, which has been without a real government since largely clan-based warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991.

A U.N.-backed government based in the central city of Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu, has been unable to assert authority. Islamic leaders reject the government because it is not based on Islam.

The battle for Mogadishu has further complicated relations within the transitional government. Transitional Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi gave an ultimatum to cabinet ministers involved with the secular alliance -- which operates independently -- telling them to join the administration in Baidoa or resign.

Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, an alliance leader and the national security minister, said Thursday that he and three other alliance leaders in the cabinet had not resigned despite widespread reports they had, raising questions about the viability of the already weak government.

A Latin Leader Set To Defy Leftist Trend (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029836

BOGOTÁ, COLOMBIA - As leftists and populist politicians - some of them overtly anti-American - gain strength across Latin America, Colombia's conservative president, Alvaro Uribe, stands out as a political island.

The slight, bespectacled yoga enthusiast with an amateur historian's interest in the US Civil War (he knows the Gettysburg Address by heart) is expected to be reelected here Sunday. Uribe has more than 57 percent support, enough to win elections in the first round, according to the Napoleón Franco Group, a polling firm here.

The reason, say observers, is that Colombians feel safer - and better off economically - today.

"Uribe is a remarkable leader," says Michael Shifter, vice president of the InterAmerican Dialogue, a think tank in Washington, D.C. "He has an acute sense of what the people want, and despite continuing, serious problems, has made real progress on the security front."

Indeed, three days before the elections wealthy young Colombians while away the late afternoon at trendy outdoor cafes in Bogotá. In Plaza Bolivar, school children in plaid uniforms race to scatter the pigeons and small groups of tourists gather for the changing of the presidential guard nearby.

Four years ago, when Mr. Uribe took office, Colombia looked much different. Car bombings and kidnappings were an almost daily occurrence. Talks between the government and leftist rebels to end 40 years of insurgency had just collapsed, and Frommer's didn't even bother including Colombia in its South America tour guide.

Today, the ongoing conflict between rebels and right-wing paramilitaries, both fueled by drug money, still kills thousands each year and has displaced, according to UN estimates, more than 2 million people. But there has been progress.

Homicides and kidnapping rates here are among the world's highest - but are down sharply. The murder rate has fallen 36 percent since 2002, according to Uribe's spokesman. Kidnappings dropped to 800 last year from nearly 3,000 in 2002, and are down 47 percent so far this year.

Highways in some parts of the country are still off limits and dangerous, but many that were long-controlled by bandits have been reopened.

The country's largest rebel group, the 17,000-strong Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), preparing to celebrate its 42nd anniversary next week, still refuses to negotiate. But the smaller leftist National Liberation Army (ELN) rebel group is in preliminary peace talks, and 30,635 United Self Defense Forces of Colombia (AUC) rightist paramilitaries have demobilized.

The improved security situation in Colombia, meanwhile, has also helped the economy: reviving tourism, consumer demand, and investment. According to Central Bank statistics, foreign direct investment here is up fivefold - to $10 billion last year - since Uribe took office.

"I can go to the countryside for the weekend without being killed on the road, I can go out for lunch without fear of being kidnapped, and I have more money in my pocket. What's not to like?" asks Pedro Quintero, an accountant.

Uribe, a Harvard University graduate, is popular in Washington, too, where President Bush has referred to him as a "strong and principled leader," and has poured $3 billion in aid into Colombia since 2002, most of that for the war on drugs.

Despite having his hands tied by the war at home, Uribe is a natural bulwark to Washington nemesis Hugo Chávez, the leftist Venezuelan president, says Alvaro Vargas Llosa, a Latin America expert at The Independent Institute in Oakland, Calif., public policy think tank. "Uribe can be more forceful a counter than some of the more moderate left in the region, and the US needs that," says Mr. Vargas Llosa.

Uribe's tough antirebel offensive and willingness to extradite suspected drug traffickers to the US also play well. The State Department's annual report on terrorism, released last month, lists both the leftist rebel groups and the rightist paramilitaries here as terrorist organizations - and hails Colombia as "a model of success in its counter-terrorism campaign."

By contrast, the State Department claims that next-door neighbor Venezuela is "unwilling or unable" to control traffic in arms, supplies, and drugs to the FARC and ELN - a designation that prompted Washington last week to announce a suspension of arms sales to Mr. Chávez.

Uribe, if he wins, would be the first Colombian president immediately elected to a second term after congress changed the constitution last year to allow him to run. Uribe has maintained popularity levels of near 70 percent throughout his first term. But the history of second- or third- term presidencies in Latin America offers a caution. Argentina's Carlos Menem similarly won congressional permission to run for a second term, and Peru's Alberto Fujimori dissolved congress in a "self-coup" to get his second term, and changed the constitution to get a third term. Both ultimately left office amid declining popularity and corruption allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0029837

"A second administration will be very tough because Colombians' instincts are against excess of power," says Vargas Llosa. "They will be hard on Uribe."

Criticisms of Uribe center around accusations that the wealthy landowner, whose father was killed by the rebels in the early 1980s, maintains too-cozy ties with paramilitary leaders, protecting them from long jail sentences and extradition to the US, and that he has allowed his security forces to commit abuses. Uribe is also charged with ignoring grave social problems in a country where more than half of the 41 million population live in poverty.

But perhaps the most serious criticism of him is how - in the tradition of Latin American strongmen who trample the judicial and legislative branches - he handles criticism. "Uribe has an authoritarian streak ... and embodies a new kind of conservative populism," charges Bruce Bagley, a professor of international studies at the University of Miami in Florida.

"He is intolerant of criticism, especially by human rights organizations and NGOs. He runs his foreign policy out of the presidential palace ... and most important, he has made no effort to build an effective political party that would allow the country to continue to function democratically after he leaves office," says Mr. Bagley.

Carlos Gavira, a left-wing judge who is also running for president, and who was once Uribe's law professor at the University of Antioquia in Medellin, joked to the Associated Press this week that Uribe "was a good student, but he forgot to come to the class on constitutional law."

Uribe's recent tirades against journalists critical of him - which earned him reprimands from Human Rights Watch - and his refusal to participate in any presidential debates, have not helped this image. "He projects himself as a messiah, saying that only he can bring the country out of chaos," says Maria Jimena Duzan, a columnist at Colombia's most influential newspaper, El Tiempo. "He manages the country like it's his farm, and I am afraid this will get worse."

The Alternative Democratic Pole (PDA) party's Mr. Gavira, who opposes free trade agreements with the US, is second behind Uribe, with some 19 percent of the votes, according to last Friday's Napoleón Franco poll. Former minister Horacio Serpa of the Colombian Liberal Party (PLC) is behind with 13 percent.

Colombia's Peace And Justice Law (NYT)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Last July, Colombia passed a measure called the Justice and Peace Law. It was supposed to offer paramilitary fighters incentives to put down their guns, but would instead have let them continue their criminal activities undisturbed. Now Colombia's Constitutional Court has restored justice and peace to the law.

The State Department considers the Colombian paramilitaries to be terrorists. They are responsible for massacring thousands of civilians, and they finance their activities through extortion and by providing 40 percent of Colombia's cocaine exports.

The Constitutional Court has greatly strengthened the demobilization law. The court left in a substantial reduction in sentences to induce paramilitaries to stop fighting, but requires them to confess in full to their crimes and provide the authorities with the information necessary to dismantle these criminal gangs. The court also struck down a provision that would have given prosecutors a cripplingly short time to prepare cases.

President Álvaro Uribe's administration has twice written bills that restrict the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, which is the most important remaining check on the president's power. Mr. Uribe may try again if he is elected to a second term on Sunday. He enjoys the strong backing of Washington, which considers him a counterweight to Hugo Chávez in Venezuela. The American ambassador, William Wood, has enthusiastically supported Mr. Uribe's sweetheart deal for the paramilitaries.

While the Bush administration acknowledges in general that Constitutional Court decisions should be respected, it needs to make a strong statement of support for that court's independence, and for paramilitary demobilization under the court's terms. Mr. Uribe should, too, and should abandon his efforts to meddle with the Constitutional Court.

The Tyranny Doctrine (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0029838

By Danielle Pletka And Michael Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

LAST WEEK, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced resumption of full U.S. diplomatic relations with Libya, citing Tripoli's renunciation of terrorism and intelligence cooperation. This ends a quarter-century diplomatic freeze. It also marks an effective end to the Bush doctrine.

At his second inauguration, President Bush declared: "The survival of liberty in our land increasingly depends on the success of liberty in other lands. The best hope for peace in our world is the expansion of freedom in all the world."

Since that soaring pronouncement, the Bush administration has watched Egypt abrogate elections, ignored the collapse of the so-called Cedar Revolution in Lebanon and abandoned imprisoned Chinese dissidents; now Washington is mulling a peace treaty with Stalinist North Korea.

The rhetoric of democracy, it turns out, comes more easily than its implementation. Washington worries that Egypt will bow out of the fight against Al Qaeda if the U.S. presses for reform. It worries that China will bar investment if Bush presses for the release of political prisoners. Are these fears realistic? No. These countries still have interests that parallel ours. But that won't be clear unless the president forces the tyrants to make a choice: reform or face isolation.

The case of Fathi El Jahmi, Libya's foremost democracy activist, is among the most poignant. When El Jahmi was briefly furloughed from prison in 2004, Bush hailed his release as a sign of change in Libyan strongman Moammar Kadafi. But El Jahmi's freedom lasted just two weeks, and his name hasn't passed the president's lips again. Rice's announcement welcoming Libya back into the fold of civilized nations mentioned neither democracy nor El Jahmi.

In Egypt, where only last year Rice made herself a heroine to reformers by demanding competitive elections, the government has accelerated repression. It has imprisoned Ayman Nour, the leading opposition leader, on spurious charges. Where once the Bush administration threatened to withhold aid and won the release of a prominent democracy advocate, it is now silent. In early May, Egyptian police rounded up hundreds of demonstrators rallying in support of two judges who said that parliamentary elections were rigged. Yet Washington does not seek to reduce Egypt's $1.8 billion in annual aid. Instead, this month it hosted President Hosni Mubarak's son (and anointed successor).

Pressure for changes also has lessened in Syria and Lebanon. In March 2005, in the wake of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, the Lebanese people rose up to demand democracy and reform. The Bush administration cheered, but it soon lost interest. A July visit to Beirut by Rice, replete with the "obligatory" meeting with the puppet president installed by Syria, sowed doubt about the U.S. commitment to Lebanese independence. Washington's blunders have ensured that a Syrian stooge will likely govern Lebanon for another year.

The same devotion to form over substance has been apparent in our China policy. Before his 2005 visit, Bush asked for the release of several political prisoners, including a New York Times researcher, Zhao Yan. The Chinese government ignored the request. The same polite query went to Beijing before President Hu Jintao's April visit to Washington. This time, Zhao was released, only to be indicted again once Hu's world tour was complete. Signs of White House displeasure? Not one.

Is it possible that the administration is questioning the wisdom of promoting democracy as a long-term solution to U.S. national security woes? "Realists" suggest that the president has finally woken up and smelled the coffee. They say democracy gave us an Islamist government in Iraq and Hamas in Palestine. It could give us the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. Heaven knows what it would spawn in China or Libya. Better the devil you know.

But there is no sign the White House has done any strategic rethinking. The president continues to believe his own preaching, but his administration has become incapable of making the hard choices those beliefs require. Instead, it has been quick to embrace the showy, if transitory, political advantages that come from welcoming Kadafi into the family of nations and China's president on a tour of Boeing.

The many foreign dissidents and reformers who took Bush at his word are the first to pay the price for Washington's lack of backbone. They were told that if they took risks for freedom, the U.S. would stand with them. Letting them down will make it all the more difficult to find democratic allies. Brave individuals are the real building blocks for transitions to democracy. Without them, as we have learned in Iraq, there are few alternatives to the tyranny that threatens us all.

DOJ_NMG_0029839

Danielle Pletka And Michael Rubin are, respectively, vice president for defense and foreign policy and resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Democracy At Risk South Of The Border (WSJ)

By Manuel Suarez-Mier

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

On July 2 Mexico will hold the most closely contested presidential election in its history. That in itself wouldn't be a problem if all the candidates were committed to the democratic process. But in recent weeks two of the three main campaigns have jointly pledged to challenge election results in the streets with massive unrest if their candidates don't win. If that happens, Mexico will be thrown into chaos and Mexicans will be the losers.

A poll by Zogby International last week gave Felipe Calderón a five percentage point lead over Andrés Manuel López Obrador and 12 points over Roberto Madrazo.

That's good news for Mexico. Mr. Calderón of the National Action Party offers the best chance to deepen the market-oriented economic reforms necessary for strong growth and job creation and to ease the exodus of Mexicans abroad. Mr. López Obrador of the hard-left Revolutionary Democratic Party, on the other hand, would return the country to nationalist populism and a closed economy. Mr. Madrazo of the Institutional Revolutionary Party is marketing a mixture of both, publicly siding with the left while privately pledging support for centrist reforms.

Yet even if Mr. Calderón can hold the lead, Mexico may be heading for trouble. The PRD and the PRI have announced that they are forming a united front to reject the election results if neither one wins. They charge that Mexico's PAN President Vicente Fox has illicitly used government resources to support Mr. Calderón. This week Manuel Camacho of the PRD signaled his party's nondemocratic intentions when he told the Financial Times that "there are going to be demonstrations on a scale rarely seen in Mexico and that will make it very hard to govern, no matter who wins."

Mexico can ill afford what Mr. Camacho has in mind. And yet, the prospect is looming as, much to the dismay of the PRI and the PRD, it appears that voter preferences have truly shifted toward the more market-minded Mr. Calderón.

The first big turnaround in this election concerns the PRI. It ran the country for 70 years until 2000 and as it enjoyed victories in state and local elections over the past three years, Mr. Madrazo appeared, six months ago, to have a good shot at winning. But he alienated so many would-be allies within the PRI, in his blind ambition to become its presidential contender, that today he appears unelectable. The Madrazo campaign is going nowhere but down.

The contrast with Mr. Calderón could not be more striking. He came from behind to beat Mr. Fox's hand-picked favorite in his party's primaries, and won the nomination. For months his candidacy appeared to stall. But in April he shook up his campaign team, focused his message and sharpened the attacks against his opponents. His cause was further advanced by winning, hands down, the first presidential debate in April in which Mr. López Obrador refused to participate.

Until Mr. Calderón's turnaround, this year's campaign phenomenon had been the PRD's Mr. López Obrador. Popularly known in the Mexican press as "AMLO," the PRD candidate has been running for president since he became Mexico City's mayor in 2000. Using savvy propaganda and generous giveaways, this populist demagogue seemed to have an unbeatable political advantage. But the lead went to his head, and he began acting as if he had already won. He rejected invitations to speak with nongovernmental organizations and private-sector groups and openly insulted Mr. Fox in alarmingly shrill tones.

As public opinion has turned against him, AMLO has resorted to accusing the pollsters, the media and the electoral authorities of plotting against him, a tactic he has employed regularly throughout his political career to boost his "victim" image and create social unrest in the streets. With his recent charges that Mr. Fox's government is illicitly helping Mr. Calderón he appears to be once again laying the groundwork for a challenge to an official ruling, this time the July 2 results. Mexicans are bracing for the protests that are now an AMLO trademark and that Mr. Camacho has threatened.

The surprising development, though, is that Mr. Madrazo -- once AMLO's arch-enemy in politics -- now seems ready to join in claims of an election swindle. This is all the more unusual because the PRI created Mexico's independent electoral authorities, which have gained widespread respect.

DOJ_NMG_0029840

The PRD was formed by members of the PRI who bolted their party when it began to reform in the mid-1980s. As one of these dinosaurs, AMLO seeks to restore Mexican rule to the "true" PRI values of 1930s and to ban the "neoliberal" technocrats. If he wins, he could do this by wooing PRI legislators with perks that their losing party can no longer deliver, in exchange for changing parties. Think of it as a leveraged buyout. In this set-up the PRI, as a national party, would probably vanish.

With a congressional majority, AMLO could then change the laws that limit his power and by pledging federal money for state governors, he might also win enough votes to modify the constitution and add the ingredient that he needs to fulfill his mission: presidential reelection. He could crown his authoritarian reforms by uprooting the judicial system that has worked in recent years, for the first time in history, like the independent power intended in the original Constitutional design.

If Mr. Calderón wins and the government subdues the protests of a losing PRD and its PRI allies, the PRI might survive; Mr. Calderón is not likely to offer goodies the way AMLO would. This is what makes Mr. Madrazo's support of the PRD's electoral-fraud scheme so bizarre.

A lot is riding on this election, with repercussions far beyond Mexico's national boundaries. If Mr. Calderon wins by a wide margin, PRD and PRI claims of fraud would have little traction, although they will be tried anyway. But if the Calderón margin is narrow and his competition contests the results by creating serious unrest, it could compel the government to annul the poll's results, forcing a new election.

This situation would weaken the country's institutions, raise uncertainty and fears of anarchy, with potentially serious financial instability and economic disarray. Emigration would mushroom. The long awaited Mexican miracle of fast growth and job creation -- stemming migratory outflows -- would be lost for at least another six years, if not for much longer.

Mr. Suarez-Mier teaches economics at American University in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0029841

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, MAY 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Secrets Claims In NSA Case May Stop Suits (WSJ) 4
National Security Is A Video Game For Politicians (WSJ)..... 5
Editorial: Bush Team Indifferent To Press Freedom Issues (CCCT)..... 6
Derrick Z. Jackson Op-Ed: AG Doesn't Grasp Notion Of Free Press (SEAPI)..... 7
Watch What You Read These Days (ODESAMER) 7
EDITORIAL A Total Disappointment (AAS)..... 8
Court Hears Appeal Of `Virginia Jihad' Cases (FINDLAW/AP)..... 9

Homeland Response:

House Struggles To Plug Security Gaps (AP-Y2) 9
Bush Says U.S. Learning Lessons Of Katrina (AP)..... 10
Senate Panel Approves FEMA Nominee (AP) 10
Despite Panel Approval, Senator Stalls FEMA Nominee (AP).... 11
Fixing FEMA (WT) 11
Congress Increases Effort To Bolster Flood Insurance (WSJ).... 12

War News:

Bush And Blair Acknowledge Iraq 'Setbacks' (AP)..... 13
Bush, Blair Concede Missteps On Iraq (WP) 13
Blair And Bush Are Duo Even In Descent (WP)..... 15
Bush And Blair Concede Errors, But Defend War (NYT) 16
No Quick Troop Reduction In Iraq, Allies Warn (USAT)..... 17
Covering A Friend's Back: Leaders Reverse The Roles (NYT)... 18
Bush And Blair Admit To Missteps In Iraq (FT) 19
Britain's Blair To Rally World Support For Iraq (AFP-Y2)..... 19
Bush, Blair Admit Errors In Iraq War (WT)..... 20
Bush Says Early Iraq Troop Cuts Unlikely (LAT)..... 21
Inside Politics (WT) 22
Standing By Stand-Up Iraqis (NYT)..... 24
Military Expected To Report Marines Killed Iraqi Civilians (NYT) 25
Probe Finds Marines Killed Unarmed Iraqi Civilians (LAT) 27
General To Teach Rules Of War (WT)..... 27
Marine Corps To Probe Iraq Civilian Deaths (AP)..... 28
Top Marine General To Stress Corps' Values On Trip To Iraq (KRT) 29
Top Marine Visits Iraq As Probe Of Deaths Widens (WP) 30
Afghanistan's Leader Visits Civilians Wounded In American Bombing (NYT) 31
Inside The Ring (WT)..... 31

DOJ:

Local Hero Receives Courage Award (WTEN-TV) 33

Corporate Scandals:

Reversal Could Be Long Shot, Legal Experts Say (WSJ)..... 33
Lay, Skilling Found Guilty (USAT) 34
Skilling And Lay Convicted Of Enron Conspiracy (FT)..... 35
Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Case (WT/AP)..... 36
Enron Executives Guilty On Most Counts (LAT) 36
Enron Leaders Found Guilty (WP)..... 38
Two Enron Chiefs Are Convicted In Fraud And Conspiracy Trial (NYT) 40
Ignorance Claim Did Not Sway Enron Jury (NYT)..... 42
Defendants Sunk By Their Testimony (WP)..... 44
Several Factors Influence Sentences (USAT)..... 45
Enron's Impact On The Corner Office (CSM)..... 45
Verdict On An Era: Arrogance And Recklessness At Enron (NYT) 47
Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (AP)..... 48
Enron Jurors Find Lay, Skilling Guilty (HC) 50
SLICK EXECS TAKEN DOWN (NYPOST)..... 52
Lay, Skilling Convicted Of Fraud That Doomed Enron (Update9) (BLOOM)..... 53
Lay And Skilling's Day Of Reckoning (CNNM) 56
Jurors: Ex-Enron Execs Not Credible (USAT)..... 58
Trial Fails To Answer Many Questions About Spectacular Collapse (WSJ)..... 59
White-Collar Crime's New Milestone (WP) 60
Lay, Skilling May Have Paved Their Way To Prison (AP)..... 62
Enron Trial May Encourage Businesses To Adopt Low-risk Strategies (KRT) 63
Symbol Of An Era Lay, Skilling Are Convicted Of Fraud (WSJ).. 64
Enron Pair Found Guilty (TIMES) 67
Legal Observers Divided On Odds Of Successful Appeal In Enron Case (LAW)..... 67
Justice Department, White House React To Verdict (HC) 70
Guilty Verdict Will Embolden Prosecutors (FT) 70
Guilty Verdicts Provide 'Red Meat' To Prosecutors Chasing Companies (WSJ)..... 71
Enron Task Force Had Rocky Path To Big Victory (WSJ) 73

Enron Convictions Solidifies Corporate America's Reform Movement (KRT) ... 74
Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (CHIT) ... 75
For Ex-Enron Employees, Verdict Is Personal (HC) ... 77
From The Ex-Employees: Revenge, Shock, Sadness (WP) ... 77
Many Who Lost Savings, Jobs Pleased (USAT) ... 79
Schwarzenegger Strategists Gain Confidence (WSJ) ... 79
Kenny Boy, Meet Brownie (NSWK) ... 80
Once A Friend And Ally, Now A Distant Memory (WP) ... 81
U.K. Banker Fighting Extradition Calls Enron Case `Terrifying' (BLOOM) ... 81
Wives, Ex-wives Faced Trials Of Their Own (USAT) ... 82
Books, Film, Memorabilia Not Drawing Attention (USAT) ... 83
The Enron Verdicts . . . (WSJ) ... 83
And Justice For All (NYT) ... 84
Not Just Bad Apples (WP) ... 84
Enron's End Game (USAT) ... 85
Convictions Drive Home The Point Again (WP) ... 85
Masters Of The Universe, Unite! (NYT) ... 86
Editorial: Enron Fraud: Guilty As Charged (SEAPI) ... 87
Fannie Mae Board Reverses; CEO Mudd Won't Head Probe (DOW) ... 87
. . . And The Beltway Version (WSJ) ... 89
House Committee Holds Heated Session On Corporate Execs' Pay Packages (LAW/AP) ... 90
Former Wal-Mart Exec Faces Fraud Sentence Aug. 11 (FINDLAW/AP) ... 91
$363M Is Average Pay For Top Hedge Fund Managers (USAT) 92
Charity Invites Donors To 'Kick The Tires' And Squeeze The Cash Register (NYT) ... 92

Criminal Law:

Bush Orders FBI-Congress Documents Sealed (AP-Y2) ... 94
Bush Puts Jefferson Documents On Ice Amid Heated Debate (LAT) ... 95
Bush Seals Files Seized In FBI Probe Of Jefferson (WP) ... 96
To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Seized Files (NYT) ... 98
Bush Seals Documents In Bribery Probe (CHIT) ... 99
Bush Seeks To Defuse Conflict With House Over Seized Documents (KRT) ... 101
Bush Seals FBI-seized Files In Bribery Probe (WT) ... 101
Bush Intervenes In Constitutional Battle Over Congress Raid (AFP-Y2) ... 102
Bush Orders House Documents Sealed (MRKTWTCH) ... 103
Bush Orders Evidence Seized From Congressional Office Sealed (BLOOM) ... 104
Lawmaker Raid May Come Back To Bite Bush (WSJ) ... 104
Hastert Slammed For Raid Reaction (WT) ... 105
Analysis: Congress-FBI Flap May Irk Voters (AP-Y2) ... 106
Fallout From Jefferson Case May Hurt His Party (USAT) ... 107
There's A Right Way (USAT) ... 109
Cash-in-Freezer Probe A Hot Topic In New Orleans (LAT) ... 109
G-Men Vs. Members Of The House (LAT) ... 111
One Man's Constitutional Crisis ... (NYT) ... 111
Lawmakers, Quiet On Your Rights, Roar About Theirs (USAT) 112
Editorial: Raid Reverberations / Distrust Shadows FBI In Visit To Congress (PPG) ... 113
FBI Raid Galvanizes Congress On Rights (SCRIPPS) ... 113
Opinion In Our View: Above The Law Congress Rallies Against Barbarians At The Gates (TEXGAZ) ... 114
Hastert Lashes Out At Justice Dept. (AP-Y2) ... 114
Hastert, Justice Dept. Dispute Inquiry Story (WP) ... 115
Novak Told Rove He Wouldn't Identify Him, Person Familiar Says (BLOOM) ... 116
City Hall Hiring Testimony: Interviews Were Shams (CHIT) ... 117
Daley Could Be Called To Testify (CHIST) ... 118
House Panel Backs Internet Gambling Limits (AP) ... 119
House Committee Approves Limits On Online Gambling (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 119
Elfvin Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend (BUFFNEWS)120
Awaiting High Court Review Of Lethal Injection, Circuits Are Divided (LAW) ... 121
Judge Criticizes Government's New Indictment In Gotti Trial (FINDLAW/AP) ... 122
Prosecutors Fire Back At Wecht's Defense (PTR) ... 123
Workers Begin Digging Under Barn At Hoffa Search Site (SDUT/AP) ... 123
More Than $1 Million In Cash Found At Miami-Dade Homes Linked To MIA Heist (MH) ... 124
FBI Finds $1 Million From Airport Heist Buried At Miami-Dade House (FLSUNSEN) ... 125
Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Knowledge Shows (BSUN) ... 125
Muhammad Gets Little Help From His Witnesses (WT) ... 126
Witnesses In Sniper Trial Wary (WP) ... 127
A Killer's Testimony (WP) ... 128
Psychiatric Care Denied To Gunman, Attorney Says (WP) ... 128
Financial Firms Attack Child Porn (USAT) ... 130
Canada Cracks Down On Rising Violence (CSM) ... 130

Civil Rights:

Man Gets 20 Months In Cross Burning (CO) ... 131
Stop The Black-Only Treatment (WP) ... 131

Antitrust:

Benit, Wife Face Fraud Charges (AANEWS) ... 133
Ex-school Leader Accused Of Fraud (FREEP) ... 134
UPDATE: House Judiciary Panel Votes To Ban Content Fees (DOW) ... 135
Google Reaches Agreement To Have Its Software Installed On New Dell Computers (NYT) ... 135
Dell To Sell PCs Installed With Google's Software (SEATIMES/BLOOM) ... 136
Yahoo, EBay Team In Battle With Google (USAT) ... 137
New Tech Alliances Signal More Scrambling Ahead (WSJ) ... 137
Yahoo And EBay Join To Fight The Giants (WP) ... 139
Yahoo Makes Deal On Ads With EBay (NYT) ... 140

Environment:

GAO Report Faults Voluntary Programs To Cut Air Pollution (WP) ... 141
House Votes For Oil Drilling In Alaska (USAT) ... 142

DOJ_NMG_0029843

House OKs Oil Drilling In Alaska Refuge (AP-Y2)..... 142
House Votes To Allow Drilling In Arctic Refuge (WP) 143
House Votes To Allow Drilling In Alaska Refuge (NYT) 144
House Again OKs Drilling In Arctic Refuge (LAT)..... 144
Death In The Mines, Action In Congress (NYT) 145

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Admits Selling Stolen Prescription Drugs Worth $7.3 Million (AP)..... 146
Drug Cocktail Causing Overdoses From Philadelphia To Chicago (AP)..... 146
A Look At A Drug Cocktail Problem Around The Country (AP). 147
FENTANYL DEATHS RISE: Mom: Cops Failed To Act On OD (FREEP)..... 148
Possible Sources Of Fentanyl (FREEP)..... 149
Fentanyl Deaths Hit 33 In A Week (DN)..... 150
Operation Street sweep (CA)..... 150
17 Arrested In Regional Drug Sting (AP)..... 151
Kittery Chief: Arrests 'put A Dent' In Drug Trade (PHN)..... 152
Clayton Man Admits To Money Laundering (DDN)..... 152
Study Finds No Cancer-Marijuana Connection (WP)..... 153
Idaho Man Indicted For Drug Smuggling From Canada (AP) ... 154
Judge Won't Halt Gun-store Closure (CHICOER)..... 154
SAN LEANDRO Gun Shop Tries To Keep U.S. From Closing Store Trader Sports Losing License Over Weapons That Can't Be Found (SFC) 155
Gun Crime Program Team Wins Award (DALLASBIZ)..... 155

Immigration:

Senate OKs Immigration Bill 62 To 36 (LAT)..... 156
Senate, In Bipartisan Act, Passes An Immigration Bill (NYT).... 157
Border Fight Divides G.O.P. (NYT)..... 158
Senate Passes Sweeping Bill On Immigration (LAT) 159
Senate Approves Immigration Bill (WP) 162
Senate Passes Sweeping Immigration Reform Bill (KRT) 164
Senate Passes Immigration Bill; GOP Advocate Of Crackdown Pledges 'battle' (USAT)..... 165
House GOP Expected To Yield On Legislation (WT)..... 166
Immigration: Now The Hard Part (CSM)..... 167
Senate Passes Immigration Bill Overhaul (AP) 168
Senate Passes Immigration Bill (CHIT) 169
Immigration Bill Passes Senate, Still Faces Chasm (WSJ)..... 171
Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (WT) 171
Critics Say Bill Diminishes Due Process For Immigrants (WP). 173
USCIS Could Process Immigration Plan, Ombudsman Says (AP)..... 174
Secure Border Takes Serious Study (USAT) 175
Border Deaths Expected To Rise As Summer Arrives (WT)..... 176
In California, Fox Gets Warm Embrace And A Cold Shoulder (NYT) 177
ICE Set To Deport 15 Illegal Aliens (WT) 177
Their People, Our Money (WSJ)..... 178
A Debate Beyond The Fence (WP) 179
Our National Laboratory For Bad Government (CHIT)..... 180

Tax:

Feds Cut Off Phone Tax After 108 Years (USAT)..... 180
Phone Tax Laid To Rest At Age 108 (NYT) 181
U.S. To End Contentious Phone Tax (WSJ) 182
'Antique' Phone Tax Dropped (WP)..... 183
UPDATE: Treasury Concedes Fight Over Federal Telephone Tax (DOW)..... 183
Treasury Disconnects Tax On Long-distance Calls (MRKTWTCH) 184
FBI And IRS Seek Documents In Land Deal Involving Palm Beach County Commissioner (FLSUNSEN)..... 185

Congress-Administration:

Frist Still Hopeful For Hayden Debate (AP-Y2) 186
Senate Clears The Way For Kavanaugh Vote (AP-Y2) 187
Avoiding Clash, Senate Sends Judicial Nomination To Floor (NYT) 187
Artful Dodging (NSWK)..... 188
Treasury Secretary To Step Down (WP) 190
Snow Plans To Leave Treasury Post Next Month (WSJ)..... 191
New Reports Of Change At Treasury (NYT) 191
Veteran Data Was Removed Routinely, Official Says (NYT).... 192
Veterans' Data Theft Went Unreported (AP-Y2)..... 193
Worker Often Took Data Home (WP)..... 194
Cost To Inform Vets Of Data Theft Starts At $10M (USAT)..... 195
Veterans Chief Is Grilled Over Stolen Data (LAT) 195
Harkin, Kerry Call For Free Credit Watch For Vets After Data Theft (DMR) 197
Edwards: Investigate Records Theft (AP)..... 197
With War On, Americans Have Troops In Mind (CSM)..... 197
1 War. 2 Deaths. 1 Year Later. (USAT)..... 199
Remember The Guys In The Foxholes (USAT) 201
Honoring Soldiers, Not Pitying Them (WSJ)..... 201
GAO Review Finds Flaws In Hiring By Federal Agencies (WP) 202
Inside The Beltway (WT)..... 203
Smithsonian Hands Over TV Contract (WP) 204

Other News:

GDP Growth Rate Revised Upward, But Housing Slowdown Looms (WSJ)..... 205
5.3% Growth May Be 'last Hurrah' (USAT)..... 206
Dow Industrials Climb 93.73 Points As Economic Data Come In Just Right (WSJ)..... 207
Home Economics (WSJ)..... 208
Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Help Settle Abuse Claims (NYT) 208
Support Weak For Harris In Senate Poll (AP) 209
A Test Of Our Character (NYT) 209
U.S. Aide Doubts Tehran Will Bend (WT)..... 210
US Debates Carrots, Sticks For Iran's Nuclear Program (CSM)211
Hizbullah Factor In Iran Fray (CSM) 213
Say No To Tehran's Gambit (WP) 214
It's Time To Engage With Iran (WP) 215
Abbas Threatens Hamas With Measure Implicitly Recognizing Israel (KRT)..... 216
Abbas Urges Hamas To Back 2-State Plan (WP) 217

DOJ_NMG_0029844

Abbas Stuns Hamas With Talk Of Referendum (AP-Y2) 218
Abbas Challenges Hamas To Endorse Document On A Palestinian State (USAT/AP) 219
Abbas Says He'd Put Peace Plan To A Vote (NYT) 220
Abbas Delivers Talks Ultimatum To Hamas (WT) 220
Israel's 'Realignment' (WP) 221
Harper To Meet Bush July 6, Canadian Ambassador Wilson Says (BLOOM) 222
Canada's Leader Won't Talk To National Media (LAT) 222
Putin Objects To Cheney's Remarks (AP) 223
Putin Group Races Past Soviet Party (WT) 224
Russia Calls To Review Foreign Oil Deals (FT) 225
Australian Forces Intervene To Halt Fighting In East Timor (NYT) 225
Troops Land In Restive East Timor (WP) 226
Raiders From Sudan Killed 118 In Chad, Rights Watch Reports (NYT/AP) 227
Militia Fighting Intensifies In Mogadishu (WP) 228
A Latin Leader Set To Defy Leftist Trend (CSM) 229
Colombia's Peace And Justice Law (NYT) 230
The Tyranny Doctrine (LAT) 230
Democracy At Risk South Of The Border (WSJ) 231

TERRORISM NEWS:

Secrets Claims In NSA Case May Stop Suits (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

As lawsuits mount against phone companies from plaintiffs who allege their call records were handed over to the National Security Agency illegally, the companies' defense may benefit from a powerful force: the U.S. government.

The plaintiffs, who accuse Bell phone companies of privacy violations and are seeking billions of dollars in damages, would need to delve into the depths of the NSA's surveillance program to make their cases. But the government considers such information top secret, and legal experts expect the Bush administration to assert the "state secrets" privilege in the 20 or more lawsuits filed by privacy advocates in recent weeks. If judges accept the claim, as has been the case in nearly every instance in which it has been asserted since the early 1950s, the suits will dissolve.

The state-secrets privilege stems from the Cold War era, created to allow the U.S. government a means of moving to dismiss lawsuits that would hurt foreign policy or national security. The motion has been successfully invoked in cases involving government contractors and, more recently, in the case of a German citizen claiming he was wrongfully detained by the Central Intelligence Agency.

In a California suit filed earlier this year against AT&T Inc., the Bush administration has already weighed in to try to dismiss the case, asserting state secrets in a motion aimed at preventing the airing of any classified information. A federal judge in San Francisco is expected to rule on the motion as soon as June 23.

In that case, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco privacy-rights group, accuses AT&T of illegally helping the NSA analyze phone records and Internet communications without court authorization. Most of the suits have been brought on behalf of phone-company customers by activists ranging from the state branches of the American Civil Liberties Union to public-interest lawyers to Chicago author Studs Terkel. Nearly all seek class-action status.

The suits against AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp. stem from recent media reports alleging that the companies violated privacy laws by handing over domestic calling records of Americans without court authorization. To litigate the cases, plaintiffs as well as defendants must produce evidence of exactly what happened between the companies and the NSA, lawyers say. AT&T declines to comment on the cases but insists it has violated no laws. Spokesmen for BellSouth and Verizon, which have denied turning over records to the NSA, say the suits are without merit.

Senate Judiciary Committee leaders met yesterday to consider issuing subpoenas to the chief executives of AT&T, BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest Communications International Inc. for a hearing that would examine the NSA issue. No decision was made, a committee aide said, but the senators plan to meet again June 6. Earlier this week Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin, citing the government's invocation of the state's secret privilege in the AT&T suit, said the agency wouldn't investigate allegations of privacy violations by the phone companies.

In highly redacted document unsealed yesterday in the Electronic Frontier Foundation suit, a former AT&T technician says an NSA agent visited an AT&T office in 2002 and 2003.

The bulk of the other lawsuits offer virtually no evidence from plaintiffs beyond the allegations raised in newspaper articles. The phone companies have either denied participating in the NSA program or said they did nothing illegal, and they have noted that they can't discuss classified information. So far, no one in the U.S. government has offered any information publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0029845

"As it stands right now we have no way to defend against these lawsuits," said one telecom lawyer. "It's equally important to point out that short of a newspaper article the plaintiffs don't have anything to prosecute these cases," he added.

Lawyers familiar with the suits say they anticipate that the government will invoke state secrets in all the cases against the phone companies. In a filing Wednesday in which Verizon asked the courts to consolidate the myriad cases, the company's lawyers said: "The United States is likely to intervene in and seek the dismissal of these cases...in order to assert its state secret privilege." The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation in Washington, D.C., will determine whether to consolidate the cases.

In recent years, government officials have ratcheted up the use of state-secrets motions. According to Thomas Blanton, a director the National Security Archive at George Washington University, the use of the privilege climbed from about once every five years from the 1950s through the late 1970s to twice a year from 1977 to 2001. Since 2001, the government has used the privilege in at least 13 cases, or a rate of about three times a year.

Mr. Blanton says that in nearly every case judges have sided with the government. "With state secrets the way it's developed is that's the magic word, the neutron bomb that leaves no plaintiff standing," he says.

If judges dismiss state-secret motions in the cases, both sides would likely rely on classified information to argue their cases, which could result in significant logistical hurdles. Secret documents would need to be flown from Washington, with federal escorts, to judges' chambers in Rhode Island, Louisiana, Montana and numerous other states where suits have been filed.

Lee Tien, a lawyer for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, says he is optimistic that the judge in that suit will quash the state-secrets motion. He argues that the government isn't merely a bystander in the case. "They're an intrinsic part of what's going on," Mr. Tien says. "It's a bigger problem from a fairness or due process point of view."

The judge's ruling in June could set the stage for how the other cases play out, and other lawyers and plaintiffs in the suits said they will be closely watching.

National Security Is A Video Game For Politicians (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Did this week mark the first return steps to bipartisan sanity in the war on terror? The Senate Intelligence Committee approved Gen. Michael Hayden to run the CIA by a 12-3 vote. And by helpful coincidence, the Supreme Court decided 9-0 in Brigham City v. Stuart that the police can make a warrantless entry into a home in which people are in imminent danger of physical harm. As we all are now.

For awhile after 9/11 the war on terror was a serious national enterprise. Then it entered a twilight zone between the reality of terrorist killing and the abstractions of our domestic politics. The subject became a kind of political video game in which political partisans -- the press, the pols, the bureaucracies -- attempt to splatter each other. The best-selling version of the game has been Warrantless Wiretaps, introduced for political playstations by the New York Times.

The Times reported in December that President Bush had authorized a "secret" National Security Agency program run by Gen. Hayden to monitor international phone calls related to al Qaeda. Like most video games, the story line of Warrantless Wiretaps is crudely simple: President Bush sits at a console of electronic surveillance programs and tries to demolish "our most basic civil liberties," eviscerate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and trample the Constitution's Fourth Amendment. The person who has scored the most points playing Warrantless Wiretaps is GOP Sen. Arlen Specter, just ahead of Democratic presidential gamer Sen. Russ Feingold. The rest of the country has shown little interest in Washington's new game. In opinion polls about the NSA's surveillance programs, strong majorities essentially say, So what?

Something approximating "So what?" was the Supreme Court's answer this week to the proposition that the police might sometimes enter a home to prevent mayhem without a search warrant. Indeed Justice John Paul Stevens called it "an odd flyspeck of a case."

But it was a Fourth Amendment case. And we have little choice other than to apply the same Constitution to flyspecks and national tragedies, to brawling drunks in a Utah kitchen and al Qaeda agents plotting the next 9/11. Chief Justice John Roberts's opinion in Brigham is in fact a nice summary of the Court's thinking on the exceptions to requiring search warrants, what he called the Fourth Amendment's "ultimate touchstone" of "reasonableness." With apologies to Chief Justice Roberts for this legal leap, I am going to cross-apply the Fourth Amendment citations in the Court's no-brainer Brigham decision to the post-9/11 war on terror in the U.S.

"Reasonableness" was the benchmark most people were looking for amid the rancor over the warrantless wiretaps. Simply, are the anti-terror taps reasonable or not?

The Supreme Court's purpose in Brigham was to clear up confusions among lower courts about "the appropriate Fourth Amendment standard governing warrantless entry by law enforcement in an emergency situation." I'd call the terror war an emergency. Brigham said the Court has held that officers can make a warrantless entry "onto private property" to fight a fire, investigate its cause, prevent the imminent destruction of evidence, and engage in pursuit of a fleeing suspect. Al Qaeda qualifies as all four. Yet another precedent cited for "obviating the requirement of a warrant" is "the need to protect or preserve life." That sounds like the point of the war on terror, but some may disagree.

DOJ_NMG_0029846

Because the kitchen fight had already began, "the officers had an objectively reasonable basis for believing . . . that the violence in the kitchen was just beginning." Osama bin Laden has recently broadcast a "reasonable basis" to believe the violence is "just beginning." The Court said, "Nothing in the Fourth Amendment required them to wait until another blow rendered someone unconscious, semiconscious or worse before entering." To stop the next al Qaeda attack, do we need a stricter test than we allow for kitchen fights?

In a final burst of Fourth Amendment common sense, the Court said, "The role of a peace officer includes preventing violence and restoring order, not simply rendering first aid to casualties." This is what the ranting over Homeland Security's inadequacies has been about -- preventing violence before the casualties begin. That is the purpose of recording these calls at the moment they sound dangerous, not after we've made paper submissions to a court.

In a helpful June 2002 essay on all this for the Yale Law Journal, "Local Policing after the Terror," William J. Stuntz, a Fourth Amendment specialist at Harvard Law School, argued that increasing legal authority for the police was appropriate in the post-9/11 world. The problem with Big Brotherism, he says, is not the surveillance itself but that they might use the information to "punish you for ordinary behavior." To avoid tying the war on terror in legalistic knots, he proposes that we forbid public disclosure of any information gathered in anti-terror searches "where the search tactic is secret and potentially invasive." Then restrict use of that information only for prosecutions of the most serious crimes.

This sounds like 9/11 policy for adults, in contrast to Washington's "shocked" reaction to the anti-terror surveillance programs. We began by saying the 12-3 Hayden vote was cause for hope. Small cause. * * *

Supreme Court Footnote. In a April 28 column I noted that no public record is kept of the Justices' conferences. It turns out there is a fascinating record -- "The Supreme Court in Conference (1940-1985): The Private Discussions Behind Nearly 300 Supreme Court Decisions"(Oxford University Press, 1040 pages, $135). University of San Diego political science professor Del Dickson assembled the notes from the available papers of Justices such as Frankfurter, Jackson, Douglas, Harlan, Clark, Warren and Brennan. He then edited the papers around individual cases, say, Brown v. Board of Education or Roe v. Wade. The book, incidentally, is regarded in some quarters of the Court as a violation of the sanctity of the conference. Sounds like an interesting privacy issue.

Editorial: Bush Team Indifferent To Press Freedom Issues (CCCT)

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, May 26, 2006

Indeed, latest foray by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales shows an alarming eagerness to target the nation's journalists

Thomas Jefferson, who had been savaged by newspapers, nevertheless understood the role of a free and independent press in a democracy. He wrote that ". . . were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter." George W. Bush and his administration are not so inclined to embrace the work of the press.

The latest evidence of this administration's wary, and often hostile, approach, to the news media is the statement by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that his office is reviewing the possible prosecution of journalists under turn-of-the-20th century espionage laws. He spoke on ABC's "This Week" about The New York Times' disclosure last year that the National Security Agency was, without warrants, eavesdropping on international phone calls in the pursuit of terrorism suspects.

"There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility," Gonzales said regarding the possibility of prosecuting the journalists who won a Pulitzer Prize for the story.

Whether it is retroactively removing declassified documents from circulation, or seeking to rummage among the papers of deceased muckraking newspaper columnist Jack Anderson, or sending platoons of Justice Department agents bearing subpoenas after reporters, the White House has shown it will play hardball with the press. Bush's penchant for secrecy predates Sept. 11, but the terrorism threat has turned this into obsession. It's a sentiment that would have found favor with President Nixon, who fought the publication of the Pentagon papers in 1971.

Yet in both the Pentagon papers and the disclosure of NSA activities, the press was informing the public what its government was up to. If terrorists operate under the assumption that their every waking moment is under surveillance, the only party in the dark about the government's supposition that the constitutional prohibition against unreasonable searches was no longer operative was the American public.

DOJ_NMG_0029847

Even if Gonzales' statement expresses only the administration's pique over the disclosure, rather than a real intent to prosecute, the effect is nonetheless chilling. And that chill hampers the flow of information, one of those democratic values which the fight against terrorism is supposed to protect.

Derrick Z. Jackson Op-Ed: AG Doesn't Grasp Notion Of Free Press (SEAPI)

By DERRICK Z. JACKSON, SYNDICATED COLUMNIST

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, May 26, 2006

Journalists. Get the rack ready! Our attorney general is coming for us, snarling like a guard dog at Abu Ghraib.

On Sunday, Alberto Gonzales told ABC's "This Week" he would consider prosecuting reporters who get their hands on classified information and break news about President Bush's terrorist surveillance program. "There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility," Gonzales said. "We have an obligation to enforce those laws."

It is almost funny to see Gonzales scour the statutes to harass journalists. This is the same administration that cannot spell the word law if you spot it the "l" and the "a." It has already set the presidential record in claiming the authority to circumvent the law in more than 750 cases.

Because the war "is not the traditional clash between nations adhering to the laws of war," Gonzales reasoned to Bush, "in my judgment, this new paradigm renders obsolete Geneva's strict limitations on questioning of enemy prisoners and renders quaint some of its provisions requiring that captured enemy be afforded such things as commissary privileges, script (i.e., advances of monthly pay), athletic uniforms and scientific instruments."

We saw where Gonzales' desire to deny a detainee a trip to the commissary to get a candy bar and some gym clothes got us eventually: Abu Ghraib, the symbol of America's abuse of global statutes.

Gonzales was a prime force in other matters to seal off the Bush White House from accountability when he was White House counsel. He helped the administration block and drag its feet on the release of presidential papers from Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush and the papers of John Roberts as he was being considered for the Supreme Court. Gonzales helped to withhold or delay highly classified documents from the president's own 9/11 Commission and from the Government Accountability Office concerning the energy task force of Dick Cheney.

Bruce Craig, executive director of the National Coalition for History, called the Bush roadblocks on presidential papers "a disaster for history." Gonzales remains in the lead of this disastrous presidency. A few weeks before it was revealed that the administration's phone-record collecting was domestic as well as international, Gonzales was asked at a House hearing if he thought the administration could monitor domestic calls without warrants. His answer was, "I wouldn't rule it out."

Now, we have the FBI trying to get the papers of the late columnist Jack Anderson. We already knew what low regard Bush had for the press before he got into the Oval Office. On the 2000 presidential campaign, he told Cheney, "There's Adam Clymer -- major-league (expletive) from The New York Times." Cheney responded, "Oh yeah, he is, big time."

Six years later, Gonzales' comment, combined with the past, make you wonder when we are going to hear about a Nixonian enemies list. In Richard Nixon's administration, Watergate masterminds actually thought about killing Anderson with LSD, and Attorney General John Mitchell threatened Katharine Graham, the late Washington Post publisher, by saying she would have her breast caught in a wringer.

We have not heard of anything that incredible yet. But there is nothing to suggest this administration is going to do anything else but sink deeper into secrecy. On Monday, Bush tried to plug the leaks in his plunging popularity over Iraq by saying, "Freedom is moving, but it's in incremental steps."

It is impossible to take Bush seriously on that concept when, at home, he is attempting to circumvent Congress and prosecuting one of the most important institutions for free speech. Gonzales told ABC, "I understand very much the role that the press plays in our society, the protection under the First Amendment we want to promote and respect, the right of the press." The actions of Gonzales show how little the Bush administration promotes the rights of the press. With every pronouncement, freedom is disappearing, in incremental steps.

Derrick Z. Jackson writes for The Boston Globe.

Watch What You Read These Days (ODESAMER)

Odessa (TX) American, May 26, 2006

THE POINT — Attorney general hints at prosecutions for leaks of classified information.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales may have simply been launching a trial balloon on one of the Sunday political chat shows when he hinted that certain laws could be interpreted to authorize the prosecution of journalists who receive leaks of classified material.

If so, that trial balloon needs to be punctured. If not, the law needs to be changed. If it's intended as intimidation, Gonzales deserves the scorn all bullies deserve.

On ABC's "This Week" Sunday, Gonzales was asked if he can prosecute journalists for publishing classified information. The administration is reportedly upset about the story last December that revealed the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of Americans in telephonic communication with alleged terrorist suspects overseas, among others. His careful lawyer's answer deserves careful analysis.

"There are some statutes on the book, which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility. That's a policy judgment by the Congress in passing that kind of legislation. We have an obligation to enforce those laws."

Gonzales is almost certainly referring to the World War I-era 1917 Espionage Act, which made it a crime for "unauthorized persons" to receive national defense information and transmit it to others. The Justice Department is using that act, which hadn't been invoked for years, to prosecute two pro-Israeli lobbyists, although the judge in that case is considering a motion to dismiss the charges on the contention that the old law is unconstitutionally vague and violates the First Amendment.

If that provision, written before World War II, the Cold War and the rise of the National Security State, were applied literally, it could make journalists who publish such material criminals.

It could also make criminals of whistle-blowers seeking to reveal government abuses of power, of academics who write papers and books about leaked information, of members of Congress who discuss classified material, and perhaps even of readers of newspapers who discuss stories based on leaked information with their friends.

Gonzales is more than a little disingenuous in trying to make it seem as if policy judgments by Congress could "force" the administration to go after journalists. The 1917 Espionage Act was not passed by the current Congress to force the administration's hand. It has never been applied against journalists because most authorities believe the First Amendment would protect journalists and others from its provisions. Indeed, during the Clinton administration Congress passed a law to criminalize leaks of classified material (which Bill Clinton vetoed) precisely because people on all sides of the issue understood that then-current law (including the Espionage Act) did not criminalize most leaks.

Government officials who receive security clearances and promise not to divulge classified material are a different story. They have made contractual assurances and been entrusted with secret information. Ordinary citizens — and yes, that includes journalists — are under no such contractual obligation.

Unfortunately, government has become so big, so secretive and so inclined to classify material that is embarrassing or scandalous rather than vital to national security that whistle-blowers and leakers are sometimes the only way citizens can learn what government is really doing in their name.

Prosecuting journalists would not be the end of freedom as we know it, but it would be a step on the road to more overbearing government.

EDITORIAL A Total Disappointment (AAS)

Austin American-Statesman, May 26, 2006

When he was nominated to be U.S. attorney general, Alberto Gonzales had a mostly quiet record as a Texas Supreme Court justice, secretary of state and George W. Bush's attorney, both as governor and president.

But now it seems the signs were there all along that he is a lawyer willing to defend executive power to an extreme rarely seen in national politics. At his Senate confirmation hearing, Gonzales was grilled about memos construed as defending torture and ignoring the Geneva Conventions.

He evaded most of those queries and cast enough doubt about others to gain confirmation. And his personal story of rising from a farm laborer background to graduate from Harvard Law School was compelling enough to overcome vague doubts.

Since taking over the Justice Department, however, Gonzales has acted as if he is still the president's general counsel, not the top law officer in the land.

He has gone to Congress to defend the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of American citizens living in this country. Gonzales has said the war powers act gives the administration the authority to spy on Americans, and that the secret court where domestic surveillance warrants are sought is insufficiently speedy for the war on terror.

His willingness to condone domestic spying has even some members of his own Republican Party squirming.

This week, Gonzales sparked a constitutional crisis by authorizing the FBI to search the congressional offices of U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-Louisiana. When an executive branch Cabinet member OKs rummaging through a legislative branch office, separation of powers issues become a political battleground. The GOP leadership in Congress is livid at Gonzales for approving the search.

DOJ_NMG_0029849

Gonzales began the week by assaulting the First Amendment and threatening to prosecute journalists under an ancient espionage law. The attorney general objects to journalists revealing classified material — even when that information shouldn't be classified and properly informs the public.

It's no secret that the president and Gonzales harbor no fondness for a free press. Their loathing is palpable, and they have declared war on journalists. They might prosecute The New York Times for writing about the NSA's no-warrant eavesdropping on U.S. citizens, and they are eager to tap journalists' phones when they think information is being leaked.

What is at stake here is the public's ability to know what its government is doing. The administration can declare anything classified as part of the war on terror — including gathering millions of private citizens' phone records and spying on Americans without a warrant — then jail any reporter who exposes it.

It is chilling to consider how far this administration will go to crush dissent and free speech, and how far Gonzales will go to defend it.

What a disappointment he has been.

Court Hears Appeal Of `Virginia Jihad' Cases (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry O'dell, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

(AP) - RICHMOND, Virginia-Three U.S. Muslims convicted in a conspiracy that began with paintball games to train for a holy war against the United States were improperly denied a jury trial, their lawyers told a federal appeals court Thursday.

A federal prosecutor, however, argued that the three had to live with their "tactical decision" to entrust their fate to a judge.

"They got exactly what they wanted," Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg told a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Masoud Khan of Gaithersburg, Maryland, Seifullah Chapman of Alexandria and Hammad Abdur-Raheem of Falls Church were part of what prosecutors called a "Virginia jihad network" that prepared to join the Taliban by playing paintball games in the woods near Fredericksburg in 2000 and 2001.

In all, the government charged 11 men. Six entered plea bargains and two were acquitted.

Khan was convicted of the most serious charges, including conspiracy to levy war against the United States and conspiracy to contribute services to the Taliban. He trained with the militant, anti-American group Lashkar-e-Taiba, which the government later designated a terrorist organization.

Lawyers for Chapman and Abdur-Raheem contend their clients and Khan should have been tried separately. Chapman's attorney, John Zwerling, said his client was essentially forced to choose a bench trial because a jury's post-9/11 passions might be inflamed by the more serious allegations against Khan.

Khan's attorney, Jonathan Shapiro, suggested his client may have waived his right to a jury trial because of pressure from his co-defendants and that all three men may have based their decision on "a misapprehension about what their trial would be like."

Appellate Judge H. Emory Widener Jr. seemed unimpressed with the defense attorneys' arguments.

"If a feeling that you can't get fair trial is reason to reverse a case, we'd have to reverse them all," Widener said.

Lawyers for Chapman and Khan also are appealing their clients' sentences. Khan was originally sentenced to life plus 65 years in prison, but that was reduced to life plus 45 years. Chapman's original 85-year sentence was reduced to 65 years.

The government is appealing Abdur-Raheem's sentence reduction from eight years and a month to four years and four months.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Struggles To Plug Security Gaps (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP2, May 25, 2006

Worried about security gaps in commuter trains and at U.S. borders, the House struggled Thursday to pump billions of extra dollars into protecting the country against terrorists without putting too much strain on taxpayers.

The spending bill would give the Homeland Security Department $32 billion in 2007, $1.8 billion more than this year. The legislation moved toward passage as lawmakers debated dozens of competing proposals to bolster national security.

Lawmakers nixed a plan to add $36 million for devices to detect nuclear materials being smuggled over U.S. borders that critics said would short-shrift other security programs.

DOJ_NMG_0029850

But they agreed to spend an additional $50 million to bolster rail security in a plan by Rep. Stephen F. Lynch (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., that pit lawmakers from cities with large transit systems against those from rural areas.

"We seem to have forgotten that more people travel on rail on a daily basis than fly," Rep. Rob Simmons, R-Conn.

Rep. Harold Rogers (news, bio, voting record), chair of the House Appropriations panel that oversees homeland security spending, warned the plan would shift money from other projects to avoid increasing the bottom line.

"What we can't afford to do is fund one program at the expense of all the others," said Rogers, R-Ky.

Democrats accused the Bush administration of not doing enough to protect the nation from terrorists, and lawmakers from both parties noted widespread management problems at Homeland Security.

"We don't have the bucks in here to get enough of a bang to really protect the country," said Rep. David Obey (news, bio, voting record) of Wisconsin, top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee.

Homeland Security, which was created in response to the 2001 terror attacks in New York and Washington, has been criticized for providing only spotty protections since it opened its doors three years ago.

Homeland Security "has yet to prove itself to be a valued agency," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y. "Frankly, its value is very dubious."

For the second straight year, the House bill eliminates a $1.3 billion administration plan to raise fees for airline passengers. It also includes:

_$20 billion to protect U.S. borders and deter illegal immigration.

_$4.2 billion for port security.

_$6.5 billion to bolster disaster preparedness and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which was overwhelmed when Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast last year.

_$3.2 billion in state and local grants for emergency first responders.

The Senate has yet to write a similar bill.

___

On the Net:

The FY07 Homeland Security Appropriations bill, H.R. 5441, can be found at: http://thomas.loc.gov/

Bush Says U.S. Learning Lessons Of Katrina (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The AP, May 25, 2006

President Bush highlighted U.S. preparedness for the upcoming hurricane season as he marked a change of command Thursday at the U.S. Coast Guard, which rescued 33,000 people after Hurricane Katrina.

"The whole world saw your skill and bravery during the hurricanes last year," Bush said at Fort McNair, where Adm. Thad Allen replaced Adm. Tom Collins as commandant of America's oldest maritime service. "They saw Coast Guard rescuers plunging from helicopters, lifting people from rooftops, hoisting them to safety."

Overall, however, the federal government botched its response to Katrina, which devastated the Gulf Coast. The National Hurricane Center has warned residents to prepare for as many as six major hurricanes during this year's hurricane season, which begins June 1.

"We're determined to learn the lessons of Katrina, and we're doing everything possible to be prepared for the next storm," Bush said. "The Department of Homeland Security has reviewed emergency plans for all 50 states and America's 75 largest cities. The department is working closely with communities to identify any weaknesses in their plans and to find ways to improve them now."

Bush said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has taken steps to reform FEMA, improve partnerships with the Red Cross and the Defense Department and expand federal supplies.

"We're also making it clear that all able-bodied Americans should have the resources necessary to sustain themselves for 48 to 72 hours after a disaster so that emergency personnel can focus on saving those who cannot help themselves," Bush said.

While Bush was with the Coast Guard, Senate Democrats hosted a homeland security summit with leaders from across the nation to discuss how to protect the nation from the next emergency.

"While President Bush has pushed hard to ensure that our military has the resources necessary to protect our nation abroad, he has let our country's fire fighters and paramedics down by failing to provide the resources necessary for them to protect our citizens here at home," said Harold Schaitberger, president of the International Association of Fire Fighters. "Our nation shouldn't have to suffer another Katrina or 9/11 before our nation's first responders get the support they need."

Senate Panel Approves FEMA Nominee (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0029851

By Lara Jakes Jordan
The AP, May 25, 2006

A Senate panel on Thursday approved the nomination of R. David Paulison as chief of the Federal Emergency Management Agency after he pledged to refile three years of tax returns to correct questionable travel deductions.

In a statement, Paulison said he was "pleased to have this matter raised and resolved" after the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this week found errors in his state and federal returns.

Paulison, who has served as acting FEMA director since September, said he relied on ultimately bad advice from his accountant in filing the returns from 2003 to 2005. It was not immediately known how much the deductions were worth.

"I will file as soon as possible the required federal and state returns and will pay all taxes, penalties or interest that may be required to immediately correct these issues," Paulison said in a letter Thursday to Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., who lead the committee.

That satisfied the panel's concerns as it wrapped up its review of Paulison's returns. It approved his nomination by voice vote and sent it to the full Senate for consideration.

"We do not believe it should disqualify him," Collins said. Lieberman said Paulison "answered the committee's questions on this matter completely."

The 2006 hurricane season begins next week, on June 1. Paulison has had a three-decade firefighting career, including a stint as chief of the Miami-Dade County fire department and head of the U.S. Fire Administration.

Despite Panel Approval, Senator Stalls FEMA Nominee (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan
The AP, May 26, 2006

Angered over FEMA's flood insurance program, a senator said late Thursday he would block the nomination of R. David Paulison as the agency's chief in the latest hitch in the push for his approval before the start of the hurricane season.

A spokesman for Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., said he will delay Paulison's confirmation until the Federal Emergency Management Agency develops a suitable appeals process for property owners whose flood insurance claims are rejected.

FEMA administers the insurance program. Bunning spokesman Mike Reynard said the agency was supposed to establish an appeals process by December 2004.

Bunning "is going to hold the nomination until they meet the intention of Congress by establishing an appeals process that will help the victims of floods," Reynard said. "It has to be a real and meaningful appeals process."

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke declined comment Thursday night on the stalled confirmation. The Homeland Security Department oversees FEMA.

The surprise delay surfaced hours after a Senate panel approved Paulison's nomination after he pledged to refile three years of tax returns to correct questionable travel deductions.

In a statement, Paulison said he was "pleased to have this matter raised and resolved" after the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee this week found errors in his state and federal returns.

Paulison, who has served as acting FEMA director since September, said he relied on ultimately bad advice from his accountant in filing the returns from 2003 to 2005. It was not immediately known how much the deductions were worth.

"I will file as soon as possible the required federal and state returns and will pay all taxes, penalties or interest that may be required to immediately correct these issues," Paulison said in a letter Thursday to Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., who lead the committee.

That satisfied the panel's concerns as it wrapped up its review of Paulison's returns. It approved his nomination by voice vote and sent it to the full Senate for consideration.

"We do not believe it should disqualify him," Collins said. Lieberman said Paulison "answered the committee's questions on this matter completely."

The 2006 hurricane season begins next week, on June 1. Paulison has had a three-decade firefighting career, including a stint as chief of the Miami-Dade County fire department and head of the U.S. Fire Administration.

Fixing FEMA (WT)

By Susan M. Collins And Joseph I. Lieberman
The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Moving an intensive-care patient outdoors won't cure him, but that's how some members of Congress would treat a patient in desperate need of care and rehabilitation — the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0029852

We shared Americans' shock at news accounts of FEMA's delayed, halting and often wasteful response to Hurricane Katrina last summer. After a seven-month investigation that featured 22 hearings and 325 formal interviews and collected more than 838,000 pages of documents, the Senate Homeland Security Committee concluded that "FEMA was unprepared — and has never been prepared — for a catastrophe of the scale of Katrina." The committee found that FEMA has been under-staffed, under funded, unready and weakened by loss of essential functions like grant-making authority to support state and local disaster training.

Among the 88 recommendations in our new committee report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," is that FEMA be strengthened, protected and given a more regional focus to promote faster and better-tailored responses to natural disasters or terror attacks — and be reconstituted as the National Preparedness and Response Authority as a mark of serious change.

Some Washington insiders have reacted poorly to this proposal (e.g., the op-ed "Getting FEMA wrong," in the Washington Times on May 8). They want to pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security to reclaim what they see as the glory days of an earlier time.

Their prescription has several reality-based problems.

First, FEMA is not now and probably never was capable of responding effectively to a catastrophe like Hurricane Katrina — even when it was an independent agency. Its response to the 1992 destruction in Florida from Hurricane Andrew was widely criticized. A Government Accountability Office report said the "the federal strategy for responding to catastrophic disasters is deficient" and that the performance "raised serious doubts about whether FEMA is capable of responding to catastrophic disasters." And FEMA's own inspector general recently reported that, except for evacuation planning, there was no evidence of "FEMA efforts to conduct planning specifically for catastrophic natural disasters, and little awareness of the need for preparing for them, prior to 2001."

Second, moving FEMA out of DHS won't cure its problems, but will sever its close working ties with other DHS units like the Coast Guard, infrastructure protection, law enforcement, and communications and intelligence capabilities. We would note that the Coast Guard — by all accounts a stellar performer in responding to Katrina — was, like FEMA, transferred to DHS, and has continued to excel.

Third — and ironic, considering that critics like Reps. Tom Davis and Bill Shuster fault us for supposedly "creating another bureaucracy" — moving FEMA out of DHS would force the department to create another bureaucracy to maintain its capability to deal with the disastrous aftermath of a mass-casualty terror attack. Since DHS' mission applies to both natural and man-made disasters, and since challenges like arranging evacuation, food, medical care and shelter are similar regardless of cause, keeping a strengthened agency within DHS makes operational and financial sense.

Fourth, the critics' position overlooks the committee's recommendation that the emergency preparedness and response system be transformed from a Washington-centered bureaucracy into a 10-region organization focused on training, planning and responding in close cooperation with state and local officials. While we propose a decentralized model that focuses on regional challenges, others cling to a more bureaucratic model.

Fifth, our plan would protect a reinforced, reinvented FEMA to ensure its visibility and influence. It includes statutory protection against departmental reorganization, a regular advisory link to the president, and direct reporting to the president in times of crisis.

Members of Congress engaged in a long and thoughtful debate before deciding that FEMA belonged in the DHS structure. That logic is still sound. Emergency management is a central part of our homeland security. FEMA's withdrawal from DHS can only weaken the agency further and transfer its problems elsewhere. It is the wrong way to go if we are serious about protecting American lives.

Sen. Susan M. Collins, Maine Republican, is chairman of the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, is ranking member.

Congress Increases Effort To Bolster Flood Insurance (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As hurricane season approaches, Congress will speed action on a bill to shore up the National Flood Insurance Program by raising policy premiums for the most vulnerable coastal properties.

Most policyholders wouldn't be assessed big premium increases under the proposals, but commercial properties and second-home owners in high-risk areas would pay much more for insurance.

The Senate Banking Committee unanimously approved a flood-insurance bill yesterday that is similar to a measure passed in March by the House Financial Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0029853

The urgency to pass legislation stems from fears of a new round of storm damage this season, as well as from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita that put the flood-insurance program deeply in the red. Costs amounting to $23 billion dwarfed the $2 billion in premiums and fees the program collects each year.

The legislation would remove the flood-insurance program's obligation to repay as much as $20.8 billion in borrowings from the U.S. Treasury for last year's hurricane-damage claims. The Senate bill would require future borrowing requests to include a repayment plan and create a reserve fund of as much as 1% of all risk exposure in force.

Like the House measure, the Senate proposal would require policyholders with vacation homes in risky areas to pay fair-market rates for their premiums. The Senate measure also would end subsidies for structures that have received claims from repeated flood damage.

While federally chartered banks already must ensure that mortgage holders in flood-prone areas have insurance, the Senate bill would add the requirement to state-chartered financial institutions. The bill would impose new stiffer fines on financial institutions that fail to verify applicable mortgage holders have flood insurance.

Industry experts believe that the bills would only incrementally help the national flood-insurance program, which is operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, but won't eliminate future needs for taxpayer bailouts.

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Blair Acknowledge Iraq 'Setbacks' (AP)

By Terence Hunt And Tom Raum

The AP, May 25, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair acknowledged difficult times in the Iraq war they launched together in 2003, but both vowed to keep troops there until the new Iraqi government takes control.

"Despite setbacks and missteps, I strongly believe we did and are doing the right thing," Bush said Thursday evening in a White House news conference with Blair.

For his part, Blair declared that after a meeting earlier this week with Iraq's new prime minister, "I came away thinking the challenge is still immense, but I also came away thinking more certain than ever that we should rise to it."

Bush and Blair refused to discuss withdrawing troops from Iraq.

Bush, Blair Concede Missteps On Iraq (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair last night acknowledged a series of errors in managing the occupation of Iraq that have made the conflict more difficult and more damaging to the U.S. image abroad, even as they insisted that enough progress has been made that other nations should support the nascent Iraqi government.

In a joint news conference, Bush said he had used inappropriate "tough talk" -- such as saying "bring 'em on" in reference to insurgents -- that he said "sent the wrong signal to people." He also said the "biggest mistake" for the United States was the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, in which guards photographed themselves sexually tormenting Iraqi prisoners, spawning revulsion worldwide. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time," he said.

Blair, who visited Baghdad this week, said he and Bush should have recognized that the fall of president Saddam Hussein would not "be the rise of a democratic Iraq, that it was going to be a more difficult process" because "you're talking about literally building the institutions of a state from scratch."

While Bush increasingly has begun to acknowledge missteps in handling the war, his comments last night -- together with Blair's -- represent his most explicit acknowledgment that the administration underestimated the difficulty of the central project of his presidency.

The hour-long news conference came at a moment of acute political weakness for both men, who repeatedly emphasized that Iraq is finally turning a corner and that, whatever their other misjudgments, the decision to attack Iraq remains justified. Blair appeared dour and exhausted during much of the news conference, and both leaders became most animated when talking about their sagging political fortunes.

"No question that the Iraq war has, you know, created a sense of consternation here in America," Bush said. "I mean, when you turn on your TV screen and see innocent people die day in and day out, it affects the mentality of our country." He added: "I can understand why the American people are troubled by the war in Iraq. I understand that. But I also believe the sacrifice is worth it and it's necessary."

DOJ_NMG_0029854

In his own recital of errors -- which came in response to a British reporter on the last question of the evening -- Blair cited the process of "de-Baathification" that immediately followed the overthrow of the old government. Many analysts say that decision to remove all of Hussein's loyalists fueled the insurgency because it threw tens of thousands of Iraqis out of work and left an administrative vacuum, and Blair agreed that it should have been done "in a more differentiated way."

The prime minister's examples appeared to be a direct rebuke of both the Pentagon's insistence that a detailed "nation-building" plan was unnecessary before the invasion and the push by key members of Bush's administration for broad de-Baathification.

Bush's approval ratings have sunk to some of the lowest numbers for any president in decades, while Blair's Labor Party took a beating in recent elections. Iraq has played a role in both their troubles as American and British voters tire of the war. In the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, 32 percent of Americans approved of Bush's handling of the war and 37 percent said it has been worth the cost.

Bush, and especially Blair, made the case that because Iraq now has a permanent government, other nations and international organizations -- such as the United Nations -- that have been reluctant to assist in rebuilding the country now have an obligation to step forward. Speaking of his trip to Baghdad, Blair said, "I came away thinking that the challenge is still immense, but I also came away more certain than ever that we should rise to it.

"What is important now is to say that after three years, which have been very, very difficult, indeed, and when at times it looked impossible for the democratic process to work . . . then it is our duty, but it is also the duty of the whole of the international community, to get behind this government and support it," he added.

Both governments have previously signaled desires to draw down troops in Iraq. Britain in the next week or so will have reduced its deployment from 8,000 to 7,200, and officials in London have talked about making greater progress toward withdrawals in the next year. Pentagon officials have suggested they would like to withdraw about 30,000 troops by the end of the year, leaving 100,000 there.

At the same time, both governments have made it clear that they envision some troops remaining for years. Bush at a previous news conference said it will be up to future presidents to decide when the last U.S. forces will leave, and an aide to Blair told British reporters this week that London hopes to pull out its last troops by 2010.

Bush brushed away questions about reducing troop levels, saying it depends on discussions with the Iraqi government and the judgment of U.S. commanders. "I have said to the American people, 'As the Iraqis stand up, we'll stand down,' " he said. "But I've also said that our commanders on the ground will make that decision.

"I want our troops out, don't get me wrong," Bush added, saying that he said U.S. troops would not leave the country until Iraq is able to sustain, defend and govern itself.

Blair's singling out the handling of "de-Baathification" -- that is, the effort to remove members of Hussein's ruling Baath Party from positions of power in post-invasion Iraq -- is noteworthy because Bush administration officials have been reluctant to revisit the controversy surrounding that decision publicly. Blair's raising of the issue may signal a greater willingness to acknowledge such debates, which have raged among policy analysts.

The de-Baathification program was issued as Coalition Provisional Authority Order Number 1 on May 16, 2003, by L. Paul Bremer III, the chief of the U.S. occupation in 2003-2004.

It purged all Baath Party members with rank, a number estimated at 30,000 to 85,000. It was opposed by many other U.S. civilian and military officials, including the CIA station chief at the time, who thought it would drive tens of thousands of influential Iraqis into the arms of those violently opposed to the U.S. presence. On the other hand, it was consistent with the Bush administration's policy of transforming Iraq as a way of changing Middle Eastern politics.

In 2005, a joint study by the inspectors general of the Pentagon and State Department concluded that de-Baathification had indeed helped destabilize post-invasion Iraq. "The CPA decision to cleanse the political system of Hussein sympathizers -- notably, the 'de-Baathification' effort -- effectively decapitated" the Iraqi police services, they wrote.

While Blair singled out the de-Baathification policy, he did not mention the other major program that was started just after it, Bremer's order on May 23, 2003, that dissolved the Iraqi military and the Interior Ministry's national police force. That move added to the group of disaffected Iraqis and also lessened the ability of the occupation authority to control post-invasion Iraq. It was a move that surprised generals at U.S. Central Command, the nation's military headquarters for Iraq and the Middle East, where plans had been developed to use Iraqi army troops in reconstruction tasks.

Bremer and his allies have argued that the Iraqi military already had disbanded itself, but other officials said it could have easily been called back to bases and supported by U.S. logistics.

Regarding Iran, Bush said he would consider providing incentives if it agreed to abandon nuclear enrichment activities. "If they would like to see an enhanced package, the first thing they've got to do is suspend their operations, for the good of the world," Bush said. He also said that a letter from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was "interesting," but it skirted the nuclear issue.

DOJ_NMG_0029855

Blair earlier in the day tried to defuse talk of military confrontation with Iran. "We don't want a conflict with Iran, we have got enough on our plate doing other things," he told al-Jazeera television. "Nobody is targeting Iran. People are simply worried because they appear to be in breach of their nuclear obligations and because they are supporting terrorism around the Middle East."

Blair And Bush Are Duo Even In Descent (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair once bestrode the globe as powerful leaders who spoke boldly of bringing democracy to the Middle East. Now, dragged down by popular discontent over their adventure in Iraq, both have reached the lowest point of their careers.

On May 4, Blair's Labor Party suffered its worst defeats since 1997 in elections for seats on local governing boards, forcing the prime minister to shake up his cabinet amid calls that he step aside soon in favor of Gordon Brown, his expected successor. Bush, with his approval ratings hovering just above 30 percent, has also tried to reinvigorate his sagging popularity by reshuffling top aides.

Blair, desperate to hang on for at least another year, is already viewed as a lame duck -- and Bush also is increasingly seen as one, even though he has nearly three years left in his term.

As the Economist magazine put it earlier this month, the Bush-Blair partnership has become the "axis of feeble."

The two have always been a bit of an odd couple. Bush is a conservative Texan who speaks inelegant English, while Blair is an eloquent speaker who promoted the "third way" of politics with former president Bill Clinton, his transatlantic pal. After their first meeting, when Bush was asked what they had in common, he replied: "We both use Colgate toothpaste."

But Blair always has had a moralistic streak. Clinton, after all, had restrained the more enthusiastic prime minister when he wanted to send ground troops during the conflict over Kosovo. It turned out that Blair's worldview meshed perfectly with the neo-Wilsonian outlook that Bush adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Blair, convinced that it was essential for Britain to align its foreign policy closely with that of the United States, moved quickly to make sure he was in Bush's good graces. Though most European nations opposed Bush's plan for a missile defense system, Blair offered to support it as long as Bush agreed to negotiate a deal with Russia to end the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty -- rather than end it unilaterally, as some administration officials preferred. Bush agreed to Blair's proposal.

In many ways, the partnership has worked that way: Bush sets the course, with Blair at his side occasionally urging a slight turn of the oar. For instance, Blair persuaded Bush to seek U.N. approval before attacking Iraq, and he intervened at crucial moments to get Bush to devote more attention to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In Britain, however, Blair's willingness to accommodate Bush made him the subject of ridicule, earning him the sobriquet "Bush's poodle."

By coincidence or not, the two men held a news conference last night when it was past midnight in London. Indeed, while they still speak frequently by secure videoconference, yesterday's Oval Office visit was their first substantial meeting since September. Blair has also not officially accepted the Congressional Gold Medal that Congress awarded him for support after the Sept. 11 attacks, though he has come to Washington frequently since then.

"One of the reasons Blair is unpopular, even in his own party, is because he has been so close to Bush," said Charles Grant, director of the Center for European Reform in London. He said that in Bush's second term, the administration has worked hard to repair relations with European allies. But he said that while the European foreign policy elite was aware of the change, the general public was not -- and impressions of Bush had hardened.

"The thing public opinion focuses on is Iraq, which is still there," Grant said. The sudden upsurge in violence in Basra, which is controlled by British troops and had been largely quiet until now, has further hurt the prime minister.

Blair, in fact, is among the last of Bush's foreign policy allies still in power, with many ousted by anti-U.S. sentiment.

Peter Riddell, a political writer for the Times of London who wrote a book called "Hug Them Close" on Blair's relationship with Clinton and Bush, said that if Brown replaces Blair, it is unlikely he would suddenly try to distance himself from Bush; that is in part because British leaders have long regarded a close relationship with the United States as critical for Britain. But Grant said that Brown is closer to Labor Party members -- who deeply dislike Bush -- than is Blair, and so Brown would be reluctant to send British troops into any more military campaigns led by Americans.

"Public opinion is quite hostile to this shackling of British foreign policy to the United States," Grant said.

Of course, Iraq may yet turn out to be a success. But neither Bush nor Blair is likely to be in power to enjoy the moment.

DOJ_NMG_0029856

Bush And Blair Concede Errors, But Defend War (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, two leaders badly weakened by the continuing violence in Iraq, acknowledged major misjudgments in the execution of the Iraq war on Thursday night even while insisting that the election of a constitutional government in Baghdad justified their decision to go to war three years ago.

Speaking in subdued, almost chastened, tones at a joint news conference in the East Room, the two leaders steadfastly refused to talk about a schedule for pulling troops out of Iraq — a pressure both men are feeling intently. They stuck to a common formulation that they would pull troops out only as properly trained Iraqi troops progressively took control over more and more territory in the country.

But in an unusual admission of a personal mistake, Mr. Bush said he regretted challenging insurgents in Iraq to "bring it on" in 2003, and said the same about his statement that he wanted Osama bin Laden "dead or alive." Those two statements quickly came to reinforce his image around the world as a cowboy commander in chief. "Kind of tough talk, you know, that sent the wrong signal to people," Mr. Bush said. "I learned some lessons about expressing myself maybe in a little more sophisticated manner." He went on to say that the American military's biggest mistake was the treatment of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison, where photographs of detainees showed them in degrading and abusive conditions. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time," Mr. Bush said, his voice heavy with regret.

Mr. Blair, whose approval levels have sunk even lower than Mr. Bush's, said he particularly regretted the broad decision to strip most members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party of their positions in government and civic life in 2003, leaving most institutions in Iraq shorn of expertise and leadership.

The news conference, in the formal setting of the East Room, was notable for the contrite tone of both leaders. Mr. Bush acknowledged "a sense of consternation" among the American people, driven by the steady drumbeat of American casualties.

The meeting came at a low moment in Mr. Bush's presidency and Mr. Blair's prime ministership, at a time when the decisions that they made to invade Iraq and that they have defended ever since have proved a political albatross for both.

Just as they joined in the drive to war in 2003, the two leaders on Thursday evening seemed joined by a common interest in arguing that things had finally turned around in Iraq. Mr. Blair, who was in Iraq earlier this week, ventured the closest to a prediction about a timetable for disengagement, saying that he thought it was possible that Iraq's new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, was accurate in his prediction that Iraqi forces could control security in all of the country's provinces within 18 months.

But Mr. Bush quickly fell back to his familiar insistence that he would not begin a drawdown until his commanders said it was possible, and he noted that troops were recently called up from Kuwait to help stabilize Baghdad. He said that in the end he would insist on victory over both insurgents and terrorists linked to Al Qaeda, and he dismissed as "press speculation" reports of tentative Pentagon plans to bring American troop levels to about 100,000 by the end of this year. "A loss in Iraq would make this world an incredibly dangerous place," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Bush said he and Mr. Blair had spent "a great deal of time" discussing their next challenge: how to put together the right mix of penalties and incentives to force Iran to suspend the production of uranium and give up a program that both men had said clearly pointed to a desire to build a nuclear bomb.

Mr. Bush bristled at a question about whether he had "ignored back-channel overtures" from the Iranians over possible talks about their nuclear program. Mr. Bush said that "the Iranians walked away from the table" in discussions with three European nations, and that a letter sent to him by Iran's president "didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon." Some in the State Department and even some of Mr. Bush's outside foreign policy advisers have said that Mr. Bush missed a diplomatic opening by deciding not to respond to the letter, though others say it is still not too late.

But the overwhelming sense from the news conference was of two battered leaders who, once confident in their judgments on Iraq, now understood that misjudgments had not only affected their approval ratings, but perhaps their legacies. The British news magazine The Economist pictured the two on a recent cover under the headline "Axis of Feeble."

And while both men sidestepped questions about how their approval ratings were linked to Iraq, at one point Mr. Bush seemed to try to buck up his most loyal ally, who is expected to leave office soon and may be in the midst of his last official visit to Washington, by telling a British reporter, "Don't count him out."

Outside the White House gates, a smattering of protesters gathered, blowing whistles and chanting, "Troops out now."

Mr. Bush called the terrorists in Iraq "totalitarians" and "Islamic fascists," a phrase he has used periodically to give the current struggle a tinge of the last great American-British alliance, during World War II. But he acknowledged that the war in Iraq had taken a significant toll in public opinion. "I mean, when you turn on your TV screen and see innocent people die day in and day out, it affects the mentality of our country," Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0029857

Mr. Blair tried to focus on the current moment, saying that he had heard the complaint that "you went in with this Western concept of democracy, and you didn't understand that their whole culture was different." With a weak smile, he suggested to Mr. Bush that those who voted in Iraq had amounted to "a higher turnout, I have to say — I'm afraid to say I think — than either your election or mine."

Mr. Bush did not budge from his long-stated position that conditions in Iraq and the ability of Iraqi security forces to assume greater responsibilities would dictate whether the United States reduced the 133,000 American forces there. He said he would rely on the recommendations of Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq. In an effort to cajole the new government even while he was praising it, Mr. Bush twice mentioned that it had yet to appoint a defense minister with whom to discuss troop cuts, one of the glaring gaps in the Iraqi cabinet that is symbolic of the continuing struggle over power. "We'll keep the force level there necessary to win," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Blair acknowledged that some of the 260,000 Iraqi security forces, especially the police, suffered from corruption and the influence of militias. But he said a new Iraqi government would be more able than allied officials to cope with these problems.

For those who trace Mr. Bush's own reluctance to acknowledge errors in Iraq, his statements on Thursday night seemed to mark a crossing of a major threshold. In an interview with The New York Times in August 2004, Mr. Bush said that his biggest mistake in Iraq had been underestimating the speed of initial victory over Mr. Hussein's forces, which allowed Iraqi troops to melt back into the cities and towns. When pressed, he said he could think of no other errors.

Over the winter, as public support for the war eroded, he acknowledged other mistakes — failing to plan sufficiently for the occupation and rebuilding of the country, or to execute the plans that had been made. But he described these as tactical mistakes that had been fixed.

His answer on Thursday evening, though, harked back to the two statements — "bring them on" and "dead or alive" — that his wife, Laura, had been particularly critical about. While he had apologized before for the treatment of detainees at Abu Ghraib, his statement on Thursday was his starkest admission to date of the damage that the episode did to the image of the United States.

But Mr. Bush emphasized that American soldiers had been punished for the abuses. "Unlike Iraq, however, under Saddam, the people who committed those acts were brought to justice," he said. Mr. Bush's critics have noted that the prosecutions have focused on low-level soldiers and have not held senior officers accountable.

Mr. Blair, while saying that the coalition had misjudged the de-Baathification process, added: "It's easy to go back over mistakes that we may have made. But the biggest reason why Iraq has been difficult is the determination of our opponents to defeat us. And I don't think we should be surprised at that."

No Quick Troop Reduction In Iraq, Allies Warn (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday acknowledged mistakes in Iraq and cautioned that the formation of a unity government for the country does not mean an immediate drawdown of troops.

“We'll keep the force level there necessary to win,” Bush said at a joint news conference with Blair, a staunch ally in Iraq. “Politics isn't going to make the decision as to the size of our force level.”

Blair, who met in Baghdad on Monday with Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, said it's possible to realize al-Maliki's goal of having Iraqi troops take control of the country's security by the end of 2007. But Blair agreed with Bush that any timetable for withdrawal will be set by conditions on the ground. “Obviously the first thing that we need is a strong government in Baghdad,” he said.

While the two leaders said there had been setbacks and missteps in Iraq, they spoke candidly and at times emotionally as they defended a war they called a critical step toward democracy in the Middle East. Both said deposing Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do.

Bush identified the abuse scandal at the U.S.-operated Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad as the biggest mistake of the war. He also said he regretted some of his own “tough talk,” including saying Osama bin Laden was “wanted dead or alive” and his challenge in the summer of 2003 — “Bring 'em on” — as insurgents in Iraq were stepping up attacks on U.S. troops.

“In certain parts of the world, it was misinterpreted,” he said.

Opposition to the Iraq war has sapped political strength from Bush and Blair. Both face low approval ratings in public opinion polls and discontent within their own parties. Some members of Blair's Labor Party have called on him to step aside in favor of Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the exchequer, or finance minister.

DOJ_NMG_0029858

The embattled allies repeatedly backed each other up in their remarks at the news conference. When a British reporter asked whether this would be Blair's last official trip to Washington, Bush replied, “Don't count him out.” He said he wants Blair to remain in office through the end of his presidency.

Bush said there are about 135,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Asked about reports that the Pentagon would like that number to be about 100,000 by the end of this year, he said it was “some speculation in the press” that hasn't been discussed with him.

While saying “I want our troops out,” Bush also said it is vital to complete the mission of defeating insurgents: “A loss in Iraq would make this world an incredibly dangerous place.”

Blair said “the challenge is still immense” in Iraq but added that it is the duty of the international community to put aside differences over the 2003 invasion and get behind the new government in Iraq.

“These people who are fighting us there know what is at stake,” he said. “The question is, do we?”

Gary Schmitt, a foreign policy analyst with the business-oriented American Enterprise Institute, said that as they serve out the remainders of their terms, “Bush and Blair are both holding onto the same life preserver — Iraq.”

“As Iraq goes,” he said, “so go their ultimate reputations.”

On another matter, Bush said Iran must suspend programs that could lead to development of nuclear weapons. Only then, he said, can negotiations begin for a possible assistance package to Iran.

“If they suspend … then of course we'll talk about ways forward,” Bush said.

Covering A Friend's Back: Leaders Reverse The Roles (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Tony Blair has always served as the world's Bush-whisperer, but at their joint news conference last night, it was almost the reverse. Mr. Blair, the normally silver-tongued prime minister, seemed stiff and defensive, and it was Mr. Bush who tried to smooth things over and help Mr. Blair out.

British political analysts have repeatedly predicted that Mr. Blair, a lame duck whose popularity in Britain has never been lower, will be out of office as early as next year. But when a British reporter actually suggested that this was his last official Washington visit, he looked dismayed and tongue-tied.

Mr. Bush jumped in, saying with a laugh, "Don't count him out, let me tell it to you that way." He also asked the British to give his friend another chance. "I want him to be here so long as I'm the president."

That role reversal was as good a sign as any of how the two friends' political standing has eroded since they made the case together for war in Iraq. Last week even The Economist, a British magazine that has been more favorable to Mr. Blair than most, called his partnership with Mr. Bush the "Axis of Feeble."

In the past, Mr. Blair always raced to Washington to buck up Mr. Bush with his eloquence and aplomb, spending his own political capital to enhance that of the American. Mr. Bush was obviously grateful for his ally's support, yet last night he hinted that if he had to go it alone, he could take it from here — even in the realm of the English language.

Asked what he most regretted, Mr. Bush replied that he was sorry he had used terms like "bring it on" and "dead or alive," and that he had learned to express himself in a "little more sophisticated manner."

It was never an even-steven friendship; Mr. Blair risked his popularity in Britain when he stood by Mr. Bush and supported the war. In return he received gratitude, but little else.

One reason Mr. Blair's reputation is so tattered is his critics dismiss him as a poodle, doing his master's bidding. It did not help that before the war, Mr. Blair was unable to persuade his American friend to seek a second United Nations resolution authorizing military action.

He did not have much luck with other issues important to Europeans, from an effort to double aid to Africa to the need to take steps to avert global warming. (It probably did not help Mr. Blair's morale that "Stuff Happens," a play by David Hare that focuses on the imbalance of power between the White House and 10 Downing St., is on the New York stage.)

No one has been a better bedfellow for George Bush than Tony Blair, but last night the steadfast British prime minister tugged the covers to his side, adding his own, broader agenda to the subject at hand.

He spoke of "the importance of trying to unite the international community behind an agenda that means, for example, action on global poverty in Africa, and issues like Sudan; it means a good outcome to the world trade round, which is vital for the whole of the civilized world, vital for developing countries, but also vital for countries such as ourselves; for progress in the Middle East; and for ensuring that the global values that people are actually struggling for today in Iraq are global values we take everywhere and fight for everywhere that we can in our world today."

Mr. Blair came to Washington to help the president, but this time, perhaps for the first time, he looked like he needed the president's help.

DOJ_NMG_0029859

Bush And Blair Admit To Missteps In Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

President George W. Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday night pointedly refused to set a timetable for withdrawal of troops from Iraq, but acknowledged that they had both made missteps in the country over the last three years since the invasion.

Striking a sombre note during a 45-minute joint press conference at the White House, both leaders stuck to the script on ruling out a clear timetable to exit Iraq. Mr Bush distanced himself from hopes that US troops could fall to 100,000 from 135,000 by the year end. He cautioned: "It is kind of hard to have a conversation [about timing] when you don't have a defence minister [in Iraq]."

Mr Bush, in a rare declaration of personal regret, for the first time said he had been wrong to use the phrase: "bring it on," a reference to the challenge he had once confidently laid down to the insurgents in Iraq.

"Saying 'bring it on', kind of tough talk, you know, that sent the wrong signal to people. I learned some lessons about expressing myself maybe in a little more sophisticated manner, you know. 'Wanted, dead or alive', that kind of talk, I think in certain parts of the world it was misinterpreted."

He added that for the administration in Iraq, the biggest error had been the Abu Ghraib prison. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time."

Mr Blair, while reaffirming the decision to invade Iraq and oust Saddam Hussein, conceded that: "probably in retrospect, though at the time it was very difficult to argue this, we could have done de-Baathification in a more differentiated way than we did."

In a sign of the warmth of the personal relationship between the two men, Mr Bush strongly defended Mr Blair's leadership and hailed his resolve in refusing to be driven by opinion polls about Iraq. "Don't count him out," he said, when asked what he would miss about Mr Blair as prime minister. "I know a man of resolve and vision and courage, and ... my attitude is I want him to be here so long as I'm the president."

Mr Blair, who has faced renewed pressure to stand down as prime minister following the recent local elections in the UK when the Labour party fared poorly, responded with a sheepish look and added: "Probably not wise to say anything more at all."

The two leaders, whose political obituaries will be dictated by the fate of Iraq, both sought to shift the focus to the future and place Iraq in the wider context of reform of the Middle East and democratisation of the region.

Mr Bush said there was "no question that the Iraq war has ... created a sense of consternation here in America," and cited the daily toll of civilian deaths in Iraq. Yet the key question from Americans was: "Can we win? That's what they want to know."

Iran was also a central issue in the talks between the two leaders on Thursday, which will continue on Friday.

Mr Bush declined to comment directly on whether he would agree to the overtures from Iran for direct talks, and instead blamed the Iranian presidents for having "walked away from the table…. we've got to continue to work to convince them that we're serious, that if they want to be isolated from the world, we will work to, you know, to achieve that."

He added that the 17-page letter from the Iranian president sent last month, "didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon. That's the issue at hand."

Britain's Blair To Rally World Support For Iraq (AFP-Y2)

AFP, May 25, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair met with US President George W. Bush on the future of Iraq and to rally world support for the new government in the war-torn country.

Blair, Bush's staunchest ally, is to brief the US leader on talks he held earlier this week with Iraq's new Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The two men, who have seen their popularity ratings drop as a result of the Iraq war, were also to discuss trade issues, Iran, Afghanistan, and the Middle East peace process.

The prime minister's official spokesman said Blair would emphasize "the need for the international community as a whole, including the United Nations, to get behind the democratically elected government of Iraq and support it."

Bush's chief spokesman for his part dampened expectations that the meeting could lead to dramatic announcements such as a timetable for troop withdrawals.

"There aren't going to be people kissing in Times Square tomorrow, but I think what you will have is a very forward-leaning set of discussions about how to proceed forward," spokesman Tony Snow told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0029860

The Bush administration has repeatedly stressed that US troops can only leave Iraq when the country's forces can assure security unaided.

Bush and Blair hope to chart a new course following the formation of a new Iraqi government under the country's new prime minister.

"They're going to be talking about the readiness of Iraqi troops, how to continue the business of training Iraqi troops, professionalizing them, getting the government institutions in place," and related matters, Snow said.

US and British officials are relying on the new government in Baghdad to help extricate them from an increasingly unpopular war that has left them weakened at home and which is costing both governments billions of dollars each month.

The Iraq venture has also had a higher than expected death toll. In addition to the tens of thousands of Iraqis believed to have been killed since the 2003 invasion to topple Saddam Hussein, Washington has lost 2,460 soldiers and Britain has lost 111.

The United States has about 130,000 soldiers in Iraq. Britain has the second largest contingent, some 8,000 troops.

As the death toll rises, both Blair and Bush have seen their popularity ratings drop. Both need to show their constituencies that there is some movement forward in Iraq, observers say.

Bush, whose popularity has sunk to 31 percent, is also seeking to minimize Iraq war fallout ahead of legislative elections in November that could hurt his Republican Party.

There is speculation that Blair's trip could be his last to the United States as prime minister, especially after the drubbing his Labour Party suffered in local elections earlier this month and mounting calls for him to step down.

Blair, prime minister since 1997, has pledged to resign before the end of his third term, which is due to expire in May 2010 at the latest.

Following their meeting, Blair and Bush were to hold an evening press conference during prime television viewing hours in the United States. The two leaders are to meet again Friday after Blair delivers a speech on foreign policy at Georgetown University.

Bush, Blair Admit Errors In Iraq War (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair yesterday acknowledged setbacks and missteps in the Iraqi war, but both refused to set a timeline for withdrawing troops, instead voicing optimism that a new unity government will be best able to end insurgent violence and establish stability.

In a rare admission, Mr. Bush said during the hourlong press conference that he regretted once having taunted loyalists to former dictator Saddam Hussein and insurgents by saying "bring it on" and calling for Osama bin Laden "dead or alive" and the Abu Ghraib prison abuse by U.S. soldiers.

Mr. Bush said last night that the "bring it on" remark was "tough talk that sent the wrong signal," but both he and Mr. Blair were steadfast in arguing that removing the Iraqi dictator from power was necessary.

"We did not find the weapons of mass destruction that we all believed were there, and that's raised questions about whether the sacrifice in Iraq has been worth it. Despite setbacks and missteps, I strongly believe we did, and are doing, the right thing," the president said.

Mr. Blair traveled to Iraq earlier this week to see firsthand the government and Cabinet that were formed over the weekend, and yesterday's meeting was a chance for him to share his impressions with Mr. Bush.

"Something fundamental changed in Iraq last weekend," the president said.

Standing in the White House East Room, both leaders said coalition troops are winning in Iraq, and each said the unity government made up of Sunnis, Shi'ites and Kurds is best able to establish security in a country being ripped about by insurgent terrorist attacks.

"I don't think, in one sense, it's very surprising that it is both difficult and taking time," Mr. Blair said. "But I think that they do know that this is of vital importance for them to succeed. And I think you may find that it is easier for Iraqis to do this themselves and take some of these measures necessary than it is for us."

The White House spent much of yesterday downplaying expectations that the two leaders would make a major announcement about troop withdrawals. But that was the subject of most of the questions, from both the U.S. and British press, and Mr. Bush said he does not plan to keep U.S. troops in Iraq any longer than necessary.

"Listen, I want our troops out, understand what it means to have troops in harm's way," he said. "But I also understand that it is vital that we do the job, that we complete the mission. But it has been tough, it has been really tough."

DOJ_NMG_0029861

Deeming reports that the Pentagon hoped to reduce the 131,000 troops in Iraq to 100,000 by year's end "speculation in the press," Mr. Bush repeated his longtime stance.

"We'll keep the force level there necessary to win."

The president said he would continue to rely on his commanders on the ground to determine when Iraq is stable enough for troops to withdraw and said he will work with the new unity government toward that goal.

"First of all, we're going to work with our partners in Iraq, the new government, to determine the best way forward in achieving an objective, which is an Iraq that can govern itself and sustain itself and defend itself," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Blair, who met earlier this week with Iraq's new prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, said he felt after the meeting that "the challenge is still immense, but I also came away thinking more certain than ever that we should rise to it."

Mr. al-Maliki said on Wednesday that Iraqi police forces will be capable of taking control of all security within 18 months. And Mr. Blair said that he found the assertion "possible."

Each leader has tumbled in his country's polls, with Mr. Bush now facing the possibility that Republicans could lose control of one or both congressional chambers and Mr. Blair seeking to build a legacy as the end of his tenure approaches. Both in Britain and the United States, calls are increasing to begin troop withdrawals.

But neither would back down from a commitment to see the war to its end, and Mr. Blair said the new Iraqi government wants "us to stay until the job is done."

He also said coalition nations need to understand the dedication it takes to fight.

"We should have the same faith and confidence in our determination to succeed as [the insurgents] have in their determination to make us fail," the British leader said.

He called on the international community to step up and bolster the new government.

"I think after these three years and the democratic process working and producing this government, then it is our duty, but it is also the duty of the whole of the international community to get behind this government and support it," Mr. Blair said.

Mr. Bush said the United Nations needs to step up its support of the fledgling government.

"The United Nations ought to be clear about its desire to liberate people from the clutches of tyranny. That's what the United Nations ought to be doing, as far as I'm concerned," he said.

The British prime minister also voiced his regrets in answer to a question posed to both leaders. He said he regretted the way in which Saddam's Ba'ath Party political allies were purged from the Iraqi military and government soon after the fall of Baghdad. Mr. Blair also said his allies seriously underestimated the insurgency.

The chance of a major insurgency "should have been very obvious to us" from the beginning, he said.

For his part, Mr. Bush also cited the abuse of prisoners at Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison as the "biggest mistake" in the U.S. conduct of the war in Iraq.

"I think the biggest mistake that's happened so far, at least from our country's involvement, is Abu Ghraib," Mr. Bush said. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time."

On Iran, Mr. Bush said recent overtures by that nation's leaders, including what he called "16 or 17 single-spaced typed pages" letter he received from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, don't answer the fundamental questions about its nuclear program.

"He didn't address the issue of whether or not they're going to continue to press for a nuclear weapon," Mr. Bush said. "That's the issue at hand."

He said he and Mr. Blair are committed to a diplomatic solution, and will try to convince other key countries to press the issue through the U.N. Security Council. He also held out the chance of further incentives to entice Iran to forgo its nuclear program but said Iran must take concrete steps first.

"The Iranians walked away from the table," he said. "They're the ones who made the decision, and the choice is theirs. Now, if they would like to see an enhanced package, the first thing they've got to do is suspend their operations, for the good of the world."

Bush Says Early Iraq Troop Cuts Unlikely (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that the formation of a new government in Iraq marked a turning point for the war-torn country, but not one that would allow for an earlier drawdown of U.S. and coalition forces.

After a White House meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Bush repeated his position that he would order a reduction in forces only after military commanders told him that the country could be defended by the growing Iraqi military and police forces.

DOJ_NMG_0029862

"The American people need to know that we'll keep the forces there necessary to win," Bush told an evening news conference. "It's important for the American people to know that politics isn't going to make the decision as to the size of our force level."

He dismissed reports that the administration intended to reduce the number of troops in Iraq to 100,000 from 131,000 by year's end as no more than "speculation in the press."

The meeting of the two wartime allies had given rise to hope that they might signal the beginning of a troop drawdown long sought on both sides of the Atlantic. But the leaders instead indicated that they still saw huge risks for Iraq, where a Sunni Arab-driven insurgency rages on and sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims is on the rise.

Bush said his commanders would recommend only a troop reduction "based on conditions on the ground."

"I know I keep saying that," he said. "And it probably bores you that I keep giving you the same answer. But I haven't changed my opinion."

Blair suggested that the leaders might make no decision on troop levels for several months while they waited to see how effectively Iraqi forces stood up to their attackers.

"You will find probably, over the next few months, there will be a real attempt by the anti-democratic forces to test them very, very strongly," Blair said, responding to a question about potential troop withdrawals.

Iraq's new leader, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, said this week that he wanted Iraqi troops to take over responsibility for the nation's security as soon as possible. Maliki said he believed Iraqis could assume a lead role by the end of 2007.

Blair cast some skepticism on Maliki's prediction, saying it was possible, but insisting that Iraqi control was contingent on the new government quickly establishing a strong grip on the country, and on the ability of the Iraqi troops to crack down on insurgents.

A decision to maintain troop levels at their current size may be unwelcome news for Republicans, who face midterm elections in November with their party's poll numbers sagging. Delaying the decision on troop withdrawals also poses difficulty for Bush and Blair, whose political fortunes have been badly damaged by the war.

The meeting of the two weakened leaders drew ridicule from some parts of the British press; the Economist magazine referred to the pair as an "axis of feeble." Blair is expected to leave office by next summer and is widely viewed as a lame duck. Some observers have noted that this visit could be Blair's last to the White House as prime minister.

Bush and Blair were asked pointedly about "missteps and mistakes" that they most regretted during the war.

Bush said he considered the Abu Ghraib prison abuses to be the biggest U.S. mistake in Iraq. "We've been paying for that for a long time," he said.

The president also said he regretted some of his own "tough talk," including the very phraseology that initially endeared him to Americans after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He said he regretted responding to early reports of the rising Iraqi insurgency by saying, "Bring it on." He also lamented his use of the phrase "dead or alive" in describing how he would one day capture Osama bin Laden and others. Bush has mentioned those regrets before.

For his part, Blair said the expulsion of members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from the Iraqi government could have been handled better. Many people argue that expelling low- and mid-level party members alienated Sunni Arabs and fueled the insurgency.

Bush has in the past derided opponents of the war as isolationists, but he was more conciliatory Thursday. "No question that the Iraq war has, you know, created a sense of consternation here in America," he said.

But even with surveys showing greater support for a withdrawal or reduction in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, Bush said that most Americans would not support pulling out.

Military commanders and other U.S. officials have said privately that they hope for a substantial troop withdrawal this year. Some suggested that the U.S. troop level could drop to about 100,000 by year's end.

But in recent months, as sectarian divisions have become more deadly, such talk has appeared to subside.

Blair, who met with Army Gen. George W. Casey, commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, during a surprise visit to Baghdad this week, said commanders were concerned that the new Iraqi government could face a surge in violence as Iraqi forces began to take over more territory from U.S., British and other coalition troops.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld said this month that he expected a recommendation on troop levels from Casey once Maliki's government was in place. However, Bush said Casey was awaiting the installation of a new Iraqi defense minister, who has yet to be selected. The president said any reductions might not come until the new ministry had developed capabilities "to enable the Iraqis to take more of the fight."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

DOJ_NMG_0029863

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Sham-nesty

Rep. J.D. Hayworth makes clear what's so "onerous" about White House immigration policy. The Arizona Republican offered a point-by-point deconstruction of an explanation of the policy made by White House spokesman Tony Snow.

"Illegal aliens will have to 'pay taxes': That's no penalty; they're supposed to pay taxes. In fact, according to Sen. Chuck Grassley, under Bush's plan illegals would have the option to only have to pay three of their last five years in back taxes," Mr. Hayworth observed in the National Review Online yesterday.

"They have to 'keep their nose clean' : Big deal. So does everybody else.

"They have to get a tamper-proof ID card: Oh, the humanity!

"They'll have to stay employed: But isn't that why they came here, to do jobs Americans won't?

"They'll have to learn English: That's a benefit to the illegal."

Mr. Hayworth continued, "Most of these 'benchmarks' would be required of any legal immigrant. They are in no way burdensome, yet Tony Snow makes them sound almost oppressive. The only real punishment on the entire list is the fine. Know what it is? A measly $2,000 payable in two $1,000 installments. When you consider what illegals get for their two grand, it's the deal of a lifetime."

He concludes, "The American people see through the White House spin. They know an amnesty when they see it. And the president's plan is an amnesty."

Off the deep end

British leftist George Galloway has taken his opposition to the Iraq war to the point of saying that the assassination of British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be "morally justified."

In an interview with GQ, the men's fashion magazine asked him: "Would the assassination of, say, Tony Blair by a suicide bomber — if there were no other casualties — be justified as revenge for the war on Iraq?"

Mr. Galloway, a member of Parliament for the Respect party, responded, "Yes, it would be morally justified. I am not calling for it — but if it happened, it would be of a wholly different moral order to the events of 7/7," referring to the deadly al Qaeda attacks on the London mass-transit system last year.

Mr. Blair's assassination "would be entirely logical and explicable. And morally equivalent to ordering the deaths of thousands of innocent people in Iraq — as Blair did," he said.

Labor member of Parliament Stephen Pound called Mr. Galloway's words "disgraceful and truly twisted."

"These comments take my breath away," he told the Sun. "Every time you think he can't sink any lower, he goes and stuns you again."

The Sunday Times reported Mr. Blair's reaction: "No. 10 made no comment."

Fleet Street also reported on Mr. Galloway's doings this week: a visit to Cuba to make nice with dictator Fidel Castro.

"Mr. Galloway shocked panelists on a live television discussion show in Havana by emerging on set mid-transmission to offer passionate support for Castro. Looking approvingly into each others' eyes, the pair embraced," reports the Independent's Oliver Duff.

Ready to rumble

Young Republicans are looking out for their party. The College Republican National Committee (CRNC) announced yesterday that 275 membership chapters were established on campuses nationwide last year — joining 1,000 existing chapters.

"The success of college Republicans this spring is a reflection of the organization and initiative that distinguishes the Republican Party," said the group's chairman, Paul Gourley. "We are determined to remain the well-organized grass-roots force that wins elections for the GOP in November.

"We've witnessed a lot of legislative victories thus far: the confirmation of many sound federal judges, and tax cuts at a variety of levels. But there's still a lot of work to do," Mr. Gourley added. "We need to lock Republican majorities in the fall to carry out our full agenda."

Young GOPers are already "on the ground," he said.

One noteworthy former member applauds their vigor.

"Grass-roots initiatives have surged and marked the College Republican National Committee as a compelling force in the current political fight," observed Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform who was a field director for the organization in the early 1980s.

A green Bush

"Environmentalists should thank President Bush for breathing new — albeit indignant — life into the stagnant climate-change debate when he announced in 2001 that he wouldn't pursue ratification of Kyoto. New policy opportunities opened up, and people went back to the creative drawing boards," Samuel Thernstrom of the American Enterprise Institute notes in a story that plumbs Al Gore's global-warming-destroys-the-earth movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," now in theaters.

DOJ_NMG_0029864

"We're taking small steps in the right direction, but activists are more enamored with their politics, which dictate that anything that Bush supports must be wrong — than with spurring these nascent efforts on. Clinton and Gore continue to mislead Americans by telling us that the solutions are simple and cheap — all we need is political will to implement them. Nothing could be further from the truth: the answers to climate change are expensive and elusive; they will be found in the Los Alamos labs, not the halls of Congress."

"We can build fuel-cell cars now — for $1 million. When we figure out how to sell them for $30,000, we won't need an international treaty to get people to buy them. Almost every major car company in the world is frantically trying to unlock that puzzle and — are you sitting down? — George W. Bush, the ex-oil man who once mocked Al Gore's fascination with green cars, is pouring billions of federal dollars into the effort."

What's to come

Look for congressional Republicans to "dish up a plate of 'red meat' social issues they hope will motivate their conservative base for the Nov. 7 elections," predicts Judy Holland of Hearst Newspapers.

Next week, Republican senators will push proposals on hot-button issues — including constitutional amendments to ban homosexual "marriage" and to outlaw flag burning, along with legislation to clamp down on minors who cross state lines for abortions and thus evade parental-notification restrictions in their home states.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, who is behind the flag-burning proposal, concedes his chances aren't good, but said the party's base "would get mad if we didn't try."

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, said Republicans will be satisfied only if they think that the party leadership "really went after these measures. If they feel they have paid lip service, then I think the leadership is going to pay for it."

Standing By Stand-Up Iraqis (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

I am often asked why I don't just give up on Iraq and pronounce it a lost cause. It would certainly make my job (and marriage) easier.

What holds me back are scenes like the one related in last Sunday's Times story from Baghdad about the Iraqi Parliament's vote to approve the country's new cabinet. Our story noted that during the Iraqi parliamentary session, the Sunni party leader Saleh Mutlaq, a former Baathist, stood up and started denouncing the decision by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to have Parliament vote on the new cabinet even though he hadn't yet filled the key security posts.

At that point, another Sunni politician, Mithal al-Alousi, told Mr. Mutlaq to sit down. "Iraqi blood is being spilled every day," Mr. Alousi said. It was time to move forward. When Mr. Mutlaq pressed on with his denunciations, Mr. Alousi "pulled him down into his chair," The Times reported. That was a gutsy move — live on Iraqi TV. Many Sunni insurgents may not like what Mr. Alousi did, but he did it anyway.

As long as I see Iraqis ready to take a stand like that, I think we have to stand with them. When we don't see Iraqis taking the risk to build a progressive Iraq, then it is indeed time to pack and go. That moment may come soon. It's hard to tell. I won't hesitate to say so — but not yet.

In such confusing times I find it useful to listen to someone steeped in the history of the Arab world, someone like the Egyptian sociologist and democracy campaigner Saad Eddin Ibrahim, who was visiting Washington with a human rights group from the Carter Center.

Mr. Ibrahim compares the U.S. invasion of Iraq to Napoleon's invasion of Egypt in 1798, which punched the first big hole through which modernity could seep into the Arab world. It was the key ruler of Egypt after the Napoleonic invasion, Muhammad Ali, who started sending students to Europe, introduced secular education and ushered in a mini-Arab renaissance that culminated with the first Egyptian parliament, elected in 1866.

What you are seeing in Iraq today is the "hard labor" of nation building in a country that has gone through almost 50 years of tyrannical rule, Mr. Ibrahim said. It is a naturally messy process, much messier than Eastern Europe's, with the outcome uncertain. "Everyone with a grievance for 50 years there is now breathing freely and wanting to act on their newfound freedom," he added.

The reason that the violence in Iraq is so intense — mass executions, mosques blown up — is in part because of all these pent-up grievances. But in part it is also because two very entrenched forces in that part of the world — the theocrats and the autocrats; that is, the Qaedas and the Arab regimes surrounding Iraq, even the "pro-America" ones — are deeply worried that we might succeed.

DOJ_NMG_0029865

"The theocrats fear modernity taking root in Iraq," in the heart of the Arab world, "and the autocrats fear democracy taking root there," Mr. Ibrahim said. Therefore, they are pulling out all the stops to make Iraq fail. America, Britain and their Iraqi allies must fail, the theocrats and autocrats say, so the Arab theocrats can tell their people that modernity is not an option and so the Arab autocrats can tell their people that democracy is not an option. The future of the Arab world is at stake here.

Nevertheless, thanks to the incredible sacrifice of U.S. and British soldiers, Iraqi elections have been held, a parliament convened. The process is indeed messy, and, given all the shameful mistakes by the Bush team, much deadlier than it had to be. But Mr. Ibrahim, who spent from 2000 to 2003 in an Egyptian prison for pushing free and fair elections in Egypt, is no starry-eyed dreamer, and he believes there's a decent chance that in a few years, Iraq will make its transition, build up an army and settle down.

"Every major transformation since Napoleon in this part of the world has been the function of an external jolt," Mr. Ibrahim said.

The best thing the Americans could do now to help this process is to move into the background in Iraq, he added. Let the Iraqis invite our help, but let's get out of their faces wherever possible. Also, Mr. Ibrahim said, "We need America to get back on the moral high ground that it has slid down from since 9/11."

President Bush may have moral clarity when speaking about freedom and democracy in the Arab world, but he has no moral authority. He lost it all by coddling Arab oil regimes and by tolerating the Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo prisons, which should be closed down immediately.

"So you have your homework to do, and we have ours," Mr. Ibrahim said.

Military Expected To Report Marines Killed Iraqi Civilians (NYT)

By Thom Shanker, Eric Schmitt And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

This article is by Thom Shanker, Eric Schmitt and Richard A. Oppel Jr.

WASHINGTON, May 25 — A military investigation into the deaths of two dozen Iraqis last November is expected to find that a small number of marines in western Iraq carried out extensive, unprovoked killings of civilians, Congressional, military and Pentagon officials said Thursday.

Two lawyers involved in discussions about individual marines' defenses said they thought the investigation could result in charges of murder, a capital offense. That possibility and the emerging details of the killings have raised fears that the incident could be the gravest case involving misconduct by American ground forces in Iraq.

Officials briefed on preliminary results of the inquiry said the civilians killed at Haditha, a lawless, insurgent-plagued city deep in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, did not die from a makeshift bomb, as the military first reported, or in cross-fire between marines and attackers, as was later announced. A separate inquiry has begun to find whether the events were deliberately covered up.

Evidence indicates that the civilians were killed during a sustained sweep by a small group of marines that lasted three to five hours and included shootings of five men standing near a taxi at a checkpoint, and killings inside at least two homes that included women and children, officials said.

That evidence, described by Congressional, Pentagon and military officials briefed on the inquiry, suggested to one Congressional official that the killings were "methodical in nature."

Congressional and military officials say the Naval Criminal Investigative Service inquiry is focusing on the actions of a Marine Corps staff sergeant serving as squad leader at the time, but that Marine officials have told members of Congress that up to a dozen other marines in the unit are also under investigation. Officials briefed on the inquiry said that most of the bullets that killed the civilians were now thought to have been "fired by a couple of rifles," as one of them put it.

The killings were first reported by Time magazine in March, based on accounts from survivors and human rights groups, and members of Congress have spoken publicly about the episode in recent days. But the new accounts from Congressional, military and Pentagon officials added significant new details to the picture. All of those who discussed the case had to be granted anonymity before they would talk about the findings emerging from the investigation.

A second, parallel inquiry was ordered by the second-ranking general in Iraq to examine whether any marines on the ground at Haditha, or any of their superior officers, tried to cover up the killings by filing false reports up the chain of command. That inquiry, conducted by an Army officer assigned to the Multinational Corps headquarters in Iraq, is expected to report its findings in coming days.

DOJ_NMG_0029866

In an unusual sign of high-level concern, the commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, flew from Washington to Iraq on Thursday to give a series of speeches to his forces re-emphasizing compliance with international laws of armed conflict, the Geneva Conventions and the American military's own rules of engagement.

"Recent serious allegations concerning actions of marines in combat have caused me concern," General Hagee said in a statement issued upon his departure. The statement did not mention any specific incident.

The first official report from the military, issued on Nov. 20, said that "a U.S. marine and 15 Iraqi civilians were killed yesterday from the blast of a roadside bomb" and that "immediately following the bombing, gunmen attacked the convoy with small-arms fire."

Military investigators have since uncovered a far different set of facts from what was first reported, partly aided by marines who are cooperating with the inquiry and partly guided by reports filed by a separate unit that arrived to gather intelligence and document the attack; those reports contradicted the original version of the marines, Pentagon officials said.

One senior Defense Department official who has been briefed on the initial findings, when asked how many of the 24 dead Iraqis were killed by the improvised bomb as initially reported, paused and said, "Zero."

While Haditha was rife with violence and gunfire that day, the marines, who were assigned to the Third Battalion, First Marines, and are now back at Camp Pendleton, Calif., "never took what would constitute hostile fire of a seriously threatening nature," one Pentagon official said.

Women and children were among those killed, as well as five men who had been traveling in a taxi near the bomb, which killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas of El Paso.

Although investigators are still piecing together the string of deaths, Congressional and Pentagon officials said the five men in the taxi either were pulled out or got out at a Marine checkpoint and were shot.

The deaths of those in the taxi, and inside two nearby houses, were not the result of a quick and violent firefight, according to officials who had been briefed on the inquiry.

"This was not a burst of fire, but a sustained operation over several hours, maybe five hours," one official said. Forensic evidence gathered from the houses where Iraqi civilians died is also said to contradict reports that the marines had to overcome hostile fire to storm the homes.

Members of the House and Senate briefed on the Haditha shootings by senior Marine officers, including General Hagee and Brig. Gen. John F. Kelly, the Marine legislative liaison, voiced concerns Thursday about the seriousness of the accusations.

Representative John Kline, a Minnesota Republican who is a retired Marine colonel, said that the allegations indicated that "this was not an accident. This was direct fire by marines at civilians." He added, "This was not an immediate response to an attack. This would be an atrocity."

The deaths, and the role of the marines in those deaths, is being viewed with such alarm that senior Marine Corps officers briefed members of Congress last week and again on Wednesday and Thursday.

The briefings were in part an effort to prevent the kind of angry explosion from Capitol Hill that followed news of detainee abuse by American military jailers at Abu Ghraib prison, which had been quietly under investigation for months before the details of the abuse were leaked to the news media. "If the accounts as they have been alleged are true, the Haditha incident is likely the most serious war crime that has been reported in Iraq since the beginning of the war," said John Sifton, of Human Rights Watch. "Here we have two dozen civilians being killed — apparently intentionally. This isn't a gray area. This is a massacre."

Three Marine officers — the battalion commander and two company commanders in Haditha at the time — have been relieved of duty, although official statements have declined to link that action to the investigation.

Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican who heads the Armed Services Committee, said he expected senators would review investigators' evidence, including photographs by military photographers that Mr. Warner said were "taken as a matter of routine in Iraq on operations of this nature when there's loss of life."

Lawyers who have been in conversations with the marines under investigation stressed the chaotic situation in Haditha at the time of the killings. And they expect that the defense will stress that insurgents often hide among civilians, that Haditha on the day of the shootings was suffering a wave of fluid insurgent attacks and that the marines responded to high levels of hostile action aimed at them.

Much of the area around Haditha is controlled by Sunni Arab insurgents who have made the city one of the deadliest in Iraq for American troops. On Aug. 1, three months before the massacre, insurgents ambushed and killed six Marine snipers moving through Haditha on foot. Insurgents released a video after the ambush that appeared to show the attack, and the mangled and burned body of a dead serviceman. Then, two days later, 14 marines were killed when their armored vehicle was destroyed by a roadside bomb near the southern edge of the city.

The Marines also disclosed this week that a preliminary inquiry had found "sufficient information" to recommend a criminal probe into the killing of an Iraqi civilian on April 26 near Hamandiyah, a village west of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0029867

Probe Finds Marines Killed Unarmed Iraqi Civilians (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Marines from Camp Pendleton wantonly killed unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, and then tried to cover up the slayings in the insurgent stronghold of Haditha, military investigations have found.

Officials who have seen the findings of the investigations said the filing of criminal charges, including some murder counts, was expected, which would make the Nov. 19 incident the most serious case of alleged U.S. war crimes in Iraq.

An administrative inquiry overseen by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell found that several infantry Marines fatally shot as many as 24 Iraqis and that other Marines either failed to stop them or filed misleading or blatantly false reports.

The report concludes that a dozen Marines acted improperly after a roadside bomb explosion killed a fellow Marine, Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas.

Looking for insurgents, the Marines entered several homes and began firing their weapons, according to the report.

In its initial statement to the media, the Marine Corps said the Iraqi civilians were killed either by an insurgent bomb or by crossfire between Marines and insurgents.

But after Time magazine obtained pictures showing dead women and children and quoted Iraqis who said the attack was unprovoked, the Marine Corps backtracked on its explanation and called for an investigation.

The Marines, many of whom were on their third deployment to Iraq, are part of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment of the 1st Marine Division.

The battalion commander and two company commanders were relieved of duty last month because, a spokesman said, Maj. Gen. Richard Natonski, commanding general of the division, had lost confidence in their leadership.

The Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which conducted a separate investigation, is expected to call for criminal charges, including murder, negligent homicide, dereliction of duty and filing a false report.

After the roadside bomb killed Terrazas, the Marines conducted a sweep of the area, a common military tactic. But instead of following the Geneva Convention rules about identifying combatants, the Marines killed Iraqis in homes and five sitting in a vehicle, reportedly without provocation, the investigation found.

Bargewell's report is to be given soon to Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top operational commander in Baghdad. Chiarelli will make recommendations involving leadership, training and filing reports. Compensation has already been paid to families of some of the slain Iraqis.

Marine officials also confirmed Thursday that an investigation had been opened into an April 26 incident in which troops allegedly killed a civilian in the town of Hamandiya, west of Baghdad.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael Hagee flew to Iraq on Thursday to talk to Marines and remind them of long-standing orders to protect Iraqi civilians and follow the Geneva Convention.

Hagee is emphasizing "the importance of our core values" and reminding troops about the laws of war, a Marine Corps statement said.

The Marine commandant planned to read to officers and enlisted personnel a statement reminding them: "We must regulate force and violence, we only damage property that must be damaged, and we protect the noncombatants we find on the battlefield."

Hagee last week briefed key congressional leaders on the upcoming report. One of those, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a retired Marine colonel, said later that Marines "killed innocent civilians in cold blood."

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, held a news conference last Friday to plead with reporters, politicians and the public not to judge U.S. troops by the action "of one squad, in one city, on one morning."

The Marines have had more than 700 personnel killed in Iraq.

In his statement, Hagee said that Marines should overcome the tendency "of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life" in their dealings with Iraqi civilians.

General To Teach Rules Of War (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The Marine Corps' top general yesterday left Washington for Iraq, where he will lecture Marines on the importance of fighting Iraqi insurgents and foreign terrorists by the rules.

DOJ_NMG_0029868

Gen. Michael W. Hagee's trip comes as members of a Marine battalion, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif., are under investigation in the deaths of more than 20 Iraqi civilians, some of them women and children, in the town of Haditha.

The fact that the Marine commandant is dedicating his trip to reinforcing the need to refrain from war crimes underscores the severity of what happened Nov. 19 in Haditha, a known haven for insurgents and al Qaeda in Iraq fighters who regularly attack Marines.

Gen. Hagee said in a message to his troops, "We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force. We use lethal force only when justified, proportional and, most importantly, lawful. ... We protect the noncombatants we find on the battlefield."

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and a decorated Marine veteran, told reporters last week that Marines killed "innocent civilians in cold blood." Sources close to the investigation told The Washington Times that defense attorneys expect one or more Marines to be charged with murder.

A Marine Corps statement announced Gen. Hagee's departure for Iraq, where he will "reinforce the ideals, values and standards for which Marines have been known for more than 200 years."

The Corps is bracing for the worst, congressional sources say, and are regularly briefing members of Congress. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) will likely complete its investigation this summer.

Senate Armed Services Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, has been briefed by Gen. Hagee and yesterday convened a closed committee briefing from Brig. Gen. John Kelly.

"There are established facts that incidents of a very serious nature did take place," Mr. Warner told reporters afterwards." He spoke of "very, very serious allegations, and there have been facts substantiated to date to underpin those allegations as to what occurred."

Gen. Hagee said in his message that "To a Marine, honor is more than just honesty. It means having uncompromising personal integrity and being accountable for all actions. To most Marines, the most difficult part of courage is not the raw physical courage that we have seen so often on today's battlefield. It is rather the moral courage to do the 'right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines."

The events in Haditha began when a Marine was killed by an improvised explosive device (IED) while on patrol. The Marines -- members of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment -- launched quick, house-to-house raids to try to find the insurgents who made and planted it. During the operation, perhaps as many as two dozen Iraqi civilians were killed.

Haditha lies west of Baghdad, in the Anbar province, which is patrolled by about 20,000 Marines who face constant attacks. In the fog of combat, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish Iraqi civilians from hardened al Qaeda terrorists.

"The nature of this war with its ruthless enemies and its complex and dangerous battlefield will continue to challenge us in the commitment to our core values," Gen. Hagee said. "We must be strong and help one another to measure up. The war will also test our commitment to our belief in the rule of law."

As the Haditha investigation was in full bore, the Marines announced this week a second criminal probe in the death of an Iraqi civilian last month near Baghdad.

Marine Corps To Probe Iraq Civilian Deaths (AP)

By Robert Burns

The AP, May 25, 2006

The top Marine general said Thursday that he feared, based on two recent cases of alleged killings of civilians in Iraq, that some Marines could become "indifferent to the loss of a human life." His office announced that he was enroute to Iraq to reinforce the Corps' standards of behavior in combat.

"We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force. We use lethal force only when justified, proportional and, most importantly, lawful," Gen. Michael W. Hagee wrote in a statement issued by his office.

His statement and the announcement of his trip to Iraq came just hours after the Marine command in Iraq disclosed a criminal investigation into allegations that an unspecified number of Marines killed an Iraqi civilian west of Baghdad on April 26. Iraqis made the charge during a meeting with Marine officers on May 1.

"Many of our Marines have been involved in life or death combat or have witnessed the loss of their fellow Marines, and the effects of these events can be numbing," Hagee wrote. "There is the risk of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life, as well as bringing dishonor upon ourselves."

A spokesman for Hagee, Col. David Lapan, said the general had scheduled the trip long ago but in light of the latest allegations he decided to use the visit as an opportunity to reinforce Marine Corps values and standards.

"To a Marine, honor is more than just honesty; it means having uncompromising personal integrity and being accountable for all actions," Hagee said in his statement. He urged all Marines to have the moral courage to "do the `right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines."

DOJ_NMG_0029869

He referred to "recent serious allegations about actions of Marines in combat," but he did not specifically cite the two cases - one from last November and the other in April - of alleged killings of civilians.

In Wednesday's announcement of the latest criminal investigation, Marine officials said a preliminary investigation by Multinational Force-West, headed by Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, had found enough information to recommend an investigation by the Naval Criminal Investigation Service.

The statement provided no details about the alleged killing, including either the gender or age of the victim. It said "several service members" from the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, which is based in the Fallujah area about 40 miles west of Baghdad, were suspected of involvement. They were "removed from operations" and sent back to the United States pending the results of the criminal investigation, it said.

A criminal investigation also is under way in connection with Marines from another battalion who are accused of killing at least 15 civilians, including women and children, last November in Haditha, 140 miles northwest of Baghdad.

The military initially described the Haditha encounter as an ambush during a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol that involved a roadside bombing in which a Marine died, followed by a firefight. However, residents of the neighborhood maintained that only U.S. forces were shooting after the explosion.

Videotape aired by an Arab television station showed images purportedly taken in the aftermath of the encounter: a bloody bedroom floor, bullet holes in walls and bodies of women and children. An Iraqi human rights group called for an investigation of what it described as another deadly mistake that had harmed civilians.

The military began its administrative investigation to review whether the Marines involved had lied about what happened. A House committee will review the military's investigation next month.

On May 17, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a decorated former Marine, said the toll in the Haditha attack was far worse than originally reported and that U.S. troops killed innocent women and children "in cold blood." He said that nearly twice as many people were killed than first reported, maintaining that U.S. forces are "overstretched and overstressed" by the war in Iraq.

Last August, the Marine Corps announced a criminal investigation into the death of the cousin of Iraq's ambassador to Washington, Samir al-Sumaidaie, who was shot and killed during a search of his home in Haditha on June 25.

No announcement has been made about the findings of the investigation.

Top Marine General To Stress Corps' Values On Trip To Iraq (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Marine Corps' top general left for Iraq on Thursday to remind Marines that it's important to maintain their core values of "honor, courage and commitment" even in the middle of a bitter counterinsurgency where the differences between right and wrong, friend and foe, are often blurred.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael W. Hagee's departure came a day after Marines in Iraq announced a criminal investigation into allegations that Marines killed an Iraqi civilian near the town of Hamandiyah, west of Baghdad, on April 26. Investigators are also probing a Nov. 19 incident in which a group of Marines allegedly shot and killed 23 Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha, according to survivors interviewed by Knight Ridder.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told reporters on Thursday that in both cases "there are established facts that incidents of a very serious nature did take place." Hagee briefed Warner and the committee's ranking Democrat, Carl Levin of Michigan, about the investigations on Wednesday. The full committee was briefed on Thursday.

Warner said he would reserve judgment until he and other members of Congress "have a full set of facts." He disclosed that there were possibly photos taken of the scene where the killings occurred.

A person familiar with the investigation said the photos were taken after the incident and didn't show actual wrongdoing by troops.

But the person, who asked not be identified because the investigation was still ongoing, said that if the photos are tied to the killings, they "could be very damaging to the U.S. effort in Iraq."

Marine Corps officials said Hagee's trip had been scheduled months ago, but that he intended to use the trip to deliver prepared remarks at Marine bases in Iraq and on every Marine base in the United States reminding troops of their obligations under the rules of war.

"Many of our Marines have been involved in life or death combat or have witnessed the loss of their fellow Marines, and the effects of these events can be numbing," Hagee will say, according to a copy of the remarks. "There is the risk of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life, as well as bringing dishonor upon ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0029870

Hagee said all Marines have been taught how to conduct themselves properly on the battlefield and have been trained to follow the Geneva Convention and other regulations while at war.

"We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force," the prepared text said. "We use lethal force only when justified, proportional, and most importantly lawful."

The remarks call such conduct "the American way of war."

"We must regulate force and violence," Hagee will say. "We only damage property that must be damaged, and we protect non-combatants we find on the battlefield."

Hagee also will urge Marines to have the "moral courage to do the `right thing' in the face of danger or pressure from other Marines."

On Wednesday, the Marine command in the Iraqi city of Fallujah said that "several" Marines from 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment had been returned to the United States until an investigation is completed into the April 26 killing of an Iraqi civilian near Hamandiyah. The Marines said local Iraqis brought the alleged killing to the attention of Marine commanders during a routine meeting on May 1.

Investigators reportedly are near completion of their probe into the Nov. 19 incident at Haditha. Military officials in Baghdad initially reported that 15 civilians on a bus were killed that day, along with one Marine in a nearby Humvee, when a roadside bomb exploded. They later said the civilians died in the crossfire between Marines and insurgents.

But Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., told a press conference last week that the Marines killed the civilians "in cold blood" after snapping because of the pressures of combat.

Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee and an opponent of Bush administration policy in Iraq, said those findings would be included in a report due for delivery to top military brass in Baghdad this week.

Murtha, a retired Marine officer and Vietnam veteran, said he had not read the report, but had learned of its findings from military commanders and other sources.

A Marine lieutenant colonel and two company commanders from 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment were relieved after the Haditha killings and sent home. The commander of 1st Marine Division didn't tie the officers to the alleged massacre, but said they'd been relieved because of numerous incidents throughout their tour.

Haditha, a town in western Iraq about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad, has been a hotbed of the Iraqi insurgency in western Anbar province for more than two years. Fourteen Marines were killed near Haditha last August when a bomb blew up underneath their armored personnel carrier, in one of the worst single fatal attacks for U.S. troops so far in the war.

Top Marine Visits Iraq As Probe Of Deaths Widens (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The commandant of the Marine Corps flew to Iraq to address his troops yesterday, and members of the Senate Armed Services Committee were briefed on allegations that Marines had purposely killed as many as two dozen Iraqi civilians in November.

The two developments were indications of the growing seriousness of two investigations into the incident in Haditha that has led to charges from a congressman that Marines killed civilians "in cold blood."

"When these investigations come out, there's going to be a firestorm," said retired Brig. Gen. David M. Brahms, formerly a top lawyer for the Marine Corps. "It will be worse than Abu Ghraib -- nobody was killed at Abu Ghraib."

An Army lawyer who has heard some accounts of the investigation said, "It's a lot more serious than people thought at the beginning. It's really bad timing," coming as the repercussions of the Abu Ghraib detainee abuse scandal are waning, he added. He requested anonymity because he is on active duty and not authorized to be interviewed.

If so, the case is likely to make it more difficult for the Bush administration to bolster support for the war.

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was briefed Wednesday by Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Marine commandant, and again yesterday by Brig. Gen. John Kelly, the legislative liaison for the Corps. Warner described the case as consisting of "very, very serious allegations" that resulted in "a significant loss of life, civilian."

Hagee flew to Iraq yesterday "to reinforce the ideals, values and standards" of the Corps, the Marines said. "There is a risk of becoming indifferent to the loss of a human life, as well as bringing dishonor on ourselves," Hagee said in a statement announcing his trip. "We do not employ force just for the sake of employing force."

Two military investigations of events in Haditha are expected to be completed soon, and charges could be brought by late June, according to a person familiar with some aspects of the case. A civilian lawyer tracking the case said he has heard from Marine contacts that there could be as many as a dozen court-martial proceedings.

DOJ_NMG_0029871

At issue is what occurred on Nov. 19, 2005, after a Marine convoy was allegedly hit by a roadside bomb, killing Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas. An initial inquiry found that 15 civilians were killed in the crossfire of a subsequent Marine firefight with insurgents.

In April, the Marine Corps relieved Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani of his command of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marine Regiment, the unit involved in the incident. Two of his company commanders were also relieved of command. The 1st Marine Regiment is part of the 1st Marine Division and is based at Camp Pendleton, Calif., just north of San Diego.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) said last week that there was neither a bomb nor a firefight, and that 24 civilians had been killed "in cold blood."

"It's much worse than reported," said Murtha, who like Warner is a former Marine and maintains close ties with senior Marine officers despite his vigorous opposition to the war.

Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.), a retired Marine helicopter pilot, said in an interview he thought Hagee was doing the right thing.

"I was saddened, surprised and outraged that this could happen," Kline said. He said he thought the incident would be regarded as "a horrific aberration" for the Marines.

Afghanistan's Leader Visits Civilians Wounded In American Bombing (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 25 — President Hamid Karzai made a surprise trip to his hometown of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan today to visit civilians wounded in an American bombing raid earlier in the week amid one of the worst bouts of violence in the last four years.

Thousands of villagers have fled their homes and sought refuge in the city in the last few days after heavy fighting just 35 kilometers west of the city, and fighting and bombing continued.

Mr. Karzai made a fleeting visit to Kandahar, where he narrowly survived an assassination attempt in 2003, and promised a gathering of tribal elders that he would bring security to the region.

"He told us not to be worried about the situation, that let's see what happens and that we will bring security," said Haji Agha Lalai Dastagiri, a member of the newly elected provincial council in Kandahar who was present at the meeting.

"He promised the people of Afghanistan that he would build Afghanistan, that God would rebuild it, that the international community was with us and they would build Afghanistan and bring security to this region," said Haji Agha Lalai Dastagiri, a member of the newly elected provincial council in Kandahar who was present at the meeting.

"People were telling him we really need security, but that we do not need foreign troops, and helicopters and tanks anymore, we Afghans should take care of it," he said.

Meanwhile the American-led coalition in Kandahar said fighting continued in the Panjwai district just west of Kandahar Wednesday and coalition forces bombed the area again Wednesday night. Two suspected Taliban insurgents were detained, the military said in a press statement.

In the evening, troops clashed with a "sizable force of Taliban, who retreated into a house and continued fighting," the statement said. "Artillery and air support was used to destroy the enemy. Sporadic fighting continued through the night. We have no assessment of Taliban killed or wounded."

The numbers of civilian casualties in the bombing continued to rise. At least 35 civilians were killed and 15 wounded when United States planes bombed Taliban fighters in a village of Tolokan, west of Kandahar, on Sunday night, said Abdul Qadar Noorzai, the head of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission in Kandahar, who has been compiling numbers from accounts from families arriving at his office.

Villagers had traveled in to the city to report that 24 members of one family, living in a large mud-walled compound, had died and eight were wounded, he said. In a second bombing of a madrassah, nine civilians were killed and three were wounded, he said. Villagers had reported that they had buried 35 Taliban fighters who were also killed in the bombardment, he said.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

N. Korean sanctions

As this paper reported Tuesday, the Bush administration recently tightened economic sanctions on North Korea after learning that Pyongyang was selling its ship registry to U.S. and foreign companies here for two or three times the going rate for such so-called flags of convenience.

DOJ_NMG_0029872

The registry provides cash for Pyongyang, but there also are signs that the ships flying North Korean flags do so to avoid inspections because of criminal activity.

Administration officials tell us the new sanctions followed the interdiction March 29 of the freighter MV Crystal off a European port. The ship was found to be engaged in migrant smuggling. The officials did not identify the owner by name but said it was a company incorporated in Delaware. Under the sanctions that went into effect May 8, the company will be forced to give up the North Korean registry.

Another North Korean-flagged vessel, the Rimyongsu, was stopped by Japanese authorities in 2005 and found to be carrying 6,500 counterfeit $100 bills, a North Korean specialty known as the supernote because of the high-quality forgery.

According to the International Transport Workers' Federation, most ships that sail under North Korean flags are bulk, cargo and fishing vessels. A report by the federation stated that out of 408 North Korean-flagged vessels, 187 were owned by North Korea and the rest were owned by a variety of states, including three U.S. companies. Most of the ships are owned by companies based in Cambodia, Comoros, Tonga, and Sao Tome and Principe.

Navy intercept

The U.S. Navy this week reached a milestone in its sea-based missile defense program. A modified SM-2 interceptor missile launched from the Hawaii-based Aegis cruiser USS Lake Erie successfully shot down an incoming short-range test missile in the final few seconds before impact.

It was the first sea-based intercept of a ballistic missile in the terminal, or last stage, of flight.

The target missile was destroyed by a combination of the SM-2's direct contact with it as well as an explosive blast, Pentagon officials said.

"We believe it is an important step towards the desired end-state of a robust sea-based terminal ballistic missile defense capability," Rear Adm. Barry McCullough, director for surface warfare on the staff of the chief of naval operations, said of the test. He noted that the new system "begins to meet an immediate near-term concern of our combatant commanders."

The only other terminal missile defense available is the land-based Patriot PAC-3 system.

There is no current sea-based terminal defense, and the modified SM-2 is a "limited emergency capability" for sea-based terminal missile defense.

China threat

Call it good timing. Just as the Pentagon releases a report critical of communist China's brisk military buildup, a Defense Department hand and a radio talk show host came out with a book on why Beijing wants a military confrontation with the United States.

"Showdown: Why China Wants War With the United States" paints several scenarios for how China and the world's only superpower will clash one day.

"China may soon have the capacity to shut down the stock market, take out air traffic control and telephone satellite networks and hijack our electric power grid," writes Jed Babbin, a frequent fill-in for a variety of radio hosts across the country and a former senior Pentagon official; and Edward Timperlake, a Pentagon procurement official and former Marine fighter pilot. Both authors have written previous New York Times best-sellers.

The authors also save space for scolding democratic Taiwan, the island that China claims as its own.

"President Bush and his successors must take a 'tough love' approach with the Taiwanese," the authors write. "If the Taiwanese are unwilling to spend the necessary money to defend themselves they should be told in unmistakable terms that we will not spend blood and treasure in their defense. The Taiwanese need a big dose of reality."

Buyer and the vets

Veterans cannot recall the last time relations were so bad between the chairman of a congressional committee and the groups that go to bat for the country's millions of ex-service members.

It began when House Veterans' Affairs Committee Chairman Steve Buyer, Indiana Republican, changed the way the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars and other vets groups provide their views to his committee. The old practice was for joint hearings with the Senate committee counterpart, with individual sessions with each group's leader, who had plenty of time to testify.

Mr. Buyer has condensed those proceedings, according to the American Legion, and has pushed back the hearing date until after the president's veterans budget is delivered to Congress each February. Previously, the groups met with the committee in September as the White House formulated the federal budget.

Thomas Bock, the American Legion's national commander, said Mr. Buyer offered him three minutes to talk as part of a panel and then increased his time — by seven minutes. "I thought, 'What a slap in the face,' " Mr. Bock told us.

Earlier this month, Mr. Bock and representatives from three other leading vets groups sent a letter to Mr. Buyer.

DOJ_NMG_0029873

"The fact that you have made a decision without consulting the [veterans service organizations] is on its face, disrespectful to our organizations and our millions of volunteer members that live and advocate for their fellow veterans and their families all across this great nation," said the letter, which was hand-delivered to every member of Congress. The groups called Mr. Buyer's attitude "hostile."

Matters got worse. Mr. Buyer fired back on May 12 that the letter was "a political stunt filled with falsehoods, innuendo and misrepresentations."

This week, the four veterans groups replied: "That you would label our attempt to speak to reason on this issue a 'political stunt' is both offensive and disingenuous in the extreme. Your implication that we are putting politics above service to veterans is disgraceful and a calculated misrepresentation." They asked for a meeting with Mr. Buyer sometime after Memorial Day.

Jeff Phillips, Mr. Buyer's spokesman, said in an e-mail: "Chairman Buyer heard from 19 veterans' groups in February, under this new schedule — before his committee wrote its views and estimates. That has never been done before. He also plans a 'look-back, look ahead' hearing in September for these groups. That's new, too."

Said Mr. Bock, "We never have had relations so strained with a committee chairman."

DOJ:

Local Hero Receives Courage Award (WTEN-TV)

WTEN-TV, Albany, NY, May 26, 2006

Stephanie was honored at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day awards ceremony.

A local hero receives a national award; and if anybody deserved one, 15-year-old Stephanie Quackenbush does.

She is the Albany girl who fought off an armed attacker and then helped send him to prison. Today she received "The Courage" award.

And courage is something Stephanie has plenty of. So much, she was honored at the Department of Justice National Missing Children's Day awards ceremony. She shares the credit with her mom.

"I'm proud of myself, I just did everything my mom taught me to do," said Quackenbush.

There were words of praise from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales

"Today we honor all who work for our children, because they are our dreams and our future," says Gonzales.

Stephanie almost never lived to see her future. On June of last year, on the way to school she was attacked by a man armed with a butcher knife. Quackenbush fought and screamed, even after the man told her he was going to stab her.

Her screams got the attention of two men, as her attacker ran. He turned out to be 24-year-old Darius Ashley, who is serving 25 years in prison for the assault on Quackenbush, and the rapes of two other girls.

Stephanie's mom, Rhonda Quackenbush, says she is, "proud, very proud. She has four sisters and she taught us all a lot. She deserves it.

Stephanie also has words of advice. "Just for like young girls, fight back, scream as hard as you can. You have one chance, why not take it."

Stephanie's attacker also allegedly admitted to raping and killing Gretchen Perham, a classmate of Quackenbush. He has not been prosecuted for those crimes.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Reversal Could Be Long Shot, Legal Experts Say (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel And Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

For former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2, overturning yesterday's guilty verdicts will be a long shot, legal specialists say.

Mr. Lay was found guilty in a Houston federal court of conspiracy, securities fraud and wire fraud. He was also found guilty of bank fraud and misrepresentation in personal loans in a separate trial. Mr. Skilling was found guilty of conspiracy, securities fraud, making false statements and insider trading. Mr. Skilling was acquitted of some other insider-trading counts.

Sentencing was set for Sept. 11. Mr. Lay, 64 years old, faces a maximum penalty of 45 years in prison in the main trial, and he could get from zero to six months for each of the four separate bank charges; Mr. Skilling, 52, faces a maximum penalty of 185 years in prison. However, sentencing experts say that the actual sentences are likely to fall in the 12- to 25-year range.

DOJ_NMG_0029874

The two are expected to seek reversals in the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which lawyers say is one of the more pro-government benches in the nation. It also would likely be the last stop for Messrs. Skilling and Lay, since the U.S. Supreme Court agrees to hear very few cases.

"Your typical white-collar defendant has a better chance of winning a Golden Globe award than getting his conviction reversed in the Fifth Circuit," says Brian Wice, a Houston lawyer who specializes in criminal appeals.

After the trial, Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli3, said the verdict "didn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence" and said he would soon file an appeal. "We have just begun the fight."

Mr. Lay said he was "shocked" at the verdict but didn't say whether he would appeal.

Lawyers for the former Enron chiefs likely will raise a host of appellate arguments, including that the case should have been moved to another venue and that the defendants were adversely affected by having to stand trial together. Both defense lawyers had requested trials outside of Houston, where Enron's collapse had a particularly significant impact. Mr. Lay had requested to be tried separately.

But trial judges are given wide latitude over the conduct of a trial. And lawyers who attended the Enron trial say federal Judge Simeon Lake4, widely regarded as one of Houston's more fastidious judges, didn't make any obvious missteps. "Judge Lake is on solid ground," says Houston securities lawyer Christopher Bebel.

Here is a snapshot of issues that could be raised in an appeal:

· JURY INSTRUCTIONS: Over the defense's objection, Judge Lake included a controversial "deliberate indifference" instruction. Under this standard, the jury could find either Mr. Lay or Mr. Skilling guilty for closing their eyes to signs of criminal conduct that would otherwise have been obvious to them. The defense contended this instruction didn't apply either to the prosecution's or defense's theory of the case.

· VENUE: Judge Lake denied a request to move the trial out of Houston. The defense argued that Enron's implosion so infected Houston that they would be unable to get a fair trial there.

· PAIRING THE TRIALS: Judge Lake denied Mr. Lay's request to have his case tried separately from Mr. Skilling's. Mr. Lay might argue on appeal that he was unfairly prejudiced by the joint trial.

· IMMUNITY: Judge Lake and the government declined to grant immunity to numerous former Enron executives who might have testified on behalf of the defense. This stance regarding potential witnesses deprived the defendants of helpful testimony, they might argue.

Meantime, Messrs. Lay and Skilling shouldn't take heart from two other recent, high-profile appeals, legal specialists say. Last year, the Supreme Court reversed the 2002 conviction of Arthur Andersen LLP for obstructing justice by shredding documents related to its work for Enron. The Supreme Court held that the Andersen trial judge erred by not requiring the jury to find Andersen knew the document-shredding was unlawful.

The Andersen ruling, in turn, paved the way for former investment banker Frank Quattrone to win a reversal this year of his 2004 conviction for obstructing a government probe of Credit Suisse First Boston (now named Credit Suisse.) The Second Circuit concluded Mr. Quattrone was harmed by juror-instruction errors highlighted by the Andersen ruling.

Unlike the Andersen and Quattrone cases, however, the Enron trial dealt with "very well-settled law," says Samuel Buell, a professor at the University of Texas School of Law and a former prosecutor with the Enron Task Force.

Lay, Skilling Found Guilty (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — In a dramatic resolution to a landmark criminal case that defined an era of corporate fraud in the USA, a jury here found former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling guilty on all counts of conspiring to hide the company's financial condition in 2000 and 2001.

The verdict was a resounding victory for federal prosecutors who had spent four years building a criminal case against two men once celebrated as business visionaries.

It was also a total repudiation of Lay and Skilling, who both testified that Enron was a fundamentally sound company brought low in a market panic spurred by short sellers and negative media reports. The government had argued Enron was a speculative trading company that boosted its earnings through deceptive accounting and bogus claims about the growth potential of new business units.

The jury found Lay, 64, guilty of six counts of conspiracy and fraud. Skilling, 52, was convicted on 18 counts of conspiracy and securities fraud but acquitted on nine out of 10 counts of illegal inside trading.

DOJ_NMG_0029875

Lay was not charged with inside trading, but in a news conference after the verdict was announced, jurors said Lay's incessant selling of stock in the months leading up to Enron's collapse was evidence of intent to deceive the public about Enron's financial health.

The two men, who stood stoically in the courtroom while the verdicts were announced, even as their families and lawyers were overwhelmed with emotion, are scheduled to be sentenced on Sept. 11. Because of the magnitude of the financial losses caused by Enron's collapse into bankruptcy in December 2001, which erased more than $60 billion of market value, both men could spend the rest of their lives in prison.

As the verdicts were read, Lay's wife, Linda — a fixture in the courtroom throughout the four-month trial — slumped her head toward her husband's shoulder and fought back sobs.

On his way out of the courthouse, Lay said he was "shocked" by the verdict. "I firmly believe I am innocent of the charges against me as I've said from day one."

In a news conference after the verdict was announced, several jurors said they didn't believe that Lay and Skilling were unaware of the accounting manipulations that took place on their watch.

"I felt it was their duty to know what was going on," said juror Wendy Vaughan. Another juror, Kathy Harrison, declared, "No American is above the law."

Outside the courthouse after the verdict, prosecutors said the trial should send a message to executives who manipulate their companies' earnings. "No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules," said Sean Berkowitz, director of the Enron Task Force. "You will be held accountable for your actions."

Skilling And Lay Convicted Of Enron Conspiracy (FT)

By Sheila McNulty And Ben White

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

Former Enron executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were convicted on Thursday of fraud and conspiracy for their role in the energy trader's collapse, bringing a dramatic conclusion to a case that changed the face of US business.

The verdict provided the federal government with its most important victory in a five-year crackdown, which followed a white-collar crime wave that rattled investor confidence, wiped out thousands of jobs and destroyed billions of dollars in wealth.

Some of the jurors said they saw themselves as part of a bigger battle against corporate excess, an effort that prompted US lawmakers to pass Sarbanes-Oxley, which requires increased accountability from corporate executives and directors.

"This is undoubtedly the most challenging and heart-rending experience I've ever had," one of the jurors, Kathy Harrison, an elementary school teacher, said at a news conference. "I've fought on this battleground for American justice."

After five days of deliberations on the case, which involved the use of off-the-book partnerships to disguise debt, Mr Lay, former chairman, was found guilty on all six counts of wire fraud, securities fraud and conspiracy. In addition, Judge Sim Lake said he had found Mr Lay guilty of four counts of bank fraud in a separate case that was argued last week without a jury.

Mr Skilling, the former chief executive, was found guilty on 19 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, insider trading and making false statements. Mr Skilling was acquitted on nine of 10 counts of insider trading.

It is possible the two men could spend the rest of their lives in prison. Mr Lay, 64, faces up to 45 years. Mr Skilling, 52, faces up to 185 years. They are to be sentenced on September 11.

As the verdicts were read, Mr Lay's face turned grey. His wife and daughter covered their faces and sobbed. All five of his children huddled around him. Mr Skilling, whose wife was not at court, kept his face blank. Daniel Petrocelli, his lawyer, promised a "vigorous" appeal.

Legal experts said the verdicts showed jurors rejected defence arguments that there was no accounting fraud at the world's biggest energy trader, and that the collapse was sparked by a collapse in confidence caused by heightened scrutiny from regulators, analysts and the media.

Henry Hu, business and law professor at the University of Texas, said: "Symbolically, this is the end of the morality play. Enron has become a word that you can use to scare children. Average investors might not have followed some of the other cases, such as WorldCom and Tyco, but they followed this one. They knew who these guys were."

Jurors said their verdict was not reached because of one particular witness or piece of evidence, and confessed to changing their minds from day to day.

"You felt like a ping-pong ball,'' said Doug Baggett, a juror who manages a legal department, in a news conference.

Judge Lake said Mr Skilling's $5m bond was sufficient to release him until sentencing but told Mr Lay to surrender his passport and have his five children post their homes to back up his $5m bond.

Meanwhile, a consortium of US and European hedge funds had agreed to buy the international assets of Enron for $2.1bn in cash.

DOJ_NMG_0029876

Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Case (WT/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON -- Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were convicted of conspiracy and fraud yesterday by a federal jury that laid blame for one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history squarely on Enron Corp.'s two former top executives.

Jurors found that the once-wealthy and powerful corporate chiefs repeatedly lied to cover up accounting tricks and business failures that led to its 2001 demise. The collapse wiped out more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

The verdict came in the sixth day of deliberations after a criminal trial that lasted nearly four months. Lay also was convicted of bank fraud and making false statements to banks in a separate, nonjury trial before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake related to Lay's personal finances.

The conspiracy conviction was a major victory for the government, serving almost as a bookend to an era that has seen prosecutors win convictions against executives from WorldCom Inc. to Adelphia Communications Corp. and homemaking diva Martha Stewart. The public outrage over the string of corporate scandals led Congress to pass the Sarbanes-Oxley act, designed to make company executives more accountable.

"The jury's verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies" said Rep. Michael G. Oxley, Ohio Republican, co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation. "Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

Lay was convicted on all six counts of conspiracy, securities and wire fraud against him in the corporate trial and all four in the personal banking trial. Former Chief Executive Officer Skilling was convicted on 19 of the 28 counts in the corporate trial, including one count of insider trading, and acquitted on the remaining nine.

Judge Lake set sentencing for September 11. The charges against Lay, who is 64, carry a maximum penalty in prison of 45 years for the corporate trial and 120 years in the personal banking trial. The charges against Skilling, 52, carry a maximum penalty of 185 years in prison.

As Judge Lake read the verdict from the bench, Lay tossed his head at hearing the first "guilty" on the conspiracy count. He clutched his wife's hand as he heard that word over and over again.

Lay sat with his wife, Linda; his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team; and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn. As Lay clutched his wife's hand, the three women leaned forward and began to sob quietly.

Skilling, sitting with his brother, Mark, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

The sentencing will come five years almost to the day after Skilling sold 500,000 shares of Enron stock for $15.5 million, for which he was convicted of insider trading.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," he told reporters outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works." Skilling said he will appeal.

Skilling's $5 million bond, which restricts him to the continental U.S., remains in effect. Lay, who surrendered his passport, posted a $5 million bond secured with family-owned properties at a hearing after the verdict.

"I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me," Lay said afterward. "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed He does work all things for good for those who love the Lord."

Jurors found that both men had repeatedly lied to cover a vast web of unsustainable accounting tricks and failing ventures at Enron.

Both men testified in their own defense. But the panel rejected Skilling's insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives skimming millions in secret side deals, and that bad press and poor market confidence combined to sink the company.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying, very much so, and there were pieces in the testimony where I felt their character was questioned," juror Wendy Vaughan said after the verdict was announced.

The government's victory caps a 41/2 year investigation that garnered 16 guilty pleas from ex-Enron executives, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow and former Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey. All are awaiting sentencing later this year except for two, who either finished or are still serving prison terms.

Enron Executives Guilty On Most Counts (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029877

HOUSTON — Former Enron executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling were found guilty today on most counts in their landmark conspiracy and fraud case.

In the end, the jury of eight women and four men embraced the testimony of a parade of former Enron executives who said Lay and Skilling lied publicly about the energy company's financial health and condoned, if not actively encouraged, the use of accounting tricks to boost reported profits and hide debt.

The verdicts, which were reached after the jury deliberated for more than five days, were read aloud in a Houston courtroom.

Lay, 64, the company's former chairman, was found guilty on all six counts of fraud and conspiracy. Former chief executive Skilling, 52, was found guilty of fraud and conspiracy in addition to one count of insider trading, 19 counts in all; he was acquitted of the nine remaining insider trading charges. One of the fraud counts against Skilling included the misstating of Enron's financial situation during the California energy crisis.

Sentencing was scheduled for Sept. 11. Lay faces a maximum of 165 years in prison while Skilling faces a maximum of 185 years, according to Associated Press.

Outside the courtroom, Skilling denied any wrongdoing, and his chief defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, vowed to file a "full and vigorous appeal."

"We fought a good fight," Skilling told reporters gathered outside the downtown courtroom. "Some things work. Some things don't."

A few hours later, Lay, accompanied by his wife, Linda, emerged from the courthouse to profess his innocence and his belief that "God, in fact, is in control, and indeed he does work all things for good."

But the former chairman said he was stunned by the verdict.

"Certainly, we are surprised. I think [it's] probably more appropriate to say we are shocked," said Lay in brief comments to reporters. "I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me, as I have said from day one."

Police mounted on horses kept the news media at bay as Lay and his entourage made their way from the courthouse into another building.

One of the jurors interviewed after the trial said that the testimony of former Enron treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., who is serving a five-year prison sentence for his role in the scandal, played an important part as they weighed the evidence.

"We kept on going back to that testimony to corroborate things," said school principal Freddy Delgado. "I believe that he was one of the best witnesses that was brought forward."

The decision of Lay and Skilling to take the stand in their own defense didn't help their case much, according to another juror.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying," said business owner Wendy Vaughn. But, "there were places in their testimony where I felt their character was questioned."

Lay's sale of $20 million of Enron stock in 2001 months before the company collapsed also weighed heavily with jurors, with one expressing disgust at the transaction, which would not have to be reported until the following year. It was "a disgrace," said electrical designer Doug Martin.

The verdicts were perhaps the government's most important victory in its high-profile war against corporate corruption.

"The jury has spoken, and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country: You can't lie to shareholders. You can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interest," said Sean M. Berkowitz, head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, outside the courtroom. "No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules."

Fellow Enron task force member and Orange County federal prosecutor John C. Hueston said that the verdicts will make it harder for top executives to blame their company's problems on their underlings to avoid legal responsibility.

"CEO's cannot hide behind accountants. They cannot hide behind lawyers. They cannot hide behind claims of ignorance when they have been paid tens of millions of dollars to be the faithful stewards of shareholders and investors," Hueston said.

Enron's implosion was one of the most infamous corporate scandals in U.S. history. The energy company's failure wiped out more than 5,000 jobs and billions of dollars of stock market value. It also led to sweeping new regulations and legislation — particularly the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law — meant to curb corporate wrongdoing and restore confidence in companies' financial statements.

Lay and Skilling, who have insisted that they were made scapegoats for Enron's shocking 2001 collapse, became the headline targets of a massive crackdown on corporate wrongdoing that also resulted in charges against executives of such companies as WorldCom, Adelphia Communications, HealthSouth and Tyco International.

Enron's auditors, then-Big Five accounting giant Arthur Andersen, went out of business after being indicted for obstruction of justice in the wake of Enron's collapse. Testimony showed that Andersen employees shredded mounds of Enron-related documents after the federal probe was launched. The U.S. Supreme Court last July overturned the firm's 2002 conviction due to faulty jury instructions.

Lay and Skilling attempted vainly to have their trial moved to a location less saturated by media coverage of Enron's crash, but there were few places in America where the news hadn't penetrated.

"Just the mention of the name Enron evokes images of duplicity and greed," Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of enforcement for the Securities and Exchange Commission, said at the time of Lay's July 2004 indictment.

An Oscar-nominated documentary film and a handful of mass-market books were spawned by the scandal. Feisty Enron whistle-blower Sherron S. Watkins, in addition to co-authoring a book, launched a lucrative second career lecturing on business ethics.

An investigation by the Enron Task Force, created by the Department of Justice shortly after the company's Dec. 2, 2001 bankruptcy filing, has resulted in charges against more than 20 people.

The Enron trial lasted 56 days, including one day for jury selection, one day for opening statements and three days for closing arguments. The prosecution team took 30 days to present its case. The defense took 21 days.

The government called 22 witnesses and the defense 31, including Lay and Skilling. Lay spent five days on the witness stand. Skilling testified for eight days.

Lay and Skilling argued that there was no crime at Enron, other than that committed secretly by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew S. Fastow. Times staff writer Jesus Sanchez in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

Enron Leaders Found Guilty (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 -- A federal jury found former Enron chairman Kenneth L. Lay guilty of every one of the half-dozen counts with which he was charged and convicted his protege Jeffrey K. Skilling of 19 more on Thursday, pinning them with responsibility for one of the era's biggest and most damaging business frauds.

Jurors deliberated for less than six days over a trial that took almost four months and was more than four years in the making. As they filed back into the courtroom, jurors avoided eye contact with the defendants and their families. Skilling rose first and stood impassively, holding his hands pressed together in front of him and exchanging words with his brother, while the judge read aloud "guilty" after "guilty."

Lay, who sat beside his weeping wife and daughter, bowed his head at Skilling's predicament, then stood and braced himself as the judge handed down a rapid-fire series of guilty verdicts against him. Relatives and friends of both men buried their heads in their hands and murmured "no" as individual jurors affirmed their ruling.

Moments after the verdicts, U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III asked Lay to stand for a second time, finding him guilty of four counts of bank fraud and making false statements in a separate trial, related to personal loans. The judge then demanded that the once-powerful executive who had dominated this city's business and cultural circles surrender his passport and fork over a $5 million bond. At the bond hearing, Lay's wife and three of the couple's children pledged their homes on the promise that he would not abscond before he is sentenced.

"I am not going to let him leave this building until his passport is surrendered," Lake said firmly. The judge ordered both men to return to the building for sentencing on Sept. 11, the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks that the defense blamed for contributing to Enron's misfortunes.

Skilling's lawyer Daniel M. Petrocelli appeared at microphones set up on the courthouse steps just minutes after the verdict was read and vowed a "full and vigorous" appeal.

"We have just begun to fight," he said, standing beside his client, who appeared composed. Skilling, whose wife and three children were not present for the verdict, was among the first to race out of the courtroom when the judge left the bench. Skilling was heckled by a few members of the public who camped outside the courthouse alongside scores of cameramen and reporters. Two police officers on horseback patrolled the area, trying to keep order, stopping traffic so Lay and a phalanx of relatives could cross the street and make their way home.

Skilling, 52, and Lay, 64, once stood near the pinnacle of American business, as the energy trading powerhouse they created out of a stodgy pipeline company grew to become the nation's seventh-largest public company. But much of their fortunes collapsed in a heap along with the business in December 2001.

Now the two men, who together invested close to $70 million in their defense, face the possibility of spending the rest of their lives in prison and living in history as the ringleaders of a fraud at a company whose name became synonymous with accounting tricks and rule-breaking.

DOJ_NMG_0029879

"Certainly, we're surprised, and it's probably more accurate to say we're shocked," Lay told reporters outside the courthouse. Earlier in the day, he held hands with a circle of family members and prayed alongside his pastor inside the courtroom well. "I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me. . . . Most of all, we believe in the fact that God is in control."

Jurors, on the other hand, said they believed Lay and Skilling were firmly in charge as the company veered into financial problems, rejecting the defense that Enron fell victim to a market panic fueled by skeptical news reports; the terrorist attacks; investors who bet the stock price would drop; and concerns about the ethics of Andrew S. Fastow, then Enron's finance chief.

"Both defendants said they had their hands firmly on the wheel," said juror Freddy Delgado, an elementary school principal. "To say you didn't know what was going on in your company . . . was not the right thing to do."

Enron's bankruptcy filing cost thousands of workers their jobs, spooked investors into doubting the integrity of the stock market and spurred lawmakers to enact the most significant changes to corporate practices in more than 70 years.

Another jury member, payroll manager Carolyn Kuchera, said panelists managed to do their jobs at nights, on weekends and during breaks in the long case. "We were responsible, we were always accountable, we tied up the loose ends, and I think those [Enron] employees were entitled to the same thing."

Both Lay, who once mingled with members of the Bush family and earned the nickname "Kenny Boy" from the president, and Skilling, who during boom years convinced Wall Street analysts of Enron's genius and his own, took the witness stand in an effort to deploy their legendary salesmanship on their own behalf. But, in 14 days of testimony, neither man proved convincing, jurors said.

The eight-woman, four-man jury issued its verdict after hearing evidence over 16 weeks from 56 witnesses, including eight insiders who pleaded guilty and testified against Lay and Skilling. None, however, mattered more than the defendants themselves.

In contrast to his grandfatherly, genial public image, Lay angrily attacked prosecutors for deigning to investigate his $77.5 million of stock sales back to Enron in the months before its demise, an issue that did not form the basis of criminal charges but nonetheless struck juror Don Martin as a "disgrace," he said later. Skilling suffered memory lapses about key events and tried to outwit the government by spinning long explanations for such things as problems in Enron's retail and broadband units.

Federal prosecutors prevailed despite the lack of documents that directly linked the men to a scheme to boost earnings and conceal billions of dollars in debt. From the start of the trial Jan. 30, government lawyers signaled they would skim over arcane business issues and instead focus on whether the defendants misled analysts and investors in a series of optimistic public statements designed to prop up Enron's stock price.

"The jury has spoken, and they have sent a powerful message," said Justice Department Task Force Director Sean M. Berkowitz. "You can't lie to shareholders. You can't put yourself above employees' interests. . . . No matter how rich you are, you have to play by the rules just like anyone else."

Skilling, whom prosecutors characterized as the mastermind of the fraud, resigned abruptly in August 2001, passing the torch back to his mentor. He faced a total of 28 charges of insider trading, conspiracy, securities fraud and making false statements. Jurors acquitted Skilling of nine of the 10 insider-trading charges because, they said, they did not have sufficient evidence. Forewoman Deborah Smith, a human resources manager, explained the move by saying: "Not guilty equals not proven. It does not equal innocent."

Lay faced six more-narrow charges based on his leadership of the company after he stepped in upon Skilling's departure, a decision that he testified he grew to regret bitterly. Prosecutor John C. Hueston told reporters that Lay had a "golden opportunity" to come clean about Enron's problems but instead chose time and again "not to tell the unvarnished truth."

The Enron investigation has been the most sophisticated and painstaking white-collar criminal probe in history, Justice Department officials said, producing convictions of 18 people. Enron's collapse also helped topple accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP, convicted of obstructing justice for tampering with documents related to Enron in 2002. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously overturned the verdict last year because of faulty jury instructions -- one of many issues Lay and Skilling are likely to argue in their own extensive appeals.

Enron's implosion in late 2001 put substantial pressure on the Bush administration, which had developed close ties to Lay, to distance itself from business malfeasance. Within months, President Bush mobilized federal agencies and launched a corporate-fraud task force that has convicted more than 1,063 people, including 167 corporate presidents and chief executives and 36 chief financial officers.

"This was the most important corporate scandal of our lifetimes," said securities-law historian Joel S. Seligman. "It was one of the immediate causes of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the governance reforms of the New York Stock Exchange and NASD, and the most consequential reorientation of corporate behavior in living memory."

DOJ_NMG_0029880

Lay and Skilling have yet to resolve civil lawsuits filed by former shareholders who seek billions of dollars. But they may have to stand in line behind the federal government, which is seeking the forfeiture of Lay's $4 million penthouse apartment and Skilling's $5 million Mediterranean-style mansion, among other assets.

Two Enron Chiefs Are Convicted In Fraud And Conspiracy Trial (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 — Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the chief executives who guided Enron through its spectacular rise and even more stunning fall, were found guilty Thursday of fraud and conspiracy. They are among the most prominent corporate leaders convicted in the parade of scandals that marked the get-rich-quick excesses and management failures of the 1990's.

The eight women and four men on the jury reached the verdicts after a little more than five days of deliberations. Mr. Skilling was convicted of 18 counts of fraud and conspiracy and one count of insider trading. He was acquitted on nine counts of insider trading. Mr. Lay was found guilty on six counts of fraud and conspiracy and four counts of bank fraud.

The conspiracy and fraud convictions each carry a sentence of 5 to 10 years in prison. The insider trading charge against Mr. Skilling carries a maximum of 10 years.

Both men are expected to appeal. Judge Simeon T. Lake III, the judge in the case, set sentencing for Sept. 11. Until then, the two men are free on bail. If they lose their appeals, Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay face potential sentences that experts say they believe will keep them in prison for the rest of their lives. Mr. Skilling, who had few family members in attendance, reacted with little emotion as the verdict was read, briefly searching the audience's faces and later striding confidently alone out of the courtroom ahead of his lead lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," Mr. Skilling said as he left the courthouse, "but that's the way the system works."

Once jurors and the judge cleared out of the courtroom, Mr. Lay's family members huddled around him. Elizabeth Vittor, Mr. Lay's daughter and a lawyer who had worked on his defense team, sobbed uncontrollably. Two local ministers also leaned in and hugged Mr. Lay, whose family members soon formed a circle in the courtroom, with arms over shoulders, and cried together. "I know, I know," Mr. Lay said in a soothing voice to several of them, as they clutched at his suit coat.

After he emerged from court, Mr. Lay said, "I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me."

In televised remarks he said, "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed he does work all things for good for those who love the Lord."

For a company that once seemed so complex that almost no one could understand how it actually made its money, the cases ended up being simpler than most people envisioned. Mr. Lay, 64, and Mr. Skilling, 52, were found guilty of lying — to investors, employees and regulators — in an effort to disguise the crumbling fortunes of their energy empire.

The 12 jurors and 3 alternates, who all agreed to talk to about 100 reporters at a news conference after the verdict, said they were persuaded — by the volume of evidence the government presented and by Mr. Skilling's and Mr. Lay's own appearances on the stand — that the men had perpetuated a far-reaching fraud by lying to investors and employees about Enron's performance.

The panel rejected the former chief executives' insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few underlings who stole millions in secret side deals. And the jurors said they did not believe that negative press and failing market confidence combined to sink the company.

"The jury has spoken and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country that you can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourself in front of your employees' interests, and no matter how rich and powerful you are you have to play by the rules," Sean M. Berkowitz, the director of the Justice Department Enron Task Force, said outside the courthouse.

For years, Enron's gravity-defying stock price made it a Wall Street darling and an icon of the "New Economy" of the 1990's. But its sudden collapse at the end of 2001 and revelation as little more than a house of cards left Enron, with its crooked E logo, the premier public symbol of corporate ignominy. Investors and employees lost billions when Enron shares became worthless.

Enron's fall had a far greater impact than on just the energy industry by heightening nervousness among average investors about the transparency of American companies. "The Enron case and all the other scandals and cases that trailed after it may have finally punctured that romance with Wall Street that has been true of American culture for a while now," said Steve Fraser, a historian and author of "Every Man a Speculator: A History of Wall Street in American Life."

At Enron, Mr. Skilling was the visionary from the world of management consulting who spearheaded the company's rapid ascent by fastening on new ways to turn commodities, like natural gas and electricity, into lucrative financial instruments.

DOJ_NMG_0029881

Mr. Lay, the company's founder, was the public face of Enron. Known for his close ties to President Bush's family, he built Enron into a symbol of civic pride and envy here in its hometown of Houston and throughout the financial world.

The verdicts are a vindication for federal prosecutors, who had produced mixed results from their four-year investigation of wrongdoing at the company. The investigation resulted in 16 guilty pleas by Enron executives, and four convictions of Merrill Lynch bankers in a case involving the bogus sale of Nigerian barges to the Wall Street firm.

Last year, however, the Supreme Court, blaming flawed jury instructions, overturned the obstruction-of-justice verdict that sounded the death knell for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, Enron's outside auditor. And a jury either acquitted or failed to agree on charges in the fraud trial of former managers of Enron's failed broadband division.

In the 56-day trial, defense lawyers repeatedly criticized prosecutors for bringing criminal charges against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, saying the government had set out to punish the company's top officers regardless of what the facts might be. The lawyers said the government was criminalizing normal business practices and accused prosecutors of pressuring critical witnesses to plead guilty to crimes they did not commit.

The defense lawyers also complained about a lack of access to witnesses who they contended could have corroborated their clients' versions of events. Several jurors said they would have liked to hear from more witnesses, in particular Richard A. Causey, the chief accounting officer, whom neither side called. "To me, he was a missing link," said a juror, Douglas Baggett, an administrative manager for a corporate legal department at Shell.

The Enron trial, more than any other, punctuates the era of corporate corruption defined by the failure of WorldCom, the telecommunications giant whose bankruptcy following revelations of $11 billion in accounting fraud exceeded even Enron's in size; the prosecution of Frank P. Quattrone, the technology industry banker; and scandals at Tyco, Adelphia and HealthSouth.

Mr. Lay was forced to remain in the courthouse for more than three hours after the verdict was announced for a hearing on securing a $5 million bond, which will come from a mix of financial pledges from his children, and to surrender his passport.

Judge Lake will have broad discretion in determining the former executives' sentences.

He is not known for his leniency. Two years ago he sentenced Jamie Olis, a former midlevel executive at Dynegy, an Enron competitor, to 24 years for his role in a scheme to disguise the company's finances. An appeals court last year ordered the judge to revise the sentence. A hearing is set for June 9. The guilty verdicts could have limited impact on a spate of civil cases. "They are not the ones who are going to pay the billions of dollars in additional recoveries that we hope to obtain on top of the $7.2 billion we already have from banks in our previous settlements," said William S. Lerach, the lead lawyer in the largest civil case, set to go to trial in October.

From the beginning, the Enron leaders' trial was not what many people expected after revelations of secret off-the-books schemes that earned a small fortune for Andrew S. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, and his cadre of co-conspirators. Some of those transactions were used by Mr. Fastow without approval by anyone to enrich himself at Enron's expense; others were used to manipulate Enron's financial reports with what Mr. Fastow testified was the full knowledge of his bosses.

Rather than delve into those intricate structures, prosecutors focused on what they cited as the false statements Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay made to employees and outside investors.

The "lies and choices" theme transformed the case into a test of credibility between the former chief executives and the more than half a dozen witnesses from inside Enron who testified for the government.

During the trial, the government called 25 witnesses and the defense called 31, including Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay. Government witnesses, including the former Enron treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., testified that the executives had sanctioned or encouraged manipulative accounting practices and then crossed the line from cheerleading into outright misrepresentations of financial performance.

Mr. Fastow's emotional turn on the stand offered some of the most devastating evidence against Mr. Skilling, and to a lesser extent, Mr. Lay. He said he had struck "bear hug" side deals with Mr. Skilling guaranteeing that his off-the-books partnerships, called LJM, would not lose money in their dealings with Enron. Mr. Fastow also described how Mr. Skilling had bought into using the LJM's to bolster earnings.

But Mr. Fastow's own admitted history of extensive crimes at Enron was dissected by Mr. Petrocelli, and jurors said they did not find Mr. Fastow particularly persuasive. "Fastow was Fastow," said a juror, Donald Martin, shaking his head. "We knew where he was coming from."

The jurors said they were moved, in contrast, by the testimony of Mr. Glisan. "We kept on going back to that testimony to corroborate things," said one juror, Freddy Delgado, a school principal.

The surprise testimony of David W. Delainey, the former chief of a retail unit called Energy Services, also helped pave the way for Mr. Skilling's conviction. Mr. Delainey, who pleaded guilty to fraud, said that Mr. Skilling took part in a decision to shift some $200 million in losses from Energy Services to the more profitable wholesale energy division to avoid having to admit to investors that Energy Services was failing.

DOJ_NMG_0029882

On the stand, Mr. Skilling offered differing and confusing explanations for the shift. He proved evasive and sometimes forgetful, and he revealed a highly emotional demeanor rarely seen among the stoic class of chief executives.

His resignation in August 2001, after only six months as chief executive, led to a bout of heavy drinking as a depressed Mr. Skilling watched in horror as the company he helped build edged closer to the brink.

For Mr. Lay, a turning point came when Sherron S. Watkins, the former Enron vice president, took the stand to describe how she confronted him with concerns about Enron's accounting. Ms. Watkins suggested that the subsequent investigation Mr. Lay ordered was intentionally limited in scope to conclude that there were no problems.

Other issues plagued Mr. Lay's defense, most notably his own testiness on the stand and the sudden illness of his lead lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, a well-regarded criminal defense lawyer who was forced to miss more than a month of the trial because of coronary disease that required two operations. Mr. Lay, in part because of his own strained finances, decided to carry on without Mr. Ramsey rather than seek to delay the trial and fight another day.

Ignorance Claim Did Not Sway Enron Jury (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Kyle Whitmire

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 — One after another, the jurors spoke and, in different voices, it all added up to the same thing.

They simply could not believe, the eight women and four men of the jury explained in an extraordinary joint news conference after rendering their verdict, that Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling were telling the truth when they claimed they didn't realize that something was rotten at Enron.

How, they repeatedly wondered, could Enron's former chief executives not have known what was going on?

The jurors said they found the testimony by Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling in their own defense — which many legal experts had warned could prove to be their undoing — both revealing and damning.

Freddy Delgado, an elementary-school principal, questioned how the two men could testify that they "had their hands firmly on the wheel" at Enron and then say that they did not know about the improper accounting and the intensifying financial problems?

After all, parents hold him accountable for their children's welfare and safety. "I can't say that I don't know what my teachers were doing in the classroom," Mr. Delgado said. "I am still responsible if a child gets lost."

"So I would say that to say that you didn't know what was going on in your own company," Mr. Delgado added, "was not the right thing."

After sitting through a 16-week trial and listening to 56 witnesses, the jurors finally had a chance to speak. And gathering together in a sixth-floor room at the federal courthouse here, several blocks from Enron's former headquarters, that's exactly what they did.

In other high-profile cases, many jurors quickly dispersed to avoid reporters. But all of the Enron jurors, including the three alternates, attended the hourlong session. Facing dozens of reporters and TV cameramen, they calmly and patiently answered questions, appearing unburdened and frequently cracking jokes. If they had any doubt or hesitation about the verdict they had reached in the biggest corporate corruption case in recent American history, they didn't show it.

The jury included people of widely different backgrounds — a dairy farmer, payroll manager, two engineers, a ship inspector, county court clerk, personnel manager, retired sales assistant and dental hygienist — but they drew on their own life experiences, making clear that they thought of themselves as responsible for knowing everything about their jobs. Certainly, richly paid corporate executives should, too?

They respected Mr. Lay's charitable, civic and political standing in Houston and Washington, they said, but ultimately concluded that he put his own financial welfare ahead of his duties to shareholders and employees.

As for Mr. Skilling, jurors said they found his professed memory lapses and unfamiliarity with certain details incredible for someone who prided himself on having command over every area of Enron's operations.

"It is hard to believe," said Deborah Smith, the jury forewoman, "that someone, such a hands-on individual, could not possibly know the things that were going on within the company."

When the verdict was announced, Mr. Lay tried to console his sobbing wife while Mr. Skilling looked expressionless at the judge, turning briefly to search the faces of the audience.

But Nancy Thomas, who is retired and whose police officer husband is recovering from a stroke, shed a few tears as the verdict was read. Later, she said: "This is an emotional thing, there are too many people involved in it. There are human beings; there are families."

DOJ_NMG_0029883

Before the trial, defense lawyers doubted they could ever find an untainted jury in Houston. Federal District Judge Simeon T. Lake III chose the jury in one day after the jurors filled out 14-page questionnaires. Some jurors expressed doubt about the innocence of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, yet were allowed on the panel.

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling were "greedy people" and that's what helped cause Enron's demise, Ms. Smith wrote on her jury questionnaire.

Jill Ford, another juror who made the panel, wrote: "I think they probably knew they were breaking the law."

Throughout the trial, the jurors showed a remarkable solidarity. On Valentine's Day, most of them wore red; during Mardi Gras they came to court donning colorful beads.

But throughout, as Judge Lake proudly told them on Thursday, they did not show up late a single day in the 56-day trial. One woman, an alternate who called in sick, was immediately booted from the jury by the judge.

For the jurors, the four months were an extraordinary period of personal sacrifice. Mr. Delgado said he struggled to keep his focus on school matters with only one day a week — Fridays — to be at school when the case was not in session.

"We've cried together, we've laughed together and we really, really became more than just friends," he said. "I believe that we are a family and we supported each other with all the different things that happened in our lives within these four months."

